MAN, amidst the fluctuations of his own feelings and of passing events, ought to resemble the ship, which currents may carry and winds may impel from her course, but which, amidst every deviation, still presses onward to her port with unremitted perseverance. In the coolness of reflection, he ought to survey his affairs with a dispassionate and comprehensiv eye, and, having fixed on his plan, take the necessary steps to accomplish it, regardless of the temporary mutations of his own mind, the monotony of the same track, the apathy of exhausted attention, or the blandishments of new projects.—Samuel Bailey's Essays.

DOUBTLESS to believe an opinion is to believe that it is true, and to doubt that truth will ultimately prevail is to suppose that the development of thought is nothing but a vague fluctuation hither and thither of endless and contradictory blundering And yet the man who can believe that his own conception is definit and complete, and that truth is to be fully reached the day after to morrow, shows that he possesses the sanguin temper and dogmatic self-confidence which are, indeed, conditions of the successful propagation of a creed, but which are very far from being sufficient conditions of success. Too many philosophers and preachers hav announced themselvs to be in possession of the truth to leave us much confidence in such predi tions.—Leslie Stephen.

IN every corner of the world there is the same phenomenon of the decay of established religions In Catholic countries as well as in Protestant, nay, among Mohammedans, Jews, Buddhists, Brahmans, traditionary creeds are losing their hold. An intellectual revolution is sweeping over the world, breaking down established opinions, dissolving the foundations on which historical faiths hav been built up. Science, history, philosophy, hav combined to create universal uncertainty, and Catholic France and Italy are no better off in this respect than Germany, England, or America.—J. A Froude.

THE office of education is to call forth power of every kind, power of thought, affection, will, and outward action; power to observe, to reason, to judge, to contrive; power to adopt good ends firmly, and to pursue them efficiently; power to govern ourselvs and to influence others; power to gain and to spread happiness. Reading is but an instrument; education is to teach its best use. The intellect was created not to receive passivly a few words, dates, facts, but to be activ in the acquisition of truth.—Dr. Channing.

I AM sure the principal end why we are to get knowledge here is to make use of it for the benefit of ourselvs and others in this world, but if by gaining it we destroy our health, we labor for a thing that will be useless in our hands. He sinks his vessel by overloading it, though it be with gold and silver and precious stones, will giv his owner but an ill account of his voyage.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

Victor Hugo.

The "stormy voice of France" is still,
Laid down at last the pen,
That kindled an abiding thrill
Within the hearts of men.

If tears are in the eyes of France,
He was not her's alone;
All men hav heard, in willing trance,
That voice, and hushed their own.

To us, who know him by the page
On which his thoughts are writ,
He cannot die, for neither Age
Nor Death can alter it.

The poet has not journeyed hence,
His soul must ever dwell
Within the noble eloquence
He spoke so passing well.

Among the living he was great,
And now among the dead;
The present mourns, and ages wait
With crowns to crown his head.

What matter if his face is hid
From the warm light of day?
His life, in what he said and did,
Can never know decay.

He loved the people. Let them weep;
Their tears were never shed
A worthier hero's head.

A PROHIBITIONIST is a man who says he wants the saloons closed. So is a druggist.—Graphic.

TIME is always represented carrying a scythe, and it is supposed he will continue to carry this primitiv agricultural implement until Time shall be no mower.

IT is said by the Chicago Ledger that away back somewhere in the remote past the heel of a woman's shoe was bigger than a nickel, and was not placed in the hollow of her foot.

THE Jewish Messenger says that to the curious specimen of a prayer lately published may be added this of a modern rabbi: "O Lord, thou rememberest we said last week," etc.

IN Patagonia they fine a man two goats for killing his wife. The law is very strict on the subject, too, and if the fine isn't promptly paid he is compelled to marry again. That makes him hustle around for the goats.

A YOUNG person of Tomahawk Bluff
Carried pistols to make him look tough.
When they asked, "Do you chew?"
He replied, "Yes, I do,
I'm a wegular wetch of a wough."

"YES, sir, our minister is just boss." "Just boss? What do you mean by that?" "Minds his own business and lets alone what doesn't concern him." "I don't exactly understand." "Why, he doesn't meddle with either politics or religion."

THE new version of the Old Testament places mankind considerably above instead of a little lower than he angels. We are not surprised at this. We hav never yet seen a pic'ure of an angel that didn't look like an Italian opera chorus girl with wings on.—Graphic.

"IT has always seemed a very curious thing to me—" said a lady at the theater, and then she paused. "Well," said her husband, a little impatiently, "what is it that has always seemed such a curious thing to you?" "Why, that bald-headed men should care to sit so near the flies."—Good Cheer.

THE editor of the Battle Creek (Mich.) Moon has a dog, and made this argument after paying license for him: "In Michigan they assess a dog one dollar for being a dog. In Tennessee they assess a man fifty cents to become a doctor. It costs 'heluf a tollar' more to be a dog in Michigan than a doctor in Tennessee. Don't be a dog."

YOU want to know why it is called the English sparrow, do you, Ethel? Well, dear, it is because it is very English in its ways. Making more noise than any other bird of its size, quarreling all the time that it is not eating, and seeming to think that this great universe was created for its especial benefit. That is why it is called the English sparrow, Ethel. —Boston Post.

A GOOD old deacon in Connecticut was very pious and very fond of clams. When once upon a time he attended a Rhode Island clambake he overtaxed his capacity and was sorely distressed. But his faith in prayer was unabated. Leaving the party and going down on his knees behind a tree he was heard to supplicate: "Forgiv me, O Lord, this great sin of gluttony. Restore my health and I will never eat any more clams." Then, after a judicious pause, "Very few, if any."

A MINISTER was complaining of the indifference displayed by the congregation during the passing of the contribution box. "Yes," assented a deacon, "the collections are very small." "Cannot you suggest a remedy?" inquired the dominie. "I think it would be a good plan, Mr. S.," replied the deacon, "if the collection were to be taken up before instead of after the sermon. Anticipation, you know, is always greater than realization, and a disappointed man is not apt to be generous."

A COUPLE OF REFLECTIONS.

By Puck's Omar Khayyam.

Roses may do to make a poet's bed,
Roses may do to crown a beauty's head;
But they are not a circumstance unto
Brandy and soda for a large swelled head.

Ne'er wed a woman when she's growing old,
Ne'er pluck the rose before it doth unfold,
And ne'er forget the man who sticks to you,
When you're in trouble, with his bright red gold.

THE origin of one of Franklin's most celebrated sayings has just been discovered. One day his father sent him to collect a bill amounting to ninepence. On the way home he met a boy much larger than himself, who, being a great bully, proceeded to giv him a thrashing. When his father saw his dirty face and bruised countenance he naturally asked the cause. "I met Tom Jones down the road," answered Ben, "and he gave me a pounding." "You didn't lose the money, did you?" "No," said the embryo philosopher, "but I wouldn't be pounded that way again for ninepence twice over." "Hoity-toity," exclaimed his father; "that will never do. Take care of the pennies and the pounds will take care of themselvs."

"MY brudering," said a colored pulpit orator, "de Israelites went over de Red Sea on de ice. They got over all safe; and dat's the reason why Moses sung de song of praise. In the morning, when de sun was up, hot, Pharioh and de Gyptians come wid deir great lumbering chariots of iron. Dey broke through de ice and all went to de bottom of de sea." "Stop dere!" exclaimed a hearer; "I want to ask a question. I've read g'ography, and Egypt's a hot country. It's under de tropics, it's near de 'quator, and dere ain't no ice dere. How could dey go over on de ice, an' dere no ice dere?" To this the preacher responded: "I'm glad you asked that question. Now I can 'splain. That comes of reading g'ography instead of the Bible. My brudering, when de children of Israel go over de Red Sea, dat was a great, great while ago, before dere was any g'ography, before dere was any tropics, before dere was any 'quator. Dat's de reason dere was ice, my brudering."

Notes and Clippings.

HERBERT F. BEECHER has been appointed collector of customs for the district of Puget Sound. This Beecher is the son of Henry Ward Beecher.

A CLERGYMAN of Connecticut, who recently died, left all his money to missionary societies, and did not leave a cent to a feeble and penniless brother who is in a public institution.

THE Sunday law is said to be so strictly enforced in the Sandwich Islands that the nativs are not allowed to feed the silkworms on Sunday. Consequently silkworm culture has almost entirely died out.

ONG AH MON, the Chinaman who was shot by a drunken rough in this city last week, was buried with both Chinese and Christian funeral rites. His future destination, therefore, must remain a question of profound uncertainty.

THE advisability of starting a Roman Catholic daily newspaper here is being discussed by the authorities of the church. They had better not try it. The number of Catholics who can read is not sufficient to warrant the enterprise.

IN the last phase of the Harrison-Spencer discussion, Mr. Harrison refers to Professor Youmans, of New York, as a "Yankee editor." Professor Youmans may yet hav something to say, and then it will be incumbent on Mr. Harrison to take it all back.

A BRIDGEPORT, Conn., man had a revelation that the Lord wanted him to work for fifty cents a day less than he was receiving. This is the first instance of the kind on record. Usually, remarks Texas Siftings, the "revelation" comes to the employer.

Dr. R. A. GUNN, of this city, accuses Senator Coggleshall of asking $1,500 for championing a bill which the doctor was interested in getting through the legislature of the state. Coggleshall denies it, but the matter does not seem likely to go any further.

MRS. OHM, who professes to cast out devils and perform other feats commonly regarded as superhuman, resides near Laketon, Ind., and is regularly consulted by persons who believe themselvs under the influence of a malign spirit. She has been at least enabled to amass a snug fortune.

THE Prince of Wales has been presented with a copy of the revised Bible. By an inadvertence, probably, on the part of either author or publishers, a similar courtesy has not been extended to any one in this office, though THE TRUTH SEEKER has yielded some of its space to advertise the work.

IT is a little awkward for the revisers, says the Independent, to find that their statement in the preface to the revised Old Testament—"It is well known 'its' does not occur in the Bible of 1611," is not well grounded. A sharp critic has found the little word in Leviticus, xxv, 5—"That which groweth of its own accord," etc.

THIS is Beecher's latest shot at the Bible: "On the theory of the plenary inspiration of the book the Bible is already set aside. I don't believe that any honest and consistent man who believes that God spoke every word in the Bible can save himself from going head first into the gulf of Infidelity. If he doesn't go over it is because he is too stupid."

THE Washington correspondent of the Sun tells how Colonel Ingersoll penetrated the Interior Department: "Bob Ingersoll called at the Interior Department yesterday, and asked to see the secretary. 'The secretary is occupied, sah, with members and senatahs only. Won't see any one else now, sah,' said the colored messenger at the door. Bob waited for a moment with his hands in his pockets. Then he pulled out a half dollar and dropped it into the janitor's hand, after giving a few whispered instructions. A moment later the messenger walked into the secretary's room, where a large number of senators and members were assembled, and addressed the secretary: 'Mr. Secretary, Mr. Bob Ingersoll am at the doah. He says he understands that dis am de time when you won't see any but members and senatahs, an' he wants to know when you receive gentlemens.' 'Show the colonel in,' said the secretary."

A SALT LAKE CITY parson sends to the Independent a transcript of the inscription on the tombstone of George A. Smith, a Mormon. The inscription declares that "his name will go down to the end of time." As Mr. Smith had seven wives and twenty children, this is a safe statement to make. The name is already known wherever the English language is spoken. Everybody has heard of Smith.

THE publishers of the revised Old Testament may be said to hav an eye to business. A great many people, remarks an exchange, bought the new version of the New Testament when it appeared, flattering themselvs that they would buy the Old Testament when it came out, and thus hav both parts. The English publishers, however, do not propose to issue the Old Testament separately, and to obtain it purchasers will be obliged to buy the Bible.

PRESBYTERIANS are a good deal perplexed over the question of the validity of Roman Catholic baptism. "What constitutes valid baptism?" the Evangelist inquires. "Does it require any more than the reverent sprinkling in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost?" The conclusion is that the Roman Catholic baptism is as good as any. Both are good, but neither kind of baptism, it may be added, should be allowed to replace the bath.

THE Winneconne, Wis., Enterprise contains this item: "Last Sunday about ten young men assembled and proposed that they would go and cut some wood for the Widow Ferry, and the result was that some six cords of pine wood is cut in her yard. They were boys who work in the mills through the week." We doubt if any other ten young men in Wisconsin, even though they did not break a commandment, feel better satisfied with the way they spent that Sunday.

WIFE: "Here is an item in this paper about a man who lost a thousand dollars last night at poker. I do think it is scandalous the way men squander their money; there ought to be a law against this gambling business. By the way, John, I would like some money to pay that millinery bill." Husband: "Why, I gave you $10 yesterday to pay that bill." Wife: "Yes, I know; but I spent that money in 'chances' at the church fair last night, and wasn't lucky enough to win anything.—Philadelphia Call.

THE Cooper Institute is doing a good work in educating and improving the young people of this city. An abstract of the last annual report shows that during the year there were 4,208 pupils in its schools. Of this number 531 attended the industrial art classes for young women in the day time, including the classes in phonography and telegraphy. More than 650,000 persons hav used the reading-room during the year, and nearly 200,000 books hav been lent to readers to take to their homes. The evening art schools are largely attended, and there are also scientific classes which pursue a regular course of study extending over a period of five years.

THE American Protestant League asserts that the Roman Catholics, under direct orders from Rome, and immediately directed by Cardinal McCloskey, hav gone very far in a systematic effort to capture Washington as a center of political influence. The evidence cited in support of that view is the immense acquirement of property by the church in the District of Columbia. Sites for schools, convents, colleges, churches, and asylums hav been purchased there greatly in advance of actual needs; and now sixty-five acres of ground hav been bought for the projected seminary, to found which a Catholic lady recently gave $300,000 as a beginning. The institution is to be under the management of the Jesuits. The activ controller of all these concerns, however, is the archbishop of Baltimore, in whose diocese the capital is situated, and who is to-day the heaviest individual owner of real estate in Washington. In all this the League sees a determination on the part of the Roman Catholics to make Washington their potent American center.

SERIOUS anti-Jewish riots hav broken out during the Reichstrath election in Vienna. The inciting cause was the excitement of the people growing out of the election agitation. The Carmelite Platz was filled with a howling mob, and free fights were frequent. The shops of the jews were raided and ruined, and their owners violently assaulted. No less than forty persons were severely wounded. The police made many arrests; still they were powerless to repress the rioters, and had to call for the aid of the military. Other riots, of like violence and destructivness, hav taken place in the Wieden and Nuebau districts.

THE Catholic Examiner is not willing that Sunday newspapers should be suppressed, and sees more reason for the suppression of the Monday edition, because, while the work of getting out a Sunday paper is done on Saturday, that of issuing a Monday morning journal is performed on Sunday. The Examiner finds still further reason for suppressing the Monday newspaper in the fact that "it is very largely made up of the sermons preached on Sunday by the most sensational of the Protestant divines, and the seizure and suppression of the journals containing these lucubrations would tend to improve mentally and morally the general public."

AT a conference of the Baptist ministers held last week a discussion of the revised edition of the Old Testament was the main feature. The Rev. Dr. G. W. Sampson read a long paper upon the injudicious changes made. He objected to the use of "one day" and "a second day" in the Genesis instead of the first day and the second day, and especially to the description of man as a little lower than God instead of a little lower than the angels. He also objected to the way "sheol" was left untranslated in certain places, while in others it was translated into grave, and again in one of the Psalms it was rendered hell when it evidently stood for grave, but this way of putting it, he considered, was simply to fit to the prayer-book of the Church of England.

THE young preacher who has succeeded Parson Newman at the Madison avenue Methodist church, in this city, is a somewhat notable youth. His name is Price, and he is a Harvard graduate. While preaching at Keene, N. H., his congregation once feared that he was drifting from orthodoxy and asked him to preach on probation after death. He did so, and quoted everything in the Bible relativ to the subject, extending his discourse into twelfthly, and tiring out the whole congregation. He was asked by his hearers not to preach on probation after death again until they were dead. When the Rev. Joseph Cook was in Keene, Mr. Price woke him up one day to attend a prayer-meeting, which aroused the ire of Cook, and instead of a prayer-meeting the two preachers had a slugging match, being finally separated by the keeper of the hotel.

THE French astronomer, Faye, has recently published a long and elaborate paper upon the evolution of our system. Accepting the nebular hypothesis of Laplace, in the main, he modifies it, in some respects, to account for certain facts with which the original theory failed to deal. He points out that, in the original nebula, the central force at first would not follow the law of gravitation; that is, each particle of the nebula would be attracted to the center by a force varying not "inversely as the square of the distance" from the center, but nearly as the distance directly. As the system grew older, and the matter concentrated more and more in the central sun, the central force would come gradually to its present law. Assuming this, he shows that planets formed from rings developed in the primitiv nebula, near the center, and while it was still young, would rotate on their axes in the direction of their orbital motion. On the other hand, those developed more lately, near the outskirts of the mass, would hav a retrograde rotation (as Uranus and Neptune actually do). His theory, in opposition to all others, makes the outer planets the youngest, instead of the oldest, members of the family.

THE New Orleans World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition will reopen in November and be continued for a year independent of government aid.

THE police of this city made twenty-four arrests for violations of the excise law last Sunday. There were probably twenty-four hundred saloons open by way of side-doors.

AN activ movement is on foot among New York merchants looking toward the closing of all stores and business houses at 1 o'clock on Saturdays to giv the employees a weekly half-holiday.

MR. BEECHER continues his series of sermons on evolution. His Sunday sermon dealt with immortality, which he made conditional, consigning those who had not lived good lives to annihilation.

MYRON BAILEY, a Salvation Army soldier, was twice ejected from a train in Connecticut for trying to beat his way. He got aboard again, and, when put off the third time, fired a pistol at the brakeman. He is in jail.

IT is estimated that forty thousand people went to Coney Island last Sunday to escape the heat of the city. Two thousand boys went to Shady Side, up the Hudson, to play base ball on the new playgrounds which hav been provided for their use by the New York World.

KEELY recently gave an exhibition of his celebrated motor before the stockholders in the concern. Several mechanical engineers were present, some of whom claim that Keely has discovered a hitherto unknown force, and others say it is a humbug, the machine being actuated by compressed air.

PHIL DALEY is the name of the most notorious gambler at Long Branch. Nevertheless he has a private chapel, built at great expense, and hires a priest to celebrate a mass every morning. Nobody has as yet remarked any inappropriateness in the thing, because it is well known that if all the money dishonestly acquired were taken from the church there would be hardly a fashionable church building standing in the world.

The New Education

AS EXEMPLIFIED IN THE GRAMERCY PARK SCHOOL AND TOOL-HOUSE.

This school, long known to New Yorkers as conducted by Miss Haines, has struck out, under the guidance of Mr. G. Von Taube, on a new departure, a departure, indeed, really inaugurated by that celebrated instructress herself in the founding by her of a model kindergarten, from which, as a nucleus, this method of infant object-teaching has rapidly spread till it is now becoming universally adopted.

The tool-house is the legitimate successor of the kindergarten, and both are the natural outgrowth of the modern ideas which are gradually taking possession not only of the educational but of all domains. Just as the old-time system of government in church and state was based upon arbitrary authority, so it was with the rule of the old-time pedagog, whose dominion was upheld by frown and ferule, and under whose awful sway school hours were long and dull, and much study became a weariness of the flesh. His drilling was despotic, artificial, and mechanical, and the pupil's minds were regarded not much otherwise than as waste-baskets into which so and so many disjointed scraps of dry rules and empty formulas were to be flung.

But the fiat of time is decreeing the mightiest of revolutions, and that is the irrevocable change from royalty to republicanism. Under royalty it might hav been well for the teacher to make machines of the boys and girls. Under republicanism we need to make of them men and women. To effect this we must introduce better systems of physical, mental, and moral culture.

Physical education as conducted in the Gramercy Park school I cannot here treat of, but of the intellectual and moral education instituted there, and of the tool-house as an indispensable department of the general regime, I would speak.

As to the course of intellectual education, recent psychological science has brought to us, perhaps, the greatest of all modern discoveries, the existence, that is, of a strict correlation between the brain and nervous system on the one hand, and thought with its workings on the other.

With this clue in hand, educational methods may now follow an established line of mental facts, which may be summarized categorically as follows:

(a) The development of the senses in the young is the basis of their future mentality.

(b) Such development, to be successful, necessitates individual work by the pupil, instead of rote-teaching and book-learning.

(c) Commemoration is based, not on direct verbal drilling of the memory, but upon the association of impressions, conducting thence to the association of ideas.

(d) Ideas presuppose facts, and are the results derived from comparisons of perceptions, depending, therefore, for their clearness upon the quality of the perceptions which are obtained.

Education, depending thus on things instead of words, is necessarily, as Herbert Spencer has so well shown, from the particular to the general, from the simple to the complex, from the concrete to the abstract; and in this process the pupil should be taught by his teacher as little as possible, and should teach himself as much as possible. The most important new practice undoubtedly is the systematic culture of the powers of observation, i. e., the development of the senses and perceptions by object-teaching.

To accomplish this effectually, it has been shown by all the great educational reformers, from Pestalozzi down through Froebel, Bain, Carpenter, Maudsley, Youmans, and others, that a fundamental prerequisit must be understood and considered, which prerequsit consists in the simple yet inestimable truth that there is a certain sequence in which the faculties spontaneously develop, and that a properly adapted kind of knowledge is necessary for each step. In entire ignorance of this, hitherto highly abstract and complex subjects, like algebra and grammar, hav been forced upon the unfortunate children, for which their tender minds are no more fit than a babe's digestiv organs are to assimilate hard tack.

Thus, at last, on the basis of mental physiology we hav been enabled to classify school existence physiologically as presenting different states or ages of mental growth and therefore of mental capacity.

From the earliest childhood up to six or seven years of age we now know the human mind to be possessed of an incomparable freshness for perceptions of the concrete. The next stage of a child's development would bring him to thirteen or fourteen, and manifests the characteristics of curiosity and natural propensity to investigate his surroundings. From fourteen to seventeen or nineteen we find a well-pronounced capacity for comparison, or the recognition of similarities and differences between the items and parts observed. From that age to twenty-one or twenty-three comes rather the comparison of ideas than of things, the solution of difficult problems, etc., etc.

The first two of these stages represent the absorptiv capacity of the human mind from without, and the two latter ones the inner systematization and working out of the materials previously gathered.

How to select the materials for these stages, especially the first two, which must be adapted to the younger children, that has been the problem.

This much has been discovered, namely, that the difficulties encountered by older people in mastering minutiæ do not exist in anything like the same degree for children. Hence the little ones should hav offered to them, not empty words and arid formulas, not fairy tales and fantastic poems, but they should be provided with the facts of those sciences the knowledge of which conditions our existence, and which, if properly presented, the young will grasp for with avidity. Hence in the school system under consideration—consisting of a course of twelve years, six devoted to the objectiv and six to the subjectiv—are given gradually developing lessons in plants, animals, and place, leading to botany, zoology, and geography; oral lessons in language, including qualities and names of objects, attention being drawn to thoughts rather than to words; lessons in writing, the pupil later on attempting to describe in his own words the objects learned from the oral lessons in the shape of compositions on clothing, cotton, linen, silk, etc., the A B C of future technology; lessons in form, size, and number, leading on to arithmetic and solid measure; lessons in esthetics, beginning with objectiv outlines of familiar things, coming later on to figures drawn from memory, and finally to rudiments of the human figure and perspectiv.

So, in very brief outline, passes the first stage, comprising six years and constituting the objectiv course.

Next comes the second stage of six years, making up the subjectiv course. This relates to ideas rather than to things, that is, the comparison of perceptions rather than of objects, depending, therefore, like a house upon its foundation, upon the successful gathering of materials during the previous objectiv stage.

Let us see, then, what it actually embraces. In science forces tend to take the place of facts; the mechanical principles involved in physiology are dwelt upon; biology, and mental and moral science, are in time approached; logic, inductiv and deductiv, comes toward the end, and political economy is embraced; in language, higher readings, and in writing more complex compositions follow upon industrial, scientific, historical, social, sociological, and artistic topics; in mathematics higher arithmetic is brought in, leading on to book-keeping, algebra, trigonometry, surveying, and astronomy; in esthetics comes the gradual introduction of colors, also drawing and skeleton sketching from nature, and, finally, philosophy is arrived at, involving a training in the evolution of human thought, in the principal systems of philosophy, Greek, French, German, and English, together with a review of the most famous literatures of all nations. I may add that throughout the whole curriculum the modern and, if desired, the ancient languages are taught according to nature's methods.

But what incentivs are to be relied upon to stimulate the students and cause them to apply themselvs? Experience has amply proved that not rewards nor punishments (in the ordinary sense), not love or fear of mamma and papa, are to be depended on. Upon what motiv then can we fall back? The answer comes that here again the path is clearly pointed out by mental physiology, which directs us to those two familiar states of consciousness which we call pain and pleasure; the first, pain, ever retarding us; the second, pleasure, ever inciting us onward, meaning by pleasure the interest which flows naturally from absorbing occupation, and further meaning by pleasure an innocent and wholesome enjoyment of life in its substantial pursuits. Taking advantage of these keen proclivities which exist in every healthy child, the skilled teacher leads his pupils on day by day to the self-acquisition of new data, the charm of such creativ activity being almost invariably a sufficient inducement to the child to whet his intellectual appetite and keep it ever keen.

Having thus given a sketch of the general educational regime and its methods, I fancy I hear some one asking: "Well, what has the tool-house got to do with all this?" My reply is, Everything. Those who hav grasped the philosophy of the kindergarten hav also grasped the philosophy of the tool-house. The fundamental object of each (intellectually speaking) is the acquisition of knowledge through its practical application. Knowledge unapplied can hardly be called knowledge at all, and the study of the natural sciences, unless supplemented by the conjoint training of the mind and hand, remains doubtful in its results and tedious in its acquisition. Let us illustrate what we mean from mechanics. Mechanics, as far as its theory is concerned, represents only abstracts. Abstracts are merely mental symbols of the concrete. They are used only for the purposes of the concrete. The concrete remains always as of primary importance. Its value consists in its application. Lets us take an example; to understand the three kinds of lever is frequently found difficult, even for elder people, but Mr. Von Taube assures me that through a task performed by the pupil himself simply with the aid of a stick or a butcher's scale, the theory becomes at once understood in a manner never to be forgotten.

We know how eager children are from the earliest age to investigate all the possible purposes to which any kind of material can be applied. With such an inborn instinct to urge the pupil on toward the ready ownership and control of knowledge, why neglect so inestimable a faculty? The kindergarten utilizes this faculty. The tool-house would simply continue its work, without which, it is claimed, the thread of education would be rudely snapped. In this process the scholar is introduced into the fascinating handicraft, mysteries of forging, printing, turning both in wood and metal, scroll-sawing, wood-carving, joining, carpentering, plumbing, enameling, photography, etc.

In these practical ways the minutiæ of mathematics and mechanics become taught to the interested learner, and ere long the secondary effect begins to manifest itself in the acquisition of what is in familiar Yankee phrase called "gumption," or a sound, activ, and constructiv judgment, enabling knowledge finally to extend itself to all questions and occasions of our life, till even the intrigues of courts, the strength or feebleness of human nature, the good and evil passions, become, as it were, so many mehanical energies, every one of them representable by its numerical exponent, and of value to him—the constructiv statesman—only as he may be enabled to separate or combine them. So it comes about that the correlation and resolution of mechanical forces, as applied and illustrated in the tool-house, lead us on by graduated steps to face, and, as far as may be, to to solve the deep enigmas of humanity.

As a direct corollary from what has just been said an inference of vast practical importance must hav already been drawn by the intelligent reader, to wit, the practical effect of the education of the tool-house in providing the pupil with many means of livelihood through his skill in various crafts.

Amid the chances and changes, the ups and downs of life, it is impossible for anyone to exaggerate how essential it may be for a young man to know a trade, and, as already indicated, the general tool-house training should fit him not only for one, but for many such industrial occupations.

Let us turn now to the moral education peculiar to the Gramercy Park school and tool-house. As a preparation and introduction thereto, the pupil is everywhere brought face to face with truth, with the great truthfulness of nature, the great truthfulness of fact. But, strictly speaking, morality appertains not to the world of dead matter, but to the world of living human beings. It is the science of right living; its object is to fit one for the duties and activities of life, and it rightly regards that as the truly salutary disciplin which visits upon all conduct, good and bad, the pleasurable or painful consequences which, in the nature of things, such conduct tends to produce. Moral cause and consequence is, therefore, the chief thing to be inculcated. The school system must be one of pure justice. The learner must discover that "whatsoever he soweth, that shall he also reap," and that "the way of the transgressor is hard."

But such rude experience is often not only a hard, but a hardening master While pain and pleasure felt as consequences may lie at the root of morality as a science, it must be remembered that this same morality is not only a science, but an art and practice as well. True, the art and the practice must wait upon the science, but they must also supplement it. Under this view, morality becomes nothing more than habits taken in the right direction. If some evil proclivities need to be eradicated, the best way is to stifle them by means of good predispositions substituted through consistent examples set and steady habits formed.

And just here it is that the ethical power of the tool-house manifests itself. Remarkable as are its intellectual advantages, these really pale before its moral effects. In the first place, the mere habit of organized recreation is of itself an enormous aid. It is an unspeakable gain, even if a negativ one, to keep boys out of mischief. How enchanted any boy becomes over some machine or model which he seeks to fashion for himself! Under a proper curriculum of manual training, these inherent youthful impulses are taken hold of and so systematized that the otherwise idle and refractory youngster is kept continuously and absorbingly occupied.

One of the too frequent effects resulting from the old methods, whether of the school or home, was to make both school and home hateful. As a necessary reaction the pupil was driven to seek his pleasure in mere pleasure seeking. Not to find his joy in his work, but in skylarking and mischief-making, became his chief end of life. How many a wayward and rebellious boy, ungovernable by the old disciplin, might not hav been saved, if taken at a sufficiently early age by this new, judicious, and beneficent system, a system which provides materials for the hand and head to act upon as naturally as the digestiv organs assimilate appropriate food.

But let us look at the subject a little deeper. There must needs be an objectiv training in morals as well as in intellect. To begin with the definitions or rules in moral instruction (as has always been the old-fashioned way) before having cultivated its objectiv perceptions would be to make the same mistake as to start in grammar with the laws of syntax before having inculcated the signification of the parts of speech.

The physical objectiv morality of sound health through diet, air, and exercise must first be implanted. This must be accompanied by the disciplin of work—of work motived by curiosity and gratified inquiry—so leading on to steady preoccupation and to steady habits.

The pupil finds himself in this way continually overcoming difficulties by his own personal effort, and therefore finds himself gaining that inestimable moral stimulation, the feeling of self-reliance.

But, further, the scholar is all the while objectivly acquiring a continual insight into the most important facts which relate to the productiv activities of the world. The popular nature of his employment tends necessarily to lead him into a close moral sympathy with the wants, needs, and difficulties of the workers of the world. Moreover, when the toolhouse shall be fully organized, it is the intention of the management, in connection with a proper supervision, to introduce a democratic method of administration (self-government) among the pupils. They are each to be the owner of one or more shares of stock, with the right to draw its accruing dividends, thus imparting a financial interest in the concern; the boys are to elect their own foreman in each department; they are to manufacture their own products, and sell them in the open market; they are to keep their own books, and by means of meetings and debate in open caucus to regulate, as far as may be, their own order.

This school, therefore, instead of being something apart from the great run of common life, becomes incorporated with it, and no violent break is felt when the student career merges naturally and almost imperceptibly into political, business, or professional existence.

And so it comes about that by means of this ever-repeated experience of what may be called objectiv morality, the scholar enters his later life with the habit ineradicably fixed upon him of comparing pleasurable and painful states of consciousness, the pleasurable always resulting from work and duty done, duty always being found in the doing of work. His experience and love for the smaller republic of the school now become extended subjectivly to the larger republic of country. He realizes that outside of him is the great social organism and the feelings of losses and gains to himself are applied in imagination unto others. Their losses and gains become a part of his own being. In their happiness he comes to seek his own. The knowledge of rights and the feelings of duty widen till, finally, the moral keynote is reached in the adaptation of his life to a wide, harmonious scale, where the physically moral, the intellectually moral, and the emotionally moral combine in a lofty, esthetic, and human enthusiasm.

Such, briefly, in its actual scope and reasonable possibilities, is the New Education with the toolhouse as its indispensable adjunct. May the Gramercy Park Experiment become the model for thousands!

COURTLANDT PALMER.

A Rabbi On the Nine Demands.

The Secular Union of Kansas City. Mo., under the energetic management of the Krekels and their friends, is waking the city up. The "Ministers' Alliance" hav fulminated against it, the clergy attack it, and the people attend its meetings. A new defender of the political platform of Freethought has also disclosed himself on account of it. Two weeks ago last Saturday Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf delivered in the synagog before a large audience a lecture with the Union for his text. He said that at the present time intolerance is more injurious to the cause of the church than it is harmful to those against whom the illiberal spirit is aimed. There is little use in concealing the fact any longer that the church has ceased to be society's ruling power. The spirit of the time is opposed to the priesthood's tyrannical sway of the dark ages, and to the creeds and doctrins of medievalism. Society is pervaded by a strong predisposition to question all forms of belief, and to discard all that is in opposition to the facts of science and to the enlightened spirit of the age. An attempt to check that predisposition, to interpose obstacles in the way of free inquiry and rational research, is equal to the attempt of damming up a powerful stream with bullrushes; the waters may recede for a moment only to acquire greater force, and madly rushing forward again, will cause much greater ruin than they would hav done had their course not been impeded.

And why should the Secular Union be subject to an attack from the Ministers' Alliance? Why this terribly indignation? What horrible crime hav they perpetrated? A number of intelligent and highly respectable people hav had the audacity to differ in their religious views from the Ministers' Alliance, hav had the unpardonable courage to express their belief before the public, foolishly thinking that on this soil, where religious liberty and freedom of conscience are supposed to hav built their home, the Secular Union has as much right to inform the public of its belief and its aims, as the Minister's Alliance has to express its views. Alas! it was an idle delusion when we believed that the old theological spirit had been compelled not only to descend from its long established supremacy, but also forced to relinquish all its most cherished pretensions. The spirit of persecution is not yet dead. Fanaticism is still glimmering on the hearth of the church. The individual's right of private judgment is still interfered with. Those who, in the exercise of their sacred and inalienable right to free judgment, refuse to acquiesce in religious notions which seems to them obsolete and irrational are still pointed out with the finger of scorn. But since there exists not among the people of the United States one universal religion, since there can be no unity in religious belief, since this government claims to be totally separated from the church, since the state has no right to show favoritism to a particular denomination, since the state can not possibly make provisions to suit the large variety of denominations, since a large number of its excellent, intelligent, moral citizens are not members of any church, I cannot but recognize the justice of the Nine Demands of the Secular Union.

The Secular Union has a right to think that its mission is as lofty, and its work as beneficial for society, as that of any church; but the state refuses to exempt the property wherein the Union meets from taxation, a privilege for which they never ask, and they hav a right to demand "that churches and all other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation." As long as Congress, state legislature, navy, militia, prisons, asylums, and other institutions supported by public money are composed of citizens who belong to different religious denominations, or to no denomination at all, and church and state separated, their demand that the employment of chaplains in these various institutions be discontinued is a just one, as is also their demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease. As long as the public schools are attended by children whose parents are either believers of both Testaments, or of only one Testament, or of no Testament at all, or who, while believing in the Bible, do not believe it fit and proper for the young, or they hav not sufficient faith in the religious sincerity of the teacher who is to use the Bible, or they think that the Sabbath-school is sufficient for the religious training of the children, so long do I heartily concur with their demand that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book, or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited. As long as we boast of a total separation between church and state, so long do I heartily second their demand that the appointment by the president of the United States, or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease. As long as the present mockery and sacrilege in the administering of the oath continues to wound our religious sensibilities; so long as there are people who do not believe in the efficacy of an oath administered in the name of God; as long as there are even religious people who strongly object to being sworn in the name of God by irreligious people, or by corrupt ward politicians, so long will intelligently religious people heartily indorse their demand that the judicial oath in the courts, and in all other departments of the government, shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalities of perjury shall be established in its stead. As long as there are respectable and law-abiding citizens of the United States to whom the first day in the week is not the holy day, who prefer the last day of the week as their day of rest, and who hav as good an authority for their preference as the others hav for theirs; as long as these people, though entitled under the Constitution of the United States to as much protection from the government as is the other, yet never get that protection, and are rational enough not to claim special legislation to favor their special religious needs; as long as there are excellent and moral citizens for whom the first day of the week is not at all a holy day, but a day of physical recreation, so long has a government that does not claim to be Theistic, as little right to place obstacles in the way of the better class, as it has a right to indirectly compel the former class to observe the Sunday as its day of rest. If for the welfare of the state, and for the good of the people, it is necessary that one day in the week should be set aside for rest, for mental, physical, spiritual recreation, and in accordance with the wishes of the majority, the Sunday is set aside for that purpose, it does not follow that by conceding so much to the voice of the majority, rigorous restrictions and cruel interference shall be imposed and enforced upon the minority; neither does it follow that the demand of the Secular Union that all laws, directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed, is unjust. As long as no voice from on high has as yet, by any special revelation to the peoples all, proclaimed and made known that the Christian morality is the morality "par excellence," and as long as there are vast numbers of people, sectarian as well as secular, within the United States, that believe, and, if required, can prove that they possess at least as good a morality as any that was as yet put up by the Christian people, so long will rational people, secular and sectarian, without wishing to reflect upon Christian morality, heartily indorse the demands of the Secular Union, that all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty; that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity, or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis, and whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

What is there so outrageously criminal in these demands of the Secular Union? They teach not one immoral idea, neither do they advocate one improper movement, nor do they disseminate in their platform one religious sentiment. Why, then, is the Ministers' Alliance so much exercised? Hav they not as good a right to promulgate their doctrins and views, even though they clash with those of some denominations, as has the Ministers' Alliance, or as has Mr. Varley or Mr. Moody? In the name of reason, justice, tolerance, American liberty, I ask: Why are they branded as a dangerous people, pounced upon with hatred, stigmatized as a society, and a state corrupting people? Theirs is a religion as much as any represented in the Ministers' Alliance, and entitled to equal respect. When you examin into the essence of real religion, it is questionable whether even the most orthodox sect is, in a moral sense, superior to theirs. If true religion means "to dive with a passionate charity into the darkest recesses of misery and of vice," to irrigate every quarter of the earth with the fertilizing stream of an almost boundless benevolence, and to include all the sections of humanity in the circle of an intense and efficacious sympathy; if true religion means to destroy or weaken the barriers which separate class from class, and sect from sect, and erect instead equality and fraternity among the human family, if this is true religion, then its home is not exclusivly with the sectarian peoples. It argues a weak platform as well as an intolerant spirit when terror and trembling and gnashing of teeth seize upon orthodox religious people ere yet the real work of the Secular Union has begun. I can see only good in their movement. The agitation comes upon the religious world like a storm, and like a storm it purifies the atmosphere from noxious influences, removes cumbersome excrescences, cleanses the soil from the poison-growth; the fragil, the corrupt, and the decaying are prostrated through its blasts, while the sturdy and strong endure and repel the onslaughts. The rationalistic spirit will do as much good to churches to-day as it did in the sixteenth century, and there is still much room for improvement in the theological conceptions. As to the Ministers' Alliance, it will be well for them to let the Secular Union alone. Their religious fervor can find ample scope for usefulness within their respectiv folds. Let them attend to their home trade in social demoralization and general wickedness, and they may hav occasion to say with Moses: "Wherefore hast thou laid the burden of all this people upon me? Their iniquity is too great; I am not able to bear this people alone, because its wickedness is too heavy for me."

Address by T. B. Wakeman

AT THE FUNERAL OF THERON C. LELAND.

Once more, my friends, yet once more the inevitable harvester, Death, has called us around the bier of one we loved and honored. Death the harvester, not Death the king of terrors, for this one we hav loved was one of the emancipated who had risen above the superstitions which make death the king of terrors. He was one who in a free and Liberal life had made his peace with all the world, with all its powers here and hereafter. To him no fate could presage anything but a reunion with the powers which had given him to us, a free, grateful, and blessed return to the mighty World from which he came, and from which we all are. Nothing marks the contrast more distinctly between the Liberal views which he entertained and those views of the past, which he had left, than this very difference in regard to the contemplation of death.

Of old death was the horror of horrors; the eternal penalty and punishment; death was the infinit calamity, the infinit terror, which no hope could ever assuage, no rite or ceremony could do more than to merely relieve. Our race began its religious worship as a worship of fear. The devil-worship pre ceded that of the gods. Down now through all the wails which hav culminated in the sound which reaches our ears from the neighboring church their object has been to avert, if possible, or at least to pacify, that terrible calamity which is the inevitable end of every individual life on earth, and which has always made it an inevitable tragedy. No religion has ever been able to really take away the fear of death—to say to death, "Where is thy sting?" to the grave, "Where is thy victory?" That was impossible until we had risen to a philosophy large enough to unite our individual existence by natural and normal law with the great order of the world which surrounds us, and to make our little individual life a natural part of some greater whole—a part of the infinitly grand and sublime history of the World and of Man. In so far as we hav been able to do that, death has ceased to be, what it always had been, a mere penalty and terror, always a disaster. We now come together under the reign of science, law, and humanity; in a word, under auspices which hav entirely changed the way in which we formerly looked upon the close of earthly life. Death is, therefore, no longer the king of terrors, but the necessary, the inevitable, and often, if not always, the beneficent harvester of nature. The sheaf of grain is our symbol. We entwine it with the myrtle, ever green, and with the flowers of hope. This is the saving and consoling truth in so far as we hav begun to develop in our own hearts that kingdom of heaven which is not only within you, but within all the hearts of the rational human world, uniting them together in one immense granary of the results of the human soul. Into that world our dead pass, not to decay, but to revive with renewed powers and to liv in and with humanity forever. The grave is not in the ground except for the body. The grave is replaced by a new spiritual world in the human soul, in your own heart, in which the soul of the departed is not only buried, but is consecrated to liv as a new power in each one who knew him, and in the whole world, who, through those who continue his power, receive the harvest and the beneficence of his life. Therefore, we sing no longer in fear and terror the old songs of death. We regard death with an entirely different feeling—a fear that we shall not properly appreciate its solemn lessons, and, first of all, that we shall hav no sufficient new spiritual world in our hearts in which properly to receive the new angelic life which has come as the conclusion of a useful earthly life. The great danger is that our hearts shall not be sufficiently enlarged, or our thoughts expanded so as to sense this new ideal kingdom of man on earth. To hav a heart in which to properly receive the dead is the greatest gift that man can hav when he stands in the face of death. Mankind has happily begun the development of this new view of life and of its final transition to other forms. The Liberal world is beginning it and growing in the effort to realize more and more this new kingdom of heaven, that new, ever-filling granary, that new spiritual realm, which is the blessed combination of human sympathies in worthy hearts and souls which fits them to worthily receive those who pass from us in the form of death. Therefore, my friends, it is rather a sign, in this age of the world, of a narrow, of a selfish heart, to indulge in inordinate grief over the death of our relativs or friends. That grief which has been hitherto appalling and overwhelming, often so violent as to dethrone the reason—all that is out of place—is illiberal. That feeling of utter loss and despair belongs to a past view of the world, which was one of terror and fear. Yet, in the new light, death is a terrible lesson. It is and always must be a solemn event, often, and indeed principally, because we are not risen high enough to judge it properly under the light of nature and humanity, and therefore are unable to meet the duties which it devolves upon us. We hav no spiritual granary fitted to receive properly the harvest and wealth of human lives which death is ever bringing home for us to assimilate and consecrate.

With these remarks, let us say that our brother, whose re mains lie before us, in a life ripe in years and full of works, has brought us a harvest wonderful and unique, which we now hav come to garner up and continue. We come not only out of respect for his memory, but out of gratitude for his life. We assemble to receive him into our hearts, to accept the blessed gifts which he has through years of toil brought to us, and to place them where they shall continue to grow, expand, and bear fruit for ages to come. This life was, in many respects, varied and unique, and in order to gather its harvest we are compelled to glance over his career from its early to its later years.

Our friend, Theron Chapman Leland, was born in 1821, in Cattaraugus county, New York—then mostly a wilderness. His family were of New England origin, on both sides boasting of clergymen for several generations, imbued with all the culture, virtue, thrift, and perseverance which characterized that old New England stock. A bright child, he scarcely knew, and could never remember, how he came to know how to read. His mother had taught him all that from the Bible, the hymn-book, and the one religious paper which, in those early days, reached the wilderness of the West—the Christian Advocate. A bright boy, there was no other employment open to him than to do the farm work and the work of the frontier, a life which then devolved on all the settlers in that part of the country. Yet there he showed that versatility, cheerfulness, and amiability of temperament which attracted the love of all.*

At about the time he reached his 21st or 22d year, our friend Leland accidentally hit upon an article in the then newly founded New York Tribune, written by Albert Brisbane, involving a grand scheme of social renovation, which had been propounded in France by Charles Fourier. Fourier died in 1837, and his works, thus falling under the notice of our friend, became his inspiration. He obtained every paper he could which treated of him. He became acquainted with the men who advocated the views of Fourier in this country.

* We omit for want of space facts in the early life of Mr. Leland, the substance of which appeared in last week's TRUTH SEEKER.—ED. T. S.

He changed the base of his life from one of doubt, of dissatisfaction, and of teaching merely as an occupation for a living, into that of an advocate, a satellite, if not a harbinger, of a great philosopher and of a great social revolution. Our friend has been unintelligible to the world, even to many of his dearest and best friends, because they never knew the underlying inspiration which sustained him, and never appreciated the high ultimate hope and ideal which led him on throughout his whole subsequent career. That sage, Fourier, became the fundamental power and reorganizer of his whole nature, giving him a hope and an occupation to which he was true to even his last breath. He will never understand our friend, nor the world in which he lived, who does not take into account the immense influence over his life and throughout the world of that singular and unique philosopher of France to whom we already owe so much, and to whom future generations, if I mistake not, will owe far more. Fourier started a new phase of life, a great wave in the social world, which has by no means spent its force. Upon his tomb he ordered to be engraved the two maxims which involved the substance of his philosophy: First, that "The series distribute the harmonies," and second, that "Attractions are proportional to destinies." Those sentences, dark as they seem, in their depth of meaning underlie all the movements of social regeneration which hav since been taken into the world. Consciously or unconsciously—but generally the latter—the philosophers since Fourier's time hav done little more than to try to realize and to make intelligible his aspirations embodied in those two fundamental principles which that great thinker, that prophetic heart, fell upon by intuition: The series distribute the harmoni s. What is there in Comte's Positiv Philosophy with all its wonderful elaboration, what is there in all modern science, but this attempt to discover, arrange, distribute, and synthesize the order and harmony of the world according to the series of its actual laws? Law is the master of the series and underlies and distributes the harmonies. Law, arranged in its series, is the explanation of all this mighty Cosmos around us. Let us only discover its harmonies and we are at peace with the world. Discover our place in those harmonies, and, as I hav said, even death becomes not so much a terror as a blessing. We who were estranged become a part of the world as our own home, our own life giver, and harmonious receiver at life's close.

Thus this new explanation of the world and of our human lot and fate struck our friend. That was a revelation, a religion, to him, and through all the duties of his after-life I never failed to see how, underlying them all, this faith in the harmonies of Fourier enabled him to receive and explain the new philosophies which hav come to the light in his day. He readily assimilated all as parts of the series of harmony. In heart and mind he was thus united with the Cosmos through its harmonies. He was fundamentally reconciled with the world. He needed no other redeemer. He had redeemed himself by making the world a part of himself. That was the first dream of Fourier which underlies the philosophy of our human age, not less important, as Fourier thought, than the discovery of Newton in astronomy. Nor less important to our friend was Fourier's intuition in so ology that Attractions must be proportional to destinies, and that destinies were simply the converse of attractions. All social philosophy has no other ultimate problem than to realize this higher aspiration of man. All the passions, the appetites of man, Fourier believed, would flower out healthy and beautiful, and harmonize, if under the proper arrangements they could hav the free play and development which make the flower to grow and bloom in beauty. To set all aspiration free became the flower of life. That dream that human nature, instead of being fundamentally totally depraved, is fundamentally healthy and right if it could hav the chance to develop itself in its fulness and its glory, is the one inspiration that underlies all the social philosophy of our time, as our friend felt and saw. Nor did he lose his heart and faith because social philosophers, and this particular philosopher who had become his teacher, hav failed because their special phalanx, system, or mode, in which they sought to realize their aspirations had failed. In this sense it is the fate of all social experiments and systems to fail. The law of evolution compels a failure of every special organization, and forces every philosophy to succumb to a higher synthesis. Unless societies did so succumb, unless all philosophers did thus fail, each permanent system instead of being a cradle would become a coffin. The spirit of growth which is the essence of evolution is constantly best illustrated in attempting to organize social systems which can never be fully realized. That is, the constant attempt becomes none other than a constant growth. So was it with Fourier, St. Simon, Owen, and Comte. Their labors can only be realized by incorporation in the race at large. Therefore our friend, instead of changing his fundamental views, sought to enlarge them, to add to them, and to make them the basis by which he could cooperate with all other phases of philosophy and religion in furthering the gospel of harmony. And thus, to begin with, he sought to incorporate them into his own life unique in its utility and inspiration. This is the key to his whole future.

The first result of his adoption of these views was that he sought to change his profession as a teacher into that of an exponent and illustrator of these views. He became a public lecturer, and taught the system and views of Fourier throughout western New York. He was one of those who helped to make the Rochester district to be widely known as the "volcanic district," the district in which reforms of every kind hav risen to disturb and finally to bless our whole country. He was one who planted the seed there quietly and unostentatiously, and yet through him largely the Fourier-movement in New York, Pennsylvania, and New England—for he was activ in all those parts of our country—became the seed-bed out of which all of the grand reforms and changes which hav taken place in our time hav been most forcibly sustained. As a teacher of this new philosophy he had, in that day a rare quality, the catholic spirit which saved him from being closely and fatally committed to any one of the phases of its realization. He saw the truth of the remark that I hav just made, that it would be impossible to attempt to realize the phalanstery under the environments in which he was placed. Practical details of much of that philosophy, the effect of which can only be seen in the far distant future, must, he saw, be left to that future; and yet that future, as an ideal, he knew would be the dominating power in orginating hope in the human heart and leading it upward and onward toward the realization of its ideal. And therefore he was willing to labor and to suffer during the rest of his life, that the whole world might some day become a great federal phalanstery of peoples and nations.

Turning from teaching as a business to that of a lecturer and advocate of this new sociology, he found that his material resources demanded a new profession. By singular but most fortunate accident, he met with the then new science and art which has developed into the art and craft of phonography, or writing by the sound of words instead of their letters; this soon became stenography, or the art of rapid writing and reporting. At Rochester he met with one of the first teachers of this new art, Augustus F. Boyle. Boyle had this social aspiration which Fourier had inspired. The two flamed together; they worked, taught, and traveled together.

Under the guiding genius of Stephen Pearl Andrews the art was placed upon a scientific basis and was established as a system of practical phonography and reporting now in common use, and indispensable in the legal and many other professions. Thence came teachers of the art like Burr, Parkhurst, and Underhill, all associates of our friend, and all social reformers. For it has not been noted as it should be that this art is a direct development of the harmonic philosophy and was in direct sympathy with the Fourier system of Socialism, and, I believe, without its inspiration would never hav achieved the success that it has. That idea of harmony in all nature was best illustrated at first by the harmony and contrasts in light and colors of which Newton had been the exponent. Out of the harmony and contrasts in articulate sounds, and ways of indicating them by lines and signs, arose a direct application of the fundamental principle of Fourier, and nearly all, so far as my knowledge extends, of the early teachers of phonography in this country were Fourierites or Socialists sympathizing with that movement. Certainly nearly all of those who first taught and practiced that art in this city were of that school of thought, and many of them are with us today.

Falling thus right in line with our friend's new social inspiration, he grasped upon this art as the future practical business of his life, and such he made it. He taught it and became an expert in its practice, for it was to him a congenial occupation.

He finally came to New York, and here practiced it associated with Mr. Boyle and Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews, who well illustrates the part that the students of Fourier had in originating this art. To him we owe the introduction of this art into our country, and only his unfortunate illness prevents him from being here to-day to testify his appreciation of Mr. Leland as his life-long and steadfast friend.

From his early coadjutors in this art, some of whom are present, I wish that a proper occasion would allow some testimony to his skill, and the great part that he had in making the art a practical, substantial reality among us. All his life, remember, whatever else he had been or became, he was first of all a craftsman in the phonographic art, proud of it, teaching it as a science, teaching it as something that would enable the human voice to become an exponent of the higher thoughts of man. It was a part of his philosophy of harmony which by no means stopped with the harmony of light or of sound. It became the glory and the hope of that philosophy represented particularly among us by Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews, that this conception of harmony would lead to continued and renewed discoveries in every domain of existence. Such discoveries Mr. Andrews fully believes that he has made, so that the whole universe has, by harmonies and analogies, been interpreted by his Universology, the grammar of the cosmos. In that work our friend Leland gloried. He had struck the same lead; his friend Andrews had followed it out to an extent as yet little known.

He was proud of the part his life had been able to play in the development of the great law of harmony, and his faith in its ultimate triumph was to him a sustaining power. It had fallen to him to be its exponent in one department only, but that only more and more opened his eyes to the vast consequences which must fall upon mankind when the same principle was extended until it became the explanation of the thought in the brain of man and of the remotest nebula that the telescope can bring to our sight. Thus our friend always had a good solid, hard bottom to his life. He had a faith and a religion which nothing ever overthrew and which he was very far, however, from exposing to unsympathetic auditors. He cared not to talk of it to people who had become indurated. Like Fourier, he was of a delicate, sensitiv temperament, and though graceful, affable, and pleasing in his manners, he would not talk on his serious topics if he could avoid it; a pleasant punning wit was his defense against pachyderms; but his best friends knew and felt that he had a mooring in the Infinit, that he had dropped his anchor beyond the sight of ordinary mortals, and that he had an inexpugnable faith that that anchor would hold him fast and true through this life and every form of life that might come.

From this feeling it came that he avoided the exposition of his ultimate views. Thus in regard to immortality he was reticent; but he entertained Fourier's belief that this life of ours was simply a dream, not rounded by an eternal sleep, but rounded by an eternal day. The theory of Fourier seemed to be that all the world was an infinit plenum, an infinit fulness, an infinit good; that our soul and our little life is but a dream of consciousness, lasting for a short time and then breaking up into an infinit light and intelligence. Therefore, when our Spiritual friends sought to bring to him the new methods of reaching a spiritual world by manifestations, our friend Leland would simply smile just as the Swedenborgian is accustomed to smile at our modern Spiritual phenomena, as trivial. They had an aristocracy of Spiritualism, and could say to phenomenalists, "Ye are but toying with what we hav felt roll over our souls in infinit torrents years and years ago."

Whether we adopt his view or not, it is needful, to understand it, to understand our friend and the large numbers who are of the same faith. Infinit light was and is the infinit world in its infinit power, and our little day-dream can only end in absorption, and return to the infinit power that produced us, which is "spiritual" for want of a better name. Such faith in our friend made him Liberal; it emancipated him from the old theologies thoroughly. He had never the slightest word to say about them other than to make them the subject of kindly remark, or, if forced upon him, of a kindly sarcasm. It kept him aloof from modern Spiritualism. It saved him from all theology. He needed it not. His real faith gave his heart to this world as a part of an infinit whole, having a reality knowable in this life, and which was typical of infinit harmonies. Therefore, he was a practical man in developing the freedom, aspirations, and welfare of mankind. He was willing to work with the Materialists, so called, and with every phase of social regeneration. He was ready to giv his hand and heart to everything which could make this grand fact of Humanity on earth a solid continuance illustrativ of the mighty power which he believed lay behind it in the infinit. That was the feeling with which he was firmly inspired, and no light joke, which was often his method of turning away what was sometimes forced upon him irreverently, as he would feel it, should ever be regarded as other than the ripple on the surface of a soul whose depth had reached the Infinit.

Now let us gather the next sheaf in this harvest of his life. After he had become proficient as a teacher of sociology and phonography, the great slavery question arose. How should its terrible limitations, by which social harmony and freedom were obstructed, be removed? The first application of his philosophy was to this subject of American slavery. Our friend, applying the philosophy of the great teacher of France, said that of all the iniquities of the world this attempt to destroy social harmony and the development of a whole people, because we hav the power to subject them to our own greed and lust, was the most iniquitous. He therefore entered heart and soul into the antislavery movement. And let me say that this same social philosophy and sentiment inspired by Fourier led a large part of the activ antislavery element in this country to take part in that movement. Without Fourier it is by no means certain that American slavery would be a thing of the past to-day. To a great extent that movement was founded on Fourier's inspiration. That, together with the inner light of the Society of Friends and the love of liberty of the few Liberals or so-called Infidels in this country, were the three elements of the original irrepressible hostility to slavery, and the greatest of these elements was the soul of Fourier.

Such friends of liberty as acted with our deceased friend show this at once. There were Horace Greeley, Ripley, Dana, Godwin, Pillsbury, Brisbane, Garrison, Wright, and our own late prophet Emerson, together with many distinguished and devoted ladies—friends of our friend—like Amy Post, Lucy Colman, Lucretia Mott. Most, if not all, of these had directly or indirectly received their spirit largely from the teachings of the one who had been his teacher, the great soul who taught the freedom and harmony of life as his ultimate ideal. Without them I do not believe that that great slavery movement could ever hav been initiated or ever achieved success. The disciples of Fourier could not realize in special form their ideal phalanx, but they had in them the spirit that in the ultimate end will make this country, and let us hope the whole world, one grand phalanx of social harmony, realizing practically more of happiness than ever yet has been dreamed by man in his mirage-heaven above. That anti-slavery movement made our friend a practical politician. From being an antislavery lecturer and advocate, he became a stanch Republican, and aided in the formation of that party. Even before that, when the liberty party was started in this state, under such men as Myron Holley, from that "volcanic district of Rochester," aided by Elizur Wright, that Nestor of Liberals, now still happily surviving among us, he was with them, and when that movement enlarged to make the Republican party he was there with the friends of liberty reporting their speeches and urging on the movement. Finally, Lincoln took the chair of state at Washington and the dream of the slave power began to wane forever. Then he stood firmly by Lincoln throughout all that trying period of war, declaring that unless our federal government could be sustained, the ideal, the hope of a union of mankind in the grand republic of peoples securing harmony and liberty, would fail forever.

Next he took part in this city in the administration of Republican government by the Republican party. He became the reporter, and even the adviser, of our party leaders, because often those who had brought him into their councils to report their speeches found that he could report a wiser speech than the one made. He became the confidant of those who held power. For years he was in our custom house as one of those trusted and honored mainstays whose advice was sought. During a long vacancy in the collectorship of this port, he was practically the collector—for a year or more—without the salary, without ostentation, without any pretense whatever. He received a recognition of that fact, however, from the government, which showed that for once republics were not wholly ungrateful.

When the war was over, then came the question, What next? Whither would his reforming instinct lead him? He could, as a politician, easily hav taken care of himself. He could hav sought a life of ease, if he had not had within his breast still burning that fire which was kindled in his youth by the works of Fourier. We should hav heard no more of him than of the hundred of other reformers and politicians who passed from public sight when the great conflict was over. Not so with him. It seemed to him to enlarge the horizon of his utility and of his aspiration and labor. He said, "This emancipation of the colored people is grand; this establishment of the federal republic as the model of the world as it ultimately must be, is, indeed, a crowning glory of our century. But there is more to be done. What still hindered the development of those divine social harmonies that Fourier had predicted? He saw, he felt, he spoke. It was the slavery of the human soul, bound down by the religious dogmas of the past, and he said, "Never will I take my rest, never my ease, till these chains which bind the souls of my fellow-men are broken, as far as it shall be within my power to break them." He voluntarily left the party of which he was fast becoming one of the leaders. He came among us Liberals, then the despised, the slandered, the ignominious, but the handful of true reformers, no small part of the invincible phalanx that has in the past broken the slaves' chains, and which is now growing strong to break the chains of the victims of ignorance, superstition, and bigotry. He came here, and took his place as one of the trustees of our club. He became activ in the American National Liberal League. He, unwillingly at first—not from want of interest, but from want of the feeling that he could successfully address public audiences—wished to take a retired and quiet place, but he was called to the front. He became the business leader of the National Liberal League. Its secretary was really its principal officer. He became the reorganizer of Liberalism, and, but for one untoward event, he would, by his talent for organization, hav put that League forward where it will not reach for at least a decade. That untoward event, you remember, was the unfortunate difference which arose among Liberals in regard to Comstockism, or certain laws, state and national, in regard to what should or should not pass through the mails. How easy it would hav been for him to hav taken the popular, the illiberal side! How readily powerful friends would hav extended their hands as to one who had done well, if he had done what those wished who maintain an unjust and dangerous sectarian power which they are always able to cover by the specious pretense of a higher morality. But no; he all the way through took the position that our government must be purely secular, and that no laws should be enacted or enforced under the influence and pay of churches, or of societies inspired by them.

In the end this secular principle will be triumphant, and this system of amateur unsecular government which for a while placed Liberals under a shadow will giv way, and the true light and principle which our friend maintained will be founded and sustained as the only one fit or possible in a democratic republic. But the false cry of our opponents made the Liberal movement unpopular; it made him unpopular; it lost him many friends, even Liberal friends who were not able to see clearly, or who lacked courage to stand up bravely to the issue, which they can never escape till they make it the basis of their victory—for it is their vital principle.

Therefore, in many respects, his attempt to organize the Liberal movement did not result in fruits that he and we had hoped. But he never despaired nor regretted the effort, for back of him and within him lay that great inspiration which nothing could daunt. He never lost heart, but worked on faithfully to the end, and though apparent failure for the moment seemed to be sure, he worked and lived in the belief that the final result would be that the Liberal movement would become stronger than ever and finally be the great regenerativ movement of the country, the chief bulwark in the defense of liberty. The future of the Liberal cause will be the continuation of the soul of our friend, as it will be the continuation of the souls of others, some of whom hav been carried to their graves from this hall, and whose lives and inspirations are the great moral capital which lies back of that movement, and which will compel its success.

Thus, my friends, for sixty-four years this man struggled, worked, and lived—graceful, pleasant, and affable, the idol of his family, his children doting upon him, his whole environment being one radiated by his personal existence. He has lived among us and borne aloft the lamp of truth and hope. Thus for years he has been our main stay and our quiet and safe adviser. He has laid in our hands, as the last gift he could bestow, the clues of future progress, with the injunction that we follow them up, until the discordant labyrinth of nature shall be unraveled and the social harmonies which echoed through his heart shall be realized. We come here ostensibly to honor him, to express our sympathy. He lies here to enjoin upon us a higher duty. He says, "As I sought the harmonies of the world, you feel them and realize them. As I worked that the slave might be free, as I taught from city and village the harmony of social life, I place in your hands as a trust the clue which shall lead to the realization of that wondrous haven of hope. As I struggled that the minds of men and women might at last be free from the slavery of dogma, from the authority of the past blind generations; as I labored that light might beam in upon human souls, so that the infinit harmonies around us may be reflected in them, take up that line of battle, and make it the line of victory!"

We hav, all of us, loved our friends, our neighbors, but the higher harmony expands a love of the human heart to all who are a part of the human form. Beautifully was he accustomed to illustrate that none were so low, none so fallen, but that in his nature they had a friend indeed. When the prejudice of caste made the man and woman of color an outcast in the community, Leland purposely made himself their friend and teacher. He came and gathered them into classes, he taught them his art, often without remuneration. He would do this simply because they were then the lost children of humanity, and he would insist that they should be reclaimed, and even to his later days his sympathy with that people was so great that he was never more pleased than when he had some of them around him as his assistants or as his pupils. So was it ever with the outcast or tramp of either sex: his kindness to them and efforts in their behalf were only limited by his time and means. Never hav I seen him exhibit one single particle of that limitation which said, "I am holier than thou." This man had in him a heart which was really a brother heart of the ideal Christ, and that sympathy I had occasion to see illustrated from day to day. For three years I worked with him in this Liberal work and in other work, calling us in constant contact under circumstances of almost unequaled anxiety and irritation. Never hav I seen him yield for a moment to anything but a slight vexation that some humorous witticism would relieve. He had that in his soul, that ideal hope, that love of humanity, which was a bank that always paid the drafts which the exigencies of the present made upon him. His genial manner, his gracefulness, his beauty, hav made me often feel that although far older than I in years, he was the younger of the two. It seems to me now as though the graceful and the beautiful had fallen away from my sight forever.

Thus I come here with you to honor him, and to gather up the inspiration with which he ennobled and honored us. We can never do anything better than to enlarge our hearts so as to receive the beneficence which such a life should send abroad through us; we can never realize the kingdom of heaven within us until we can make it up of the results of such lives which hav been spent to realize it. We shall never find any kingdom of heaven more real than that which the dead thus gathered make in our own hearts. We never shall learn to feel that even death may be blessed until we know how to feel and appreciate the harvest which it brings. Instead of its being the king of terrors, we shall regard it as the angel who reaps for us and conserves in the granary of Humanity all of the priceless treasures which make our lives worth living, or the human soul worthy of being preserved.

Let us say to the family, relativs, and immediate friends of the deceased, let the bitterness of your grief be sweetened by our tenderest sympathy and those higher considerations which lift us above personal feelings. Death is the condition of a higher life. Therefore hav we come here, and it is well. Our grief has been assuaged as we recall what we hav received for the temporary loss of his personal intercourse. Our spirits are enlarged by the new soul which has gone into them. Our lives are broadened and ennobled as the great purpose of realizing his ideals has fallen upon our shoulders. We consecrate these remains to the Mother Earth whence they came; we say to his mourning brothers, "Rise up, commit this mortal form to its kindred dust." But we shall consecrate and take with us the soul of this man by taking it into our own souls as a part of them and making it liv, through the powers that are in us, until all that mighty dream of his shall be more and more realized throughout the depths of the ages. We are here for that; consecrating his memory in order that we may be consecrated to the realization of the great hope and ideal of his life. Therefore we say to his remains, "Farewell;" therefore we say to his soul, "All hail, brother, thou hast become a part of us and through us a part of life evermore."

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged to speak in St. John grove at Cedar Falls, Iowa, Sunday, June 28th. Address him at Lake City, Minn.

THE Hot Springs, Ark., Daily News notes the arrival in its town of Dr. Joseph Simms, author of "Physiognomy," who intends spending some time there while engaged in the preparation of a new book. The doctor spent the past winter in Australia lecturing and gathering items for his future use in his work.

E. C. WALKER lectured at Hooper, Neb., June 1st, and at Scribner, Neb., June 2d. He desires to spend the next four months in Dakota, Minnesota, and Iowa, but will go into Wisconsin, Michigan, or Illinois if lectures are desired. For the present address him at Sioux City, Ia. Permanent address, Valley Falls, Kan.

THE lecture of Helen H. Gardener before the Philadelphia League affords the Wheeling Intelligencer the opportunity to be very much shocked that a woman should publicly declare her unbelief in the Bible. That her opinions should be at variance with those of St. Paul and St. Peter the Intelligencer considers astounding. The Intelligencer is a very well-preserved fossil; but half a century ago its remarks would hav been considerably less anachronistic.

WE hav received the following from A. W. Zoellner, of Jarbalo, Kan.: Rev. D. J. Moulden, of this place, challenged J. L. Andrew to debate the following question with him, "Resolved, That true science is in harmony with the teachings of the Bible." The Rev. Moulden is a member and preacher of the seventh day Advent doctrin, but he is not well-informed on scientific subjects. The debate commenced Saturday evening, May 30th, and ended Sunday afternoon, May 31st. The school-house was crowded from the commencement; all the members of the Advent and other churches siding strongly with Mr. Moulden, while the more Liberal class of people sided with Mr. Andrews, and both parties claim the victory. There were, however, a number of questions which Mr. Moulden failed to answer. The miraculous conception of Christ, the history of a universal Noachian deluge, the story of Jonah living three days within the whale, the story of dead men coming to life, these, and many other questions, cannot be answered from a scientific standpoint, and such teachings and beliefs in the supernatural are not admitted by science. True science sees in all things the operation of natural law, and cannot accept as evidence anything outside of a natural process; as science does not admit of miracles and sees no evidence of a power aside from nature, it follows that the teachings of the Bible are not in harmony with science.

Suggestions from the Executiv Committee of the League.

As far as is in my power I shall zealously act in concert with you and the entire committee to consummate the aims and ends suggested in your open letter. Priestcraft has too long been astride of the people, and by stolen marches has found its way into thousands of controling positions in the political arena of our government, as well as all other parts of the world.

First, Let us hav the enforcement of the Nine Demands.

Second, I would gladly see the Tenth Demand added, the Enfranchisment of Women.

Third, I think it is impossible for us to accomplish important results in organizing an independent political party and placing fully pledged candidates in the field for several years to come. Therefore, I would suggest that we let the two great opposing parties nominate, and immediately thereafter hold a convention and indorse one or the other, publishing to the world that we are a solid unit, and that we hold the balance of power in our votes; vibrating from time to time as we please, always, however, supporting the greatest Secular expression.

Fourth, Change name of the League to The American Secular Union.

Fifth, Keep the Tent movement going. I will drop in a few dimes for it shortly.

Sixth, Increase the Campaign Fund. I will soon add my mite.

Charming Dale, Arizona. S. C. ROGERS.

[We hope our member from Arizona will correspond with the member from Utah (Wm. Reynolds) and a good efficient lecturer be sustained in the territories. C. B. R.]

The Tent.

The work is making steady progress. We are gaining each evening in attendance, and awakening a real interest, many of our audience being regular attendants and taking notes of the lectures.

We hav distributed over one hundred copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and only given them where there was a real desire to read manifest. We find more people become interested, and are awake to the duty of investigation and doing their own thinking by reading copies of the Liberal papers than by any other means.

To those interested we hav supplied a goodly number of copies of Paine's "Age of Reason," "Bible Inquirers," Remsburg's "False Claims" and "Bible Morals." These books take the lead in our propaganda work.

We expect next Sunday to organize those who hav become interested as the Kalamazoo Secular Union.

We hav suffered from severe cold, which over-taxing our strength greatly aggravated. But we are on the gain, cheered and sustained by assurances of support and sympathy from all sections. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Kalamazoo, Mich., June 8, 285.

TESTIMONY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: C. B. Reynolds with his tent located in this city is doing yeoman service for Liberalism and humanity. In the ranks of Freethought he fills a niche that no other can. Last Sunday afternoon he lectured on "Why I left the Pulpit," and it was a brilliant affair, delineating the steps of an honest man out from the deadly miasma of theology into the broad, clear light of Freethought, and, in speaking of the unselfish, undeterred course of E. H. Gault in placing before him such reading matter as led him to think for himself, he gave great encouragement for Liberals to do missionary work. And Sunday night in a lecture showing no biblical authority for keeping the first day as Sabbath, he struck the so-called "Law and Order League," in this place, a blow full in the face, as they need, for trying to curtail the rights of men. Space or time will not allow an extended notice of his lectures, but I want to add that all Liberals should see to it that such men as Reynolds should hav such a generous support as will keep them entirely in the field.

I wish to add a word in regard to the suspension of the Labor Advocate for the benefit of the Liberals in southern Illinois. I carried the office at my own expense without a particle of remuneration from the commencement until the paper stopped, and I could still hav carried it on to the end of the six months, but receiving proof that a part of the stockholders were not willing to turn over their stock, and thus carry out their part of the contract, I had to suspend. Liberals of southern Illinois, you may hav lost a moiety by my suspension, but I hav lost everything. I save not even my clothes, and if in the future I become able, I will pay every cent I owe, but if I am not I can't help it.

Kalamazoo, Mich., June 10, 1885. ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

THAT the Secular Union of Kansas City is doing good needs no better evidence than is shown by the report taken from a Kansas City paper of Rabbi Krauskopf's speech in support of the Nine Demands. We urge our friends everywhere to circulate this speech as a campaign document.

The Palace of Guise.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Why do not the reverend Socialist, Rylance, and the reverend reformer, Da Costa, who are crying over the ills of the poor workingman, and trying to get them into Episcopal chapels where they can be told that the wages of their sin is death—why do not they, instead of this, go to work on the rich men of their congregations and get them to "moralize their wealth" and found a few institutions like Godin's? Did you ever read the story of the Palace of Guise, as told by Marie Howland? Here it is. Print it, and let the rich hav an opportunity of knowing how easy it would be, if they were in earnest, to make a heaven of this earth:

THE SOCIAL PALACE.

Mr. Godin, the founder of the Social Palace of Guise, in France, seems to hav had a marvelous insight into the wants of the people when he organized the social life in that magnificent home which his humanity led him to build for his workmen and their families. He reasons in his book, thus:

To know what the poor should hav, we hav only to see what those who hav riches invariably supply for themselvs, for mankind is one in all essential needs.

The rich build themselvs palaces with spacious grounds and gardens to delight their leisure hours.

Very well; the poor should hav their palaces with spacious grounds and gardens to delight their leisure hours.

The rich hav separate rooms for sleeping, for dining, for cooking, for washing, etc.

Very well; the poor must hav all these.

The rich do not drag out the lives of their women with the never-ceasing nursing of children. They hav nurseries and nurses whose special function is to see that the children are well cared for and happy.

Very well; the poor must hav their nursery where the needs of children can be better supplied than in the family rooms.

The rich hav fine schools for their children where the best teachers are engaged and every means taken to secure them a good education.

Very well; the poor must hav fine schools, the best teachers, and every means to develop all the forces of their children.

The rich hav leisure to study and for social entertainment. They hav libraries and works of art. They hav baths every day, comfortable and becoming attire for all seasons, and a generous supply of good and wholesome food.

Very well, the poor must not be obliged to work all the hours of the day. They must hav leisure for study and for social intercourse. They must hav libraries and works of art. They must hav baths every day, comfortable and becoming attire for all seasons, and a generous supply of good and wholesome food.

And so Mr. Godin goes on showing that all which wealth and industry can obtain should be at the disposal of those who do the world's work. This logic was the inspiration of the grandest enterprise of the century, the Social Palace at Guise.

This Palace stands just over the river Oise, opposit the city of Guise, and has been in successful operation over ten years. It is adapted to accommodate nearly fifteen hundred people. He is a noble and generous man, a day laborer himself during his younger years. He would gladly hav his workmen own the Social Palace, but through trouble with his heirs, and especially through the laws of France, he has not been able so far to accomplish this.

There is the same trouble in this country. The law does not recognize the responsibility of ownership except in the individual. An associativ establishment must be controled by one or two trustees, or what not, whom the law regards in the light of owners of the whole. But to return to the Social Palace. It is a magnificent structure, surrounded by fields and groves and gardens, through which winds the picturesque river of Oise. The great iron manufactory is at a little distance. The palace consists of three quadrangles, each one having its interior court, with an immense roof of glass. These quadrangles join, and corridors on each of the floors permit free communication. Around the interior courts, under the glass roofs on each story, run corridors, protected by strong iron balustrades, and to these the apartments open. The walls are very high, studded and elegantly "hard finished;" the windows are large, and open in every suite of apartments on the court, also on the outside of the palace. A steam engin forces the water from distant living springs on to every floor of the building, and on the roof of the principal one is a great reservoir of this water. This reservoir is connected with hydrants in the courts, and on warm days the courts, the walls, the balconies, and even the great roofs themselvs are thoroughly sprinkled, thus rendering the air cool and sweet. The floors of the balconies being of tiles, the water can do no harm.

The ventilation of the palace is on a new plan. So far as I know, it is the only building in the world that can be called perfectly ventilated. This is effected by immense subterranean galleries opening north some distance from the palace. These galleries run all around the cellars and under the courts, and the fresh air passes through them into the courts and up through interior passages in the walls that open by register into every apartment. It is the design of Mr. Godin to put hot air furnaces in these passages and thus warm the palace at the same time it is ventilated; about the time his book was written (1871) this had not yet been accomplished.

The ground story of the palace is used for shops of all kinds. Everything that families or individuals can want is there supplied without going into the open air, and at a moderate advance upon the cost. Mr. Godin has suffered untold persecution through the merchants of Guise, who considered him an enemy to their profits.

The adjuncts of the palace are the school building, with the nursery on the first floor, and connected with one of the quadrangles by a covered corridor, so that all the little and big children can attend without umbrellas or overshoes, whatever be the state of the weather; the theater, a very beautiful, ornate building, with a fine auditorium, stage, stage wardrobe, and all modern appointments for theatrical representations; a restaurant, a bakery, a cafe, a billiard room, and a reading room; swimming baths; a fine steam laundry with the best modern improvements; stables and carriage houses; and an abattoir (slaughter-house). These are the adjuncts of this splendid workingman's home. The management is under control of two councils of twelve, one of men, the other of women, which unite in deliberation whenever necessary. The councils are elected by universal suffrage. Citizen means person in the Social Palace, and no certificate of sex is required in the elections. All vote who are over sixteen years of age, and younger than that, even, if they are able to support themselvs by their industry. Mr. Godin says this may not be considered wise by many people, but it works admirably. There is a reason for this. The children, even in the lowest classes of the school, understand well the simple system of democratic government that prevails. They elect by ballot their little industrial chiefs, who lead them forth into the gardens on fine days, where, supplied with their implements, they carry out the instructions received by their chiefs from the head gardener. For this they receive a certain amount of money; and Mr. Godin says these little chiefs are exceedingly anxious to fill their office so well that they may gain the approbation of their constituents. From what Mr. Godin says it is evident that the young generation growing up in the Social Palace use the words ballot, election, constituents, candidate, etc., with the same comprehension that they do doll or hopscotch; so when they come to vote for officers controling higher departments they understand that they are dealing with different features in the problem of which they hav studied the first principles already.

The law, "attractions are proportional to destinies," is fully recognized in the Social Palace. The woman council can discuss any part of the management, but it is found that they naturally gravitate toward the domestic department, the nursery, the schools, the laundry, and they oversee and report upon the quality of the supplies.

"There is but one law in the Social Palace, and that is liberty," says Mr. Godin. Any woman can do all her cooking and washing in her apartments; she can keep her babies there all the time or a part of the time, and the rest in the nursery, just as she pleases. There is only one thing obligatory, and that is that the children must be kept at school. It is hardly necessary to add that there is a remarkable unanimity of sentiment among the women relativ to the advantages of the laundry, the nursery, and the great cuisine or kitchen. This last supplies a constant demand for hot soups, roasts, made dishes, vegetables, and everything necessary for the simple or the elaborate repast. As the women are free from nursing and cooking cares, they take various positions in the industries, schools, shops, laundry, etc. Over seventy are thus engaged on regular salaries. These women, coming in at noon and meeting their children from the schools and their husbands from their work, send to the great cuisine and order whatever they want, all hot and perfectly cooked, and at a cost which is but a very slight advance upon the actual cost of the articles, and thus an excellent dinner is quickly served without the loss of time, or incurring the trouble of making and preparing it. Wines, being purchased in great quantities directly from the producers, are furnished cheap and pure to the members of the Social Palace.

Of the internal order of this residence of over a thousand people one comment alone is sufficient: there has not been one single police case in the Social Palace since its foundation; and as the courts are lighted with gas all night, the opportunity for the operations of burglars is reduced to a minimum.

Education in the schools embraces a wide range of scientific and practical drill. In the lower classes the Froebel exercises constitute an important part. What are Froebel exercises? many readers will ask. This is most easily explained by an imaginary tableau. You enter a large room, where you see from eighty to a hundred children seated at an immense long table, a plank on trestles that can be easily put in its place when wanted. Small cabinets are brought and placed upon this table, and from numerous drawers are produced miniature boards, blocks, posts, sticks, plastic clay, and many other objects, and with these the children commence to construct houses, villages, fences, balconies, furniture, stationery, etc. You think they are playing with toys. So they are; but they are pursuing a method, and their play is constructiv play. Some of them show remarkable invention and skill, stimulated by friendly emulation and the natural love of beautiful forms; and to all it is a rare culture of the mind, at the same time it trains the muscles in skilful and exact manipulation. When the exercise is finished the same little hands replace every object in its allotted place in the cabinet, and thus the whole ends with a lesson in method and order.

All the educational advantages are free, and in the nursery and pouponnat (the poupons are the little tots from the age when they can walk well up to about four or five years, when they enter the bombinat or lowest department of the school proper) food of the best kind and prepared in the most proper manner is supplied. Parents take the poupans home for the night, and the nurselings also, if they desire it. The mother can leave her babe in the nursery all or part of the time, go and nurse it from her breast at intervals, or keep it wholly in her own department, just as she pleases. Freedom reigns everywhere. Women volunteer as nurses, or are chosen for known capacity, and though mothers at first thought they could not leave their infants out of sight, they soon learned to be grateful for the nursery, because the babies themselvs fretted at home and were cross until they were taken back among their peers. The nursery is kept as sweet as a rose garden, the youngest babies go to bed without crying and without rocking. Strangers hav freely testified to this. They hav toys of all kinds, and from the broad balcony of the nursery on fine days they watch the parrots and gay birds in the aviary, and are taken into the grounds and gardens to frolic and roll on the lawns. There are magnificent hot and cold and shower and swimming baths for all. One of the latter has a floor that is brought up nearly to the surface of the water, so that the very smallest children may disport themselvs with entire safety.

In the palace there is a medical department where two physicians and a midwife are in constant attendance, and all surgical and nursing paraphernalia are at the service of the sick. Whenever a workman is ill, he draws a daily amount from the sick fund for the support of his family, and if he dies his children are adopted and trained up to a useful, industrious career.

In the schools there are many prizes. Those who take high rank for politeness and grace of bearing are rewarded by being admitted to the dramatic society —a much-coveted honor. Music, both vocal and instrumental, is taught thoroughly. In May and September there are two great festivals, one to the children and the other in honor of labor. On those occasions the vast court of the great quadrangle is decorated from base to dome with garlands of flowers, banners and trophies of labor, physical or intellectual, and there, amid thousands of spectators that pour in from miles around, filling the tiers of galleries that extend all around the court, prizes are distributed, speeches are made, and when this is over, the corps of firemen in gay uniforms transform the scene with magical quickness into a magnificent ball room, where, under the brilliant gas, and to the sound of the Social Palace bands of music, happy feet "tread to the measures of the dance" until far into the night.

For all these advantages of comfort, education, and culture the inhabitants pay simply their rent, which is about the same others pay for their crowded, inconvenient accommodations; and for all this, be it said for the benefit of narrow-minded capitalists, the enterprise pays six per cent on the money invested. Capitalists can make more by the ordinary tenement system, to be sure, but the result of their cupidity will be—what their worst fears anticipate. Let them learn a lesson before it is too late."

This is an enterprise which in magnificence of conception, in nobleness and comprehensivness of aims, and in triumphant achievements, stands in the world without a parallel, and should receive the heartfelt plaudits of universal man.

Where is the American Godin who will launch such a magnificent enterprise upon the shores of this new world, to be "like a city set upon a hill," the admiration of all nations, and an example for them to follow? Thanks, ten thousand thanks, in the name of humanity, to Mr. Godin for his glorious example.

There you hav a plan, Messrs. Rylance and Da Costa, by which you can turn the surplus wealth of the fair-minded of your congregations into practical, useful channels. No souphouses in this, no giving of cast-off clothes, but a straight-out business enterprise where the laborers earn what they get, and get somewhere near what they earn. Preach this doctrin of helpfulness, O reverend seigneurs, if your sympathy for the workingmen is more than pocket-book deep. MOX.

A Pious Fraud.

From the Chicago Express.

[A friend sends us the following on Greenbackism, with the request that it be reprinted:]

The literary thief and Shylock lickspittle, the Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, in a tirade against the "85 cent" silver dollar says:

"Here is my friend, Mr. Jones, who sells merchandise and groceries, and here am I. He sees me coming with silver dollars, what does he do? He raises the price of his groceries and his merchandise rather more than 15 per cent, and when I reach his salesroom, my dollar has shrunken to eighty-five cents.

"How is it that we do not see that the poor, the extremely indigent, who must pay high prices for food, in parcels, are injured by all inflations in currency?"

When a preacher of the gospel sinks so low as to become a "capper" for money gamblers, and offers himself "To Let" to the best paying band of robbers that will accept his service, without rebuke from his professional colleagues, it is time for the people to prospect for a route to heaven other than through the church. Mr. Cook knew he lied when he charged that a merchant will not take a silver dollar in payment for a hundred cents' worth of goods.

He lied when he said that the poor were injured by "all inflation of currency." All expansions of the currency hav brought relief to the poor.

All contractions of the currency hav brought poverty, want, and wretchedness to the people.

Speaking of the cause of the Dark Ages the Congressional Monetary Commission say:

"The crumbling of institutions kept even pace with the shrinkage in the stock of money and falling prices. The disasters of the Dark Ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices, and the recovery therefrom, and the comparativ prosperity which followed, were due to an increasing supply of money."

David Hume, Alexander Hamilton, Ernest Said, Leon Fanchet, M. Rowland, in fact every prominent writer on money and political economy, concur in the one axiomatic fact that with the increase, or "inflation," if Mr. Cook pleases, of money:

"Everything takes a new face. Labor and industry gain life. The merchant becomes more enterprising, the manufacturer more diligent and skilful, and even the farmer follows his plow with greater alacrity and attention."

A few years ago, when there were no Greenback sentinels on guard to sound the alarm, Mr. Cook might hav forced his quackery down the public throat, but he cannot now. It is all labeled poison, and although bribed official nurses might be glad to deceive the people, they dare not attempt to enforce a treatment branded with death's-heads and cross-bones.

Our Blessed Religion.

"In 1861 our navy consisted of 34 old wooden war steamers, 48 old wooden sailing war vessels, or 82 old wooden vessels altogether. In a little over three years' time it was increased to 836 vessels, of which 63 were ironclads and 102 unarmored cruisers. The owners of our private iron steamship yards contributed a fleet of 165 monitors, ironclads, and unarmored iron cruisers. This was the first ironclad fleet in the world, and was copied by all maritime nations. If need be, our builders can again put a fleet of vessels afloat that other nations will be glad to copy."

I cut the above paragraph from a religious paper, in which it is given simply as an item of news, without a word against war or about the cost of all these vessels, which is ground out of the muscles and sinews of toiling men and women who earn all that the government squanders, and by incessant toil are hardly able to keep their families from starving. And this nation, with all these war vessels and implements of human destruction, professes to be a Christian nation, worshiping a God of love, and pretending to be inspired and guided by a Prince of Peace—a nation with a church on almost every hill, all costing hundreds of millions, and untaxed, with eighty thousands of priests, all pretending to preach a gospel of peace, and though they hav been preaching eighteen hundred years, cannot now show one nation, state, county, or town in the universe that practices the peace principles they pretend to believe.

No wonder sensible people are fleeing from such churches as from burning buildings; no wonder that the very rabble in the gutters and slums scoff at such religion; no wonder that all sensible men and women want such a religion buried out of sight, as it will be in a generation or two from this time.

Liberal Fourth of July Celebrations.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As an American citizen, I hav always felt that if there is one day above all others which should be celebrated by our people without regard to political lines or religious differences, that day is the Fourth of July. But I hav not had the pleasure of attending such a celebration, with the exception of two far apart instances, in twenty years. As a rule, Christians, and frequently preachers, are put to the front, who improve the occasion to claim that civilization belongs to Christianity, that law is founded on the Bible, and this republic was established by Puritans, while we know that civilization is older than Christianity, law more ancient than the Bible, and our nation was established by such Freethinking apostles as Thomas Paine, who are rarely mentioned, and then generally with a passing curse, by the Christian Fourth of July orator.

Is it not about time all this were changed? Why should not Liberals, all over the country, engage all their speakers, at different points, on that day, and procure home talent besides, to tell the people the true history of American Independence?

I stand ready, for one, to accept an engagement by Liberals to deliver my Fourth of July oration, "The Dangers that Threaten American Liberty!"

Let us hav the truth—even on the Fourth of July.

Current Events.

C. L. Wilcox says, in criticising me regarding Prohibition, "I will never advocate the building up of a business in which I would not engage." Mr. Wilcox, hav I advocated the building up of the business of liquor-selling? Do you advocate the business of preaching when you plead for the equal rights of all creedists to build churches and employ ministers? Is there no middle ground between building up that which you do not like, and tearing it down by brute force? As to the religious belief of those engaged in the liquor business, what has that to do with the principle of prohibition? Judging from his remarks upon this point, I am led to infer that Mr. Wilcox finds in the fact that most saloon keepers are Christians an additional incentiv for enforcing prohibition. How nobly tolerant!

Would it not be a good idea for the Truth Seeker Company to bring out in one volume the articles of Spencer, Harrison, Andrews, and Wakeman? I am quite sure that it would sell well. It would be a valuable work and much good could be accomplished by its extensiv dissemination.

Few Liberals realize the dangers that threaten religious and moral liberty through the operations of the National Reform Association and its allied societies. Earnest, activ, vigilant, and untiring, the agents of the God-in-the-Constitution Society are rapidly familiarizing large numbers of people with the principles which underlie that movement. Cunning and Jesuitical, they are, to use the slang of the period, working the morality racket for all that it is worth. Rev. M. A. Gault, secretary for this district and agent of the Christian Statesman, is a suave, bland, and courteous gentleman in private conversation, seemingly desirous of fair play in discussion, and anxious only to advance in an honorable manner the cause which he so enthusiastically espouses. But in his lecture announcements, in his lectures themselvs, and in his reports to his paper an entirely different man comes to the surface. Then the priest, the unfair partisan, the special pleader, is discovered. His lecture bills are short and to the point for his purpose. "The Demands of Liberalism" and "The Laws of Moses" seem to be his favorit topics, but whatever the subject may be, the bottom of the bill contains an urgent invitation to the people to come out and hear discussed the question whether "Christian morality or Infidel licentiousness" shall control this government. This is everywhere the burden of his song and the animus of his plea. He is constantly at work, lecturing, canvassing for the Christian Statesman, raising funds to carry on the propaganda, and scattering missionary documents. I find the circulars and leaflets of this association in hotels, shops, stores, and car seats. He is ably assisted by other regular agents, and by an increasingly large number of the local clergy, including presidents and professors in colleges and many D.D.'s. Where their regular conventions are held, it often happens that business houses are closed, and bankers and others go to the meetings and read papers in favor of the movement.

Under the pressure of various influences, chief among which is the necessity for strengthening the Prohibition army, the Christian ministers and laity are looking more and more favorably upon this attempt to establish in this land a national ecclesiastical hierarchy. The hitherto quite scattered forces of repression and sacerdotalism are rapidly concentrating, rallying beneath the flag of "Christian Morality," a flag whose folds are quite broad enough to cover the Christianizing of the Constitution, Sunday legislation, prohibition, press laws, no divorce, and anything else essential to the success of the church and the destruction of liberty. What these men and women mean to accomplish was incautiously revealed by J. Ellen Foster, attorney, in a speech at Webster City, Ia., some three years ago. She said, "Prohibition is but beginning. We mean to keep on until we hav God in the Constitution and all enlisted under the banner of Jesus."

Certainly it is time that the Liberals should arouse from their lethargic inaction and face the issues presented. This is no child's play, the work that lies before us. The situation is very grave, and wise counsels and prompt and thorough action are imperativly demanded. EDWIN C. WALKER.

Canadian Notes.

The usual Sunday evening lecture of the Toronto Secular Society came off at the Grand Opera House Lecture Hall. These amateur lectures will be continued during all the summer months (d. v.), and should God not be willing, the lectures will take place all the same.

Members of the Toronto Secular Society hav elicited golden opinions from the newspaper press whenever they hav appeared on the public stage as vocalists, comic and sentimental, or dramatic performers in low comedy and tragedy. The names of Arthur Tilney, D. Richmond, Charles Hicks, Mr. Edwards, John Harrison, George Piddington, Miss Stewart, Mrs. Stevens, Miss Etty Scadding, Miss Annie Verrall, Miss Hattie Selly, the pianist, and many others—all the above mentioned are old establtablished favorits of acknowledged ability, possessing talents and versatility unsurpassed on the amateur stage. Negotiations are in progress for the possession by the Toronto Secular Society of a new and elegant hall of their own, in the very best and most central part of the city. "Arise! Shine! The Darkness Flies Away."

See the rosy morn appearing,
Gilds with gold the upland lawn;
Bees on banks of thyme disporting,
Sip the sweets and hail the dawn.

Evolution supposes that all these vast changes must hav occupied vast, immeasurable periods of time to accomplish; and an unlimited amount of testimony of the highest authority proves that vast, immeasurable periods of time hav not been lacking.

Man has existed upon the earth for hundreds of thousands of years, but that length of time is only very short, almost inappreciable, when compared with the geological age of the earth's crust. It is only less than one-third of one per cent, or as one day when contrasted with the length of fifty-two weeks, a complete year.

The only divine revelation which the evolution philosophy recognizes as true is written everywhere in nature, and to everyone with healthy senses and a healthy reason, it is given to participate in the unerring revelation of the temple of nature by his own inquiry and independent discovery.

The evolution philosophy is based on positiv facts. Natural selection is a positiv fact.

The laws of inheritance and adaptation are universally acknowledged physiological facts, the former traceable to propagation, the latter to the nutrition of organism.

The struggle for existence is a biological fact, which, with mathematical necessity, follows from the general disproportion between the average number of organic individuals and the numerical excess of their germs. But as adaptation and inheritance, in the struggle for life, are in continual interaction, it inevitably follows that natural selection, which everywhere influences, and continually changes, organic species, must, by making use of divergence of character, produce new species. Its influence is further especially favored by the activ and passiv migration of organisms which goes on everywhere. If we giv these circumstances due consideration, the continual and gradual modification or transmutation of organic species will appear as a biological process, which must, according to causal law, of necessity, follow from the actual nature of organisms and their mutual correlations.

The evolution philosophy teaches that the whole of the organic world, through the whole series of the vegetable and animal kingdom, from the lichen up to man, are composed mainly of one sort of matter, which in all cases, even those at the extremity of the scale, are almost identical in composition.

Also, every living action, from the vibrations of the cilia of the foraminifer to the imagination of Hamlet, or the composition of the Messiah, is accompanied by, and in a sense finds an equivalent expression in, the definit waste or disintegration of material tissue.

It is no less certain that the muscles of a horse are strained by a heavy load than it is that the brain of Shakspere underwent molecular agitation, producing definit chemical results, in the sublime effort of imagination. Sooner or later we shall arrive at a mechanical expression of consciousness, just as we hav arrived at a mechanical equivalent of heat. By the law of correlation of physical forces any given amount of force of one kind can be expressed by its eqivalent in another—electricity in heat, heat in weight, etc.

The evolution philosophy traces the development of all things—the whole universe—from the primeval state of a nebulous fiery mist, and on through the whole variety of forms of matter, inanimate and animate, vegetable and animal, culminating in man. We can well imagin the intellect of a Shakspere or a Homer as being at some time latent in a fiery cloud. R. B. BUTLAND.

The Cause Abroad.

The Annual Conference of the English National Secular Society was held this year at Birmingham, May 24th. Mr. Bradlaugh, the president, presided.

The annual report of the society shows that, notwithstanding the severe depression of industry which prevails throughout England as well as this country, the society has grown to a creditable extent. Considerably over a thousand (1367) new members hav joined the organization, and eight new branches hav been formed during the year. The balance sheet of the society showed over $1,200 on hand. Several Secular hall companies hav registered, and the Camberwell branch has built a hall and institute. The Manchester Freethinkers hav had left to them nearly $2,000 with which to build a hall. At Bolton Stephen Bulmer left a building to the Secularists, but owing to the wording of his will the estate is in litigation.

Mrs. Besant has maintained her science classes, which are of high repute, and the classes are acquiring a considerable amount of apparatus and a fair library.

Mr. Bradlaugh reports that very little progress has been made in Parliament during the year toward the repeal of the blasphemy laws. This stagnation of the movement is due chiefly to the agitation in connection with the Reform bill, over which the House of Lords raised such a tempest that when it ultimately passed it was found impossible to get Parliament to pay attention to so serious a proposal as the repeal of laws under which Freethinkers may be imprisoned. Mr. Bradlaugh continues his fight on the oath question, the next step being his appeal to the House of Lords. Several cases of Freethinking jurors hav lately been before the law courts of England, and questions hav been asked in the House of Commons which show that the cases of persons avowing themselvs Freethinkers are being made known in sufficient numbers to compel public attention. The affirmation bill has received generous support from the Liberal and Radical parties, and even from the more progressiv Unitarians, but so far the Secularists hav been unable to forward the bill in Parliament, owing to Gladstone's lukewarm support and his habits of procrastinating. In New Zealand, Mr. Bradlaugh said, this oath question had forever been set at rest by the adoption of a general affirmation act. In South Australia an affirmation bill lately passed the representativ house, but was rejected by the Council. In New Zealand the Hon. Robert Stout and the Hon. John Ballance, both deservedly respected Freethinkers, hav become, and still are, members of the colonial cabinet, Mr. Stout being prime minister and attorney general. The Freethinkers of France, Spain, and Italy convened an International Freethought Conference in Rome, concluding on June 2d the anniversary demonstration in memory of Garibaldi. Permission was accorded them by the Italian government to take part in this demonstration, which so offended the pope that he directed Cardinal Jacobini to address a circular letter of protest to all the foreign Catholic powers against this "new outrage on religion and infringement of the rights of the papal authority." The Freethinkers of France hav celebrated the centenary of the death of Pierre Denis Diderot by the erection of two statues, one at Langres, his birth-place, the other in Paris, near the house where the great philosopher dwelt and worked for the famous Encyclopedia. At Stockholm, Sweden, as was recently noted in these columns, a society has been formed for promoting religious freedom.

Australia and Queensland send word to the parent country that with them Freethought is progressing with rapid strides. At Melbourne, Mr. J. Symes, the editor of the Liberator, has been prosecuted under an act of George III., under which the keeper of any room opened for debates on Sunday might be prosecuted. The case is being defended by Mr. Symes, and is still pending in the courts. An interlocutory decision has been given against Mr. Symes, but without costs, the judge expressing the hope that the matter would be argued before the full court; and Mr. Symes seems to consider this decision a substantial victory.

The Secularists of England take activ interest in politics, their sympathies going to the Liberal and Radical parties. During the past year a People's League bas been formed in England for the abolition of the hereditary principle in legislation, and on invitation of the promoters the Secular Society sent delegates to its meetings, and two Secularists are upon the administrativ committee of the league. The Secular party early protested against England's unwarranted war in the Soudan, and a great meeting was held in St. James's hall to giv fuller and wider effect to the protest. In Sydney, Australia, the Freethought party took similar steps in favor of peace.

The closing part of the Conference was held in the town hall of Birmingham, the use of which was voted free by the town corporation. Five orators addressed a patient audience numbering thousands. The Conference shows that Freethought is progressing in England very rapidly, and that before many years Mr. Bradlaugh will be regarded as a rather conservativ individual instead of a firebrand.

Think Over This.

The suggestion of a writer in a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the Society of Humanity of this city be rehabilitated, with Mr. Wakeman installed as "pastor," is not one to be lightly thrown aside. Whether it should all be as the writer suggests remains, of course, to be determined. But the proposition that the Liberals of this city should organize a society, to hold meetings every Sunday, at which some constructiv philosophy should be taught, is worthy of serious thought and energetic action. If the constructiv philosophers can be induced to lay aside their sectarianism—that is the best word for their differences—and teach an affirmativ and utilitarian philosophy of life and morals, such a society would undoubtedly flourish and do a world of good.

The Society of Humanity has a large fund, the interest on which would pay for the rent of a hall, and though the charter of the organization is for Positivist propaganda, the "creed" or articles of agreement of that society are broad enough to admit to membership all the Freethinkers. Indeed, the Society of Humanity is an auxiliary League, and is in direct and activ sympathy with Freethought. Such a society should be entirely scientific, affirmativ, and constructiv. The Liberal Club affords the opportunities for discussion, and the new society should not encourage intellectual combats between the various reformers. The socity should, above all else, strive to be a social organization. Particular attention should be paid to the cultivation of the "heart side" of Freethought. Art, music, poetry should be drawn upon to interest the congregation. The "preaching" should be short and designed principally to direct the attention to the duties each one owes to every other one, and the obligation resting upon all to endeavor to help the rest. Extreme "individualists" can hardly object to this, for under our present system of society we are all bound together, and while each individual has rights not to be disturbed by society, he also has obligations to society not to be disregarded. But these different views may well be dropped out of sight, for the proper place for their discussion is at the Liberal Club, that the work of the new society might be confined to the establishing of a social gathering which should replace the church and Sunday-school. The young people should be the ones catered to, not the battle-scarred warriors who can take care of themselvs, and who care for nothing so much as an intellectual hair-splitting contest. The wisest of the philosophers may be called to teach, but it must not be all teaching, nor the congregation all teachers. The genial souls who know how to entertain should hav high positions. Organs skilfully played hav as great attraction for young Infidels as for young Christians. A trained choir is as potent a teacher of righteousness as the best sermonizer outside as well as inside the church. Let us hav a temple without a priest; religion without theology; morality without dogma; a social organization that meets the emotional and artistic wants of the people without degrading their mental faculties by a blind faith.

A Wide Difference.

The Stewart Memorial Cathedral of the Incarnation at Garden City, L. I., was the scene of a huge farce in the early part of this month. The papers describe the "consecration" of this edifice as a "touching tribute to the dead merchant prince," but it is rather a desecration of his memory. When Stewart bought the immense tract of land on Long Island which he subsequently turned into a "Garden City" his idea was that he had made a shrewd real estate speculation. The monument to his life he designed to be the "Stewart Working Women's Home," in this city. His heirs, however, hav completely reversed his intentions, changing the Working Women's Home into a huge hotel, and transforming the modest church he contemplated building at Garden City into a magnificent cathedral. Mr. Stewart, if our information is accurate, was not so much in love with Christianity that he would willingly hav given the millions spent in building this cathedral, and the use of hundreds of thousands, to secure to the diocese the annual endowment of $15,000 already made, and contemplated to be increased to $25,000. Mr. Stewart had in his mind for several years before his death the intention to found an institution of practical philanthropy, which should entitle him to the gratitude of the people from whom and by whose services he had gathered his immense wealth. This intention finally took shape in the Home referred to. Though this Home was completed by his heirs, it was conducted as such just long enough to make it a failure, and then it was converted into the Park Avenue Hotel.

Mrs. Stewart, a devout Episcopalian, announced her intention of building a most magnificent cathedral and consecrating it to the memory of her dead husband. In this she was encouraged by the Episcopal priests and bishops. The result is that instead of by a practical philanthropic work—and perhaps an act of justice to those poor women from whose labors Mr. Stewart so largely profited—Mr. Stewart's memory is kept before the world only by an idle pile of masonry and a poor little religious school. Instead of benefiting thousands of deserving women, the Stewart estate is a crib from which feed useless bishops, rectors, and curates, and a swarm of parasitic wardens and vestrymen.

What a difference between the use of his millions made by Stephen Girard, Infidel, and that to which theirs hav been devoted by the pious heirs of A. T. Stewart!

An Essay on the Early Christian.

In all ages of the world, so far as we are enabled to discover by consulting history, it has been the fate of men who denied the truth of prevailing religions, and of all other religions, to experience unkind treatment at the hands of their contemporaries. They hav, in fact, been burnt in one age, while the next has venerated them and expended large sums of money in celebrating their birthdays. There is also another variety of the reformer whose earthly existence has been made equally unpleasant by the religious enthusiasm of his neighbors, and he has likewise suffered, as it were, ante-mortem cremation. The difference between him and the iconoclast is that, in addition to being called infamous in his day, the people of the coming days hav held him in the same estimation. Of the latter variety was the Early Christian.

Tacitus was a Roman historian who lived about eighteen hundred years ago, and he is accredited by his biographers with having had a rare knowledge of human nature. It seems that at that time Christianity was represented by a Salvation Army, toward whom the authorities of Rome were not favorably disposed. Tacitus says:

"Nero inflicted the most exquisit tortures on those men who, under the vulgar appellation of Christians, were already branded with deserved infamy. They derived their name and origin from one Christ, who in the reign of Tiberius had suffered death by the sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilate. For a while this dire superstition was checked, but it again burst forth, and not only spread itself over Judea, the first seat of this mischievous sect, but was even introduced into Rome, the common asylum which receives and protects whatever is impure, whatever is atrocious.

The confessions of those who were seized discovered a great multitude of their accomplices, and they were all convicted, not so much for the crime of setting fire to the city as for their hatred of human kind. The guilt of the Christians deserved indeed the most exemplary punishment."

It is instructiv to read of events as described by men who lived and wrote contemporaneously with their occurrence. Rome, at the time Christianity became epidemic in its more squalid quarters, was the home of religious toleration. A thousand forms, perhaps, of religion subsisted undisturbed, and every individual was permitted to go to paradise or to the burnt district according as he might elect. It is evident, therefore, that the early Christian was an offensiv partisan, and very unpopular with the administration, or he would not hav been molested.

It will be inferred from the quotation just made from Tacitus that he had never heard that Christ was the son of God, or he would not hav spoken of him as "one Christ." If the Christian scheme is true, Tacitus has been getting sheol for that remark during long ages past. We now understand why he is called a profane historian. His assertion that the Early Christian was a pestilential and law-breaking person seems to be supported by the historical fact cited by Swinton in his "Outlines of the World's History," namely, that with other criminals "the Christians suffered most under good and reforming princes like Trajan and Marcus Aurelius, men of pure and humane character, while under the infamous emperors they were generally let alone." Tacitus observes casually that the Early Christian was sometimes smeared over with combustible materials, and used as a torch to illuminate the streets of Rome. When we read hereafter about Christians being sent to shed light upon the world, we shall know what it means. Under the radiance of history closely scrutinized, therefore, an apparent misstatement becomes a sordid and literal truth. To thus search out and explain the significance of fugitiv lies of this sort is one of the most delightful and profitable duties of the student.

Recurring to Tacitus, we find, in conclusion, that Christ was regarded as a common malefactor; that the term Christian was a vulgar appellation; that Christianity was a dire superstition, and its adherents a mischievous sect; that they took root in Rome because that city was a common asylum for whatever was impure and atrocious; that they had a multitude of accomplices, were suspected of setting fire to the city, and were guilty to the extent of deserving the most exemplary punishment. The Early Christian was, therefore, the kind of man we would not desire to meet on a dark night, and the most comforting reflection in regard to him is that he is now no more.

It is due the Early Christian to observe that the passage herein quoted, and credited to Tacitus, according to the best evidence was written by some good old soul who flourished in the fifteenth century after the historian's death. These remarks, therefore, are built either upon Christian or historical authority. It is not within the province of an essayist to say which.

The Modern Balaam.

Quite a number hav written for prices in quantities of the picture published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. We hav therefore had a large number printed on calendered paper, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we will send, postage free, at the following rates: one dozen, 30 cents; one hundred, $1.50; one thousand, $10. We hope a large number will be ordered, and posted up everywhere, as those who hav written about it say the cut speaks volumes.

Editorial Notes.

THE Rev. William Lloyd, of this city, graciously concedes that when "the day of general summing up" shall come Victor Hugo will be found to "stand in high favor with his maker." No doubt, no doubt; but this is not Christianity, which Mr. Lloyd is paid to preach.

THE Rev. J. W. Spriggs has resigned the pastorate of the First Christian church of Salem, Oregon, because he no longer believes in all the doctrins of the sect. He seems to be intellectually honest, and will probably blossom into a full-fledged heretic ere long. The air of the Pacific coast is very bracing.

MR. REPLOGLE and wife hav been replaced in the editing of the Missouri Liberal by Mr. and Mrs. Scovell, formerly of Columbus, Kan. "In this new phase of editorial management of the Liberal, it will be the desire of those connected with the paper to represent the higher element of Rationalism in its columns; and they hope to receive sufficient encouragement to warrant them in the work to be done." Simultaneously with the advent of Mr. Scovell the Liberal opens war on the Freelovers, announcing that it has in preparation a series of articles against them by C. W. Stewart.

MR. JOHN MCGUIRE, of Modoc Landing, Ark., has been fined for opening his store on Sunday and distributing rations the government had sent to the sufferers from a flood. The prosecutor was a church-member. The court was unwilling to push the case, but this man was not satisfied until Mr. McGuire had been punished for breaking the Sabbath. "And of such is the kingdom of heaven."

J. D. SHAW, of Waco, Texas, indicates in the last number of his magazine his willingness to engage in debate with any person of his community whom the Christians will put forward and whose orthodoxy and good character they will vouch for. Mr. Shaw givs them a long list of propositions for discussion, and if the ministers fail to take him up it must be because of a feeling of inability to meet his arguments, not that he does not giv them ground enough to cover.

WE learn by the following note from Elder Evans, of Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., to the Tribune that an old friend of Mr. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER is dead: "Oliver Prentiss, aged eighty-seven, died on May 14th at 11:30 A.M. Oliver was widely known. He had a large circle of friends, including presidents, governors, and statesmen. 'He loved his fellowman,' and loved those most who stood in need of his love. After using tobacco and animal food, with their corollaries, for fifty years, he totally abstained the remaining thirty-seven years. He was a live, proper, fine man. Died by act of his own indomitable will, without sickness; sitting in a chair, he closed his own eyes and mouth. There is no death about it."

THE Pittsburgh League closed its season on June 14th with a sociable, consisting of musical and literary exercises, and a closing address by F. M. Gessner. Officers for the ensuing year were also elected. The season has been a prosperous one for the League, a very large increase of membership being noted by Pittsburgh Truth, which says that "it is apparent that the lectures and the large amount of Liberal literature the League is circulating are having a wonderful effect upon the minds of intelligent people, and it is only a question of a short time when the organization will become such a power for good in the city and throughout the state that its opponents, both political and religious, will be compelled to respect our rights and afraid to refuse to grant our demands."

THE United Presbyterian Assembly recently in session at Topeka, Kan., adopted during its deliberations a resolution requesting the publisher of the Daily Capital of Topeka "to date his edition of Sunday morning, and intended for distribution through the Assembly, Monday, June 1st (instead of Sunday, May 30th), and not to distribute it through the Assembly until that date." The Sun of this city calls this "encouraging humbug," but to our mind it is a revelation of the inward dishonesty of the Presbyterians there assembled. The work upon Sunday papers is chiefly done on Saturday; upon Monday papers, on Sunday. The Presbyterians know this, but seem to care more for the looks of the thing than for the real observance of the Sabbath. In other words, sin, in their view, lies not in the commission of the act, but in the public's knowing of it.

IT is a striking truth that though the church, collectivly and each one in particular, is willing to receive from the state and city every cent that can be wrung from them by lobbyists, not a Christian institution is willing to return any favor whatever. Some years ago this city opened a street by St. Mary's church in the annexed district. The claim for damages has long been outlawed, but at the last session of our legislature, the priest lobbied through a bill depriving the state of this defense, which the governor will undoubtedly sign. The delay in this suit lends color to the suspicion that the church's damage is largely in the priest's imagination, and that his action is an afterthought to further drain the public treasury for the benefit of his own. It may also well be a question of how much consideration church property, which the city protects but obtains no benefit from, is entitled to where the damage does not exceed the amount of the many years' exemption from taxation it has received.

SPEAKING of the condition of the working girls of this city, their restricted and uncomfortable habitations, and the great relief they experience in attending balls and walking upon the streets, the Sun expresses surprise that so few of them yield to the temptations that beset their narrow life. They are, it says, "liable to be made the victims of conscienceless young scoundrels in their own line of life, for the enemies of their purity are usually the men with whom they naturally come into association in their early days." The ability to resist the young scoundrels, thinks the Sun, comes "first of all from their religion and from the protecting care of their church. Without that support the most of them would probably be utterly lost. What, then, would be the condition as to morals in New York if the simple faith of these girls was destroyed after the manner of that of the Infidel Agnostics, who treat their religion as a childish superstition, and yet are unable to suggest for it any substitute which would hav an equal power for good." The Sun forgets that the "conscienceless young scoundrels" are members of the same church as the girls. Therefore, to make good the assertion that the church is the restraining influence, its effects should be visible upon dissolute men rather than upon girls naturally modest and virtuous. The blackest scoundrels of history hav been good Christians, and the criminals of today, from the cruelest murderers to the meanest drunkards, are Christians. It was only a few weeks since a good Catholic jumped from the gallows to the pearly gate. We think the case is accurately stated, and credit enough given the church, if we allow that a girl is made no worse by attendance upon religious services, and when that attendance is upon Catholic institutions, and the service is the confessional, a good deal is allowed. The Sun's insinuation that "Infidel Agnostics" hav nothing upon which to base morality is bosh. Human happiness is the solidest of all foundations.

SOME, perhaps, will remember that a few weeks ago we had occasion to defend THE TRUTH SEEKER and one or two of our correspondents from the charge of entertaining animosity toward the South. "Independent Thinker," in the Independent Pulpit, was the gentleman making the accusation. In his succeeding number Mr. Shaw published a part of our reply, and commended it. In the Pulpit for June, "Independent Thinker" makes a mild rejoinder, the last part of which we quote only to say that we heartily second his wish, grasp his extended hands, and allow him the last word: "Again the editor [of THE TRUTH SEEKER] says, 'Let the Liberal South hold out her hand, and the Liberal North will leap across the bloody chasm to grasp it.' This is all right, except that it seems, by implication, to charge the Liberals of the South with being unwilling to hold out the hand. The fact is, we hav been holding out the hand of reconciliation ever since the close of the war, but we found few takers. I do hope that a new era is abut to dawn on us through the kind offices of Liberalism. . . . . But here I am, Brother Macdonald, on the very edge of the bloody chasm with both hands stretched toward you—will you take them?"

HEBER NEWTON does not put it in such plain words, but if his statements are true (and they are, and more too) the Bible is a hotch-potch of ignorance and a jumble of contradictory sentiments. How, knowing what he does, Mr. Newton can in any degree believe in it as a divine word, or in the religion founded upon it, is past our comprehension. In his sermon on the 31st ult., in speaking upon the late revision of the Old Testament, he said: "The work did not purport to make all the changes that were desirable, but only such as seemed necessary in order to secure greater accuracy and clearness. A considerable class of verbal changes which constitute a great improvement to the English reader is found in the case of words of a more or less offensiv character which hav been softened. In Micah vii, 2, is a passage which is neither very plain nor very forceful in the old rendering. The prophet is lamenting that "the good man is perished out of the earth; and there is none upright among men; they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net." Men were very much the same, you see, in the olden times as now. While the word hell stood upon the pages of the Bible, ignorant readers and ignorant preachers—of whom there are, alas! not a few still left—consciously or unconsciously smuggled into the innocent words of the Hebrew or the Greek the frightful visions of the medieval theology. There was no honest course open but to eliminate the word and to substitute either the original itself or the nearest rendering possible of it. The most interesting dogmatic aspect of the Old Testament is its messianic character, real or fancied. The traditional understanding of the Old Testament found a collection of predictions purely miraculous of the coming messiah. In such miraculous predictions theology has taught us to find the chief argument for the messianic claims of the character of Jesus. It has long been known that most of these passages did not bear in the original the meaning which they conveyed in the English translation. On no point has the work of the revisers been awaited with more expectancy than upon their handling of these passages. Of course no questionable changes were to be expected. Changes of such a nature could, from the circumstances of the case, only be made when they were absolutely demanded by fidelity to the original. Where there was a doubt it was but natural that the conservativ instincts of the Christian scholars should incline them to hold by the old rendering, even though its correctness was more problematical. Thus, for example, the famous passage in Isaiah, which has been the chief proof test for the dogma of the miraculous conception, has long been of more than questionable authority. The consensus of scholarly judgment is that the word there rendered 'virgin' should properly be translated 'a young woman' or 'young wife.' The passage has no possible reference to anything beyond the horizon of the immediate day in which Isaiah was speaking. It is only by the most arbitrary and unnatural emphasis upon the description of the young woman and upon the title given to the young child that any possible allusion can be found to Jesus. The doctrin of the immaculate conception must stand or fall upon the historic evidence of the New Testament, and not upon such a flimsy foundation as that which theologians hav laid in this passage of Isaiah." And yet Mr. Newton is preaching "Christianity."

FEW things (so philosophize the publishers of the North American Review) are more fascinating in their way than a study of the subterranean history of man, whether in caves or in mounds, whether it be to corroborate written history, or to take testimony that ante-dates all writing. President Bartlett, of Dartmouth, contributes an interesting article on this topic to the July number of the North American Review. From the men of unknown ages and their works underground, to men grappling with the latest questions of our own day, and discussing the parceling out of the earth's surface, is a long step; but in the same number of the Review appears a conversation between David Dudley Field and Henry George, on land and taxation. Another urgent question, which may soon make a very serious issue, the extradition of dynamite criminals, is debated by President Angell, of Michigan University, George Ticknor Curtis, and Justice T. M. Cooley. Dorman B. Eaton, chief of the civil service commission, givs his views of the results of that reform. William Clarke shows the futil character of any scheme for British imperial federation, and Thomas W. Knox givs a brief but interesting sketch of the progress of European influence in Asia. The other articles are one by Gail Hamilton on Prohibition in practice, and one by Rev. Dr. C. H. Parkhurst on the decline of Christianity. These, with the batch of free-hand comments, make up a number of unusual interest. If the allotted age of man were sufficient for a magazine, we might hav to part here with an old friend; for the Review has just completed its seventieth year. But outwardly it renews its youth with a new cover, and inwardly it seems more vigorous than ever.

Letters from Friends.

WARREN, O., June 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I saw in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER a notice to delinquent subscribers to pay up, and though I am not one of that number I feel that as I am somewhat advanced in years I will secure the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years by paying for it in advance for that time. Inclosed find $6.00. If my Christian friends pay as much attention to me in the future as they hav in the past I may not be able to pay my subscription very much longer. In my business transactions for a number of years, throwing aside all prejudice, I can honestly say I hav lost ten dollars to one by those who professed to hav been washed in the blood of the lamb. Doubtless the course I pursue—being an outspoken Infidel for forty years—has not helped me any in my business. This is a very orthodox town; two-thirds, however, of the business men are skeptics, but still-born. They would sell their birthright cheaper even than Esau did. Many of them support the churches liberally for the purpose of securing Christian patronage. But for me, sink or swim, heaven or hell, I must be true to my own convictions. I will not sustain a thing that I believe to be false, a curse to society, by either my money or my presence. "A few years more and I shall hav done, but when the shades of death are growing thick and fast around my brow I want to hav the satisfaction of knowing that I hav done some little to rid the world of superstition—that I am leaving it somewhat better than I found it. With regard to another world I know nothing. Although I hav not the consolations arising from the belief that I will meet my friends in a more congenial clime, I still hav the unbounded satisfaction in the belief that I will not meet them in hell.

"Why should I fear the future? I murdered no Uriah for his wife, turned no Hagar out in the wilderness with her child to starve, neither turned away any hungry person from my door."

Whatever there may be in the future, it is a fact in nature, and we can't escape it. But for me, I hav quit years ago paying insurance against fire in another world.

THOS. DOUGLAS.

NEW YORK, June 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in to-day's Sun a reprint of your criticism in the last TRUTH SEEKER on one of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's recent statements. The editor of the Sun evidently approves of your remarks in regard to the reverend gentleman, and describes THE TRUTH SEEKER as "an avowed and able Infidel paper."

That THE TRUTH SEEKER plainly advocates its principles and has the courage of its convictions is apparent to all its readers, that it is ably conducted goes without saying and cannot be disputed, and if the editor of the Sun, instead of describing it as an Infidel paper, had stated that it was a "journal of Freethought and reform" he would hav told the exact truth. But probably the term Infidel, which was formerly considered as a reproach, was not used in an unfriendly spirit. So many people who hav been called Infidels hav lived noble and useful lives, hav illustrated their principles by moral and philanthropic acts, that the term "Infidel" is by many now considered as a synonym of honor and virtue, and it is probably in this sense that the Sun applies the term to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It is encouraging to Liberals to observe the great influence that Freethought journals are exerting on the Secular press, and it is to be hoped that this benign influence will be greatly augmented in the future. PETER ECKLER.

ORTON, MICH., June 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: One Charles Laperche, of Alexandria, Ont., asserts in a letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that Mr. Bennett was not a Spiritualist, and that he never said or wrote anything contradictory to the thesis that death ends all. Well, now, that is not true. In the first place, a gentleman of Ypsilanti, Mich., wrote and asked him the question, "If a man die will he liv again?" to which Mr. Bennett emphatically responded "Yes!" And further, sir, so sure as I liv and exist as an organized human being, Mr. Bennett told me himself, personally, that both himself and wife had had positiv proof of spirit communion for forty years. T. S. ANDREWS.

AUBURN, N. Y., June 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: In common with hundreds of others, I had almost despaired of the success of raising sufficient funds for Mr. Reynolds's tent. The question has often been asked, "Why don't some one possessing the means advance Mr. Reynolds the necessary money, that he may at once be put gloriously upon his way in carrying on the summer's campaign crusade?"

And now, "blessed be God," as rejoice the Christians, "it has so pleased him in his inscrutable wisdom and mercy to cause to be lifted up among us" one Wm. Smith, of Geneva, N. Y., who has heard our cries and lamentations in the wilderness for more lucre, and has responded to them and comforted our aching hearts by generously giving $300, the necessary amount to place squarely upon his feet the aggressiv instigator and prime mover of the new propaganda movement for the dissemination of Liberalism. Surely Mr. Smith is entitled to the thanks and well wishes of all true Liberals in his noble effort in bringing about the consummation of Mr. Reynolds's grand idea of propagandism. This bespeaks resoundingly to our credit what can be done by Liberals and Freethinkers in carrying on our good work for the remodeling of orthodoxy's old, revamped, and obsolete ideas, teachings, creeds, and infamous doctrins. Thanks also must be cordially extended to the very many others who hav liberally donated their $1, $2, $5, and upwards, not only to the Tent Fund, but all general funds which hav for the past six months been open to donations for the general cause of Liberalism. Never before in the history of the Liberal movement has there been so much hard work done and money raised. This shows that the people are rapidly leaving the church and her doctrins, relegating them to the limbo of heathen mythology. Let us evermore faithfully "Strike till the last armed foe expires!"

It can hardly be expected of those who hav already donated $5 or $10, and larger amounts, to double their very liberal sums, but those who, like myself, could only afford at first to pay $1, can they not, one and all, double this amount and forward same as soon as possible to the Tent Fund and bid an everlasting farewell to all indebtedness? I hope it will not be thought I am asking or suggesting too much. Herewith, for example-setting, I inclose another $1 to help spread the light.

L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

CHICAGO, May 27, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, which will pay for your much-valued paper up to end of the present year? Without the instructiv reading afforded by its pages, much of the ideal of life and of existence would to me be enigmatical. May it prosper and hold aloft the banner of Freethought, of Liberalism, and of that assurance as to things unknowable secured by true skepticism.

The only Robert Ingersoll and his English counterpart, Charles Watts, as also your Mr. Putnam, hav lately visited us here, and treated us to intellectual feasts of such excelsior character as only Freethinkers and believers in the kingdom of humanity can prepare and offer.

Oh, for some such men in every community of civilization, and life and mind, reason and spirit, of man would become sweetened and brightened in all its good aspects and higher aspirations.

"When from the lips of truth one mighty breath
Shall, like a whirlwind, scatter in its breeze
The whole dark pile of human mockeries;
Then shall the reign of mind commence on earth,
And starting fresh, as from a second birth,
Man, in the sunshine of the world's new spring,
Shall walk transparent like some holy thing."

CHAS. J. SUNDELL.

CLARA, PA., June 4, E.M. 285.

MR. EDITOR: Our Liberal League secured the services for the past two weeks of Capt. E. M. Lester, president of the Friendship Liberal League in Philadelphia, and we were so pleased with his work that I feel as though I wanted to tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER about it. You see, our county is away back in the wilds of Pennsylvania, and scarcely touched as yet by railroads, hence the difficulty of reaching the host of Liberals in the county by the average lecturer.

But Captain Lester wanted to canvass for his paper and make the acquaintance of the Liberals of Pennsylvania, and we wanted a missionary, hence we arranged with him to canvass the county pretty thoroughly. He gave, I believe, fifteen lectures, often having to walk from point to point. At every point, so far as I can learn, he was well received. He is a fluent speaker, and well versed in scriptural authority, having been formerly a Universalist minister. He always urges people to question him or debate. At Millport, where he spoke twice, he was questioned a good deal, and was always on his feet in an instant, with a telling reply.

Elder Willis, the one minister of the place, was in the audience, and when called upon to ask questions, or defend his position from the fierce onslaught of the captain, had nothing to say.

At West Bingham, though, the church and ministers were out in force. They, however, fired their biggest guns without effect. Hence, the next night they, for once, were united in the cry, "Down with Infidelity!" One of the leading men in the church, a merchant by the name of Howe, gave a lot of fellows whisky and got them drunk with the understanding that they were to occupy the back seats at the next lecture, and, at a given signal, break the meeting up in a row. But, unfortunately, they did not take the Lord into their confidence, for as soon as the noise began, the justice of the peace (whose name I, unfortunately, cannot remember) rose and demanded silence in the name of the law, saying Captain Lester had a perfect right to express his opinions, and those who did not wish to hear them could keep away, and the first man who created a disturbance he would hav arrested. This effectually squelched the last argument of the church in West Bingham, and the evening following the lecture passed off harmoniously.

From here the captain went on to Ulysses, where he spoke twice to good houses. The band was out in honor thereof, and he was treated with much courtesy, although this was their first Liberal lecture. Captain Lester has made many warm friends in this county, and done a noble work for Liberalism. As a pioneer, we heartily commend him to all societies. We are to hav Remsburg here the last of August or the first of September. We are all so glad to hear that Reynolds has inaugurated his tent campaign, and hope he will be helped by Liberals everywhere to free himself from indebtedness.

EVA BARNES, Secretary Clara Liberal League.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., May 31, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the arrival of the last TRUTH SEEKER that G. H. Walser is on the warpath, with his sword of defense drawn to protect the citizens of Liberal from the vile and slanderous lies of their Christian opponents. When I read the article in the Globe Democrat of the correspondent, I was of the opinion that the falsfier would be attended to. While I am decidedly in favor of peace when we can hav it on honorable terms, at the same time, when we are misrepresented by falsehood, it is our duty to defend ourselvs, and I hope Brother Walser and the Liberals at Liberal, Mo., may bring those hypocrits to justice. A young man who livs in Pennsylvania came to our town this spring, on his way home. He had been visiting his cousins, who reside at Liberal—Mr. John and Jacob Betiz. He remained there about two months. I saw him and had an introduction, and before he learned anything in regard to my religious views, I asked him the question, "Are the citizens of Liberal harmonious?" "Yes," said he, "you would not think that such harmony could exist among a people." He continued: "I never saw a more social, kind people in my life." And my informant was a Christian, a member of the Catholic church. He had the appearance of a very moral, truthful young man.

I would like to make a few remarks in regard to Brother Laperche's letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER. He rather criticises Sister Vore for intimating that our lamented D. M. Bennett was a Spiritualist. He says: "This is unfair, for I am positiv Mr. Bennett was not a Spiritualist." He believed he had read everything that he (Mr. Bennett) ever wrote for the public, and admits that he always wrote favorably of Spiritualism, but always ended his remarks by saying he was not one of them. I am of the opinion that our friend's memory is at fault, for if he has read everything that our good D. M. Bennett wrote, and still thinks he did not believe in a continued existence, what construction does he place on our martyr's words when he wrote, "I can hardly yield my consent that this is the last of our individuality, and I fondly think that Father and Mother Nature are able to accomplish the best, greatest, and most desirable of all problems—a continued individual existence; but I am borrowing no trouble about it." Again, some years back, Brother Bennett attended several seances with Dr. Slade. I recollect on one occasion he was favored with a slate-written communication purporting to come from his father, at least it was signed "John Bennett," and D. M., the son, if I mistake not, said that he had no knowledge how Slade could have known his father's name. It also adverted to incidents that had taken place between him and his father. How the medium could hav been in possession of the fact was more than he could comprehend. In his comments he signified that he would hav to admit that it was spirits, until there was a better solution given, but that in time science might demonstrate differently.

Now, in regard to his test with Slade, I hav quoted from memory, and I will not say I hav quoted him verbatim, but think it the import of what he said. So, no doubt, Mrs. Vore and hundreds of others who hav also read his writings are inclined to think that Brother Bennett was almost persuaded to be a believer in immortality. I myself thought so, and I am not a Spiritualist, from the fact that I hav never had sufficient evidence to convince me positivly of spirits or immortality. I am a Materialist, but will not put myself down as No. 4, lest I might hav to change the number to some other figure, and I believe it best not to set stakes. This is a progressiv age, and there is no telling what the future may disclose. Mr. Laperche has for the last twenty years tried to believe in a continued existence, but the more he tries the less he succeeds. Now, if he is really desirous of this condition, perhaps there is no surer means to its consummation than to try for the next twenty years to not believe it. The proverb is that a rule that will not work both ways is no rule at all. So, as Mr. Laperche has not succeeded by trying, he might by not trying. I do not understand the modus operandi by which he can try to believe a thing. I was of the opinion that our belief was formed from the weight of evidence. I may be mistaken. Materialist and Spiritualist, in my estimation, can do no better than to work together for the common cause—universal mental liberty—and not dispute about what we know nothing of. If some learn there is a continued existence, and, on the other hand, some learn, as T. Winter and a few more, there is not, it is not for me, who am ignorant on both points, to fall out with either.

Yours for progress, WM. A. THOMPSON.

LEXINGTON, KY., June 6, 285.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d contained an article making inquiries as to whether the religion of the "sinless one" is true or false, by Brother Thomas Knott, of Jordan (not the river Jordan of the blessed holy land, but Jordan, Minn.). After divesting himself of his views on the momentous subject, he goes for the "good book" and the "dear Christianity" founded thereon sans ceremonie, in regular bruiser's style. At the same time, however, he asks what he terms a few pertinent questions. Unable himself to answer them satisfactorily, his theological education being sadly neglected, he waxes wroth, and defies the "babbling, good, sanctimonious" Christians to substantiate their Biblical absurdities, claims, and silly speculations pertaining to the future abode of man. As the good shepherds are præfectus classises, admirals of the heavenly-bound fleet, and do not wish to be disturbed in their little godly enterprise of soul-saving, they will not, I presume, condescend to notice such depraved pagans as Brother Knott. Hence the great ubique gentium, the everywhere-present God, will pardon me if I myself execute the work his agents are called upon to accomplish. Yes, I, even I, vile heathen that I am, can correctly answer the gentleman, and I won't charge him a cent for it either, nor take up a collection—a religious necessity, by the way—as my rivals, the good ministers, invariably do. Yet I don't claim any inspiration, and I want it distinctly understood by the reader that I'm neither "babbling" (I don't tell everything I know) or "sanctimonious," my only desire being to furnish Mr. Knott the information he is so earnestly in search of.

First, the gentleman wants to know what blasphemy is. I am afraid I will become "stuck" on this answer. It's a complete "jaw-breaker." But let me gather up the "reins of thought, which triumphantly marches through the darkness of superstition, dispelling with its golden rays the shades of orthodoxy, the dreary vast, a world of chaos of religious nonsense, then adding the noonday glory of Freethought, and bringing with it the hum and bustle of universal mental liberty, that it might so prepare this planet of ours to be a suitable dwelling-place for man—a heaven here and now, and not hereafter.' Why, blasphemy is blasphemy, and nothing else can be made of it. I thought every one knew that. The ignorance of poor, weak man on the theological matters is amazing. Mr. Knott goes on to say that before one can use blasphemy, there must be something to blaspheme, and then asks what that something is. Oh, horrors alive, here's an out-and-out Atheist! Yet I can be but surprised at the brother's ambigo, his doubts as to a supreme being. Did he know how wicked it was to doubt he would not, I'm sure, hav asked that ungodly question, but hav believed in the blessed Bible, and implicitly relied on all that sacred book teaches in regard to the wonderful stories about the sinless saints and the sufferings of the savior, and how we are to be saved through the merits of that crucified lamb. O brother, there's a great judgment day coming, when Jesus, bless his royal nibs, pays it all by rewarding the righteous with beautiful white robes and golden harps, and sending the godless below to reside with the devil and his angels throughout all eternity. If this graphic description of J. C. and Co.'s divine plan doesn't fetch the brother and cause him to relinquish his wicked ways and weep over his earthly sins, for heaven's sake, what will?

Second, he asserts that the whole fabric of our holy religion rests upon five mere superstitions, namely (1), that there is a god (who said there wasn't?); (2) that there is a devil (and I don't doubt it, to judge from events transpiring among Christians); (3) that there is a heaven; (4) that there is a hell (I knew that all my life); (5) and that man has an immortal soul. This opinion of Mr. Knott's is blasphemous and irreverent in the extreme. How can he intimate such Ingersoll-like things when the scriptures, rightly interpreted, pointedly and emphatically say it is founded on a rock against which the very gates of hell itself cannot prevail? It is only sufficient for us to know that holy writ asserts this, and I think I am competent to judge, as I'm on the Lord's side, and expect one of these days, no preventing Providence, to be a white-robed angel and a participant in the heavenly joys. To hear him talk, one is astonished at the gentleman's non-religious make-up, and if I were he I would liv in constant fear of our kind heavenly father striking me dead for such wicked heresy.

Fourth, the next proposition advanced by Mr. Knott is that he desires to know how it was ascertained that God is a "trinity." How God is a trinity? I hardly know what to think of the brother. Eternal torture taught in the "divine word," and the beautiful and effectiv and affecting story of Christ and him crucified is distasteful to him and makes no impression whatever on his hard heart, for it falls on his ear like water on a duck's back. And he vainly imagins that the sacred writings of the holy apostles and evangelists can be overthrown, and godless Infidelity immortalized instead! Idle thought! It will never be; this is a Christian nation, not a heathen one, and consequently I would advise the brother to cease building his air castles. I started out to tell him how God is a trinity, but I had almost forgotten that arduous duty, therefore he will excuse this little enlargement on the subject. God himself says he is a trinity, and if Mr. Knott will read and carefully and prayerfully study the good book in which the Lord has revealed his will and intentions to a sinful and unappreciativ world, he will find evidence there that will reconcile him to the crude theological notions about God, and the sacred absurdities, cruelties, and falsehoods countenanced by the infallible church. If he still rebels against the way the king of the universe carries on business, he can get the pope's or Dr. Monroe's signature to an affidavit attesting to the truthfulness of my statements. Oh, how painful to contemplate that we hav a reader of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER who is so singularly constituted as to necessitate a constant search for original (or stale, just as you please) evidence of God's trinity! And this, too, when that book of priceless value, the Lord's own word, is full and overflowing with such proofs! When Brother Knott again desires to respus, to "spite out," his objections to the bases of Christianity, I suggest the advisability of his reading up on the Bible and the Catholic catechism. Herein he will discover food for thought, and be introduced into the laboratory where the materials necessary for the proper prosecution of that religion are manufactured. Thus he would be supplied with the information he seeks; and all such information, I may add, is conduciv to life everlasting.

Fifth, again, Mr. Knott wants to know how it was found out that God had a son, or that God has said this, and done thus and so. This is an unfeeling, blasphemous question, and will no doubt touch the tender religious sensibilities of the reader. Evidently the brother is one of God's implacable enemies, but he will hav to excuse me this time, for I can only answer him by referring him to the above-named catechism, and if he would learn more of the mysterious operations of the only true and Godlike religion, our dear Christianity, let him consult it frequently. Having answered Brother Knott to the best of my ability, thus saving them from such wholesome labors in the vinyard, I hope soon to be upon the most excellent terms with the sky-steerers.

PROVIDENCE, June 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I took occasion in my last letter to giv my opinions in relation to Spiritualism. There hav been a few allusions to them, but not until May 9th was my name used so that I could really tell whether they were intended for me or not. Now Mary A. Vore takes me in hand (together in common with other Materialists whom she classes as "supremely ignorant") in such a manner that I must say something in return. She commences by flattering the editor, who, it will be hoped, will not be deluded by her "taffy," and jump from the solid foundation of Materalism into the quicksands of Spiritualistic belief.

There are several points I should like to touch upon, but do not wish to be too lengthy. She refers to Materalists as "setting up men of straw." Now these, although of very light material, I certainly think contain more substance than the forms which Spiritualists "set up," and call people names for not being able to see them. I am pleased to note that she admits there are swindling mediums, and also that there are a great diversity of opinions among Spiritualists as to what Spiritualism is. If that is true, it would not be at all strange if I should err in my judgment in relation to the subject.

She says: "I know even with more certainty than I know the earth is globular, that life, individualized human life, survives the grave, for the evidence I hav of the rotundity of the earth comes to me second hand." She seems to be somewhat favored, while I am not permitted to learn anything about my dead friends, except at second-hand, the same as she says she gets her science. In my letter I alluded to Spiritualism as a semi-religious society. She says, "They [the Materialists] will persist, among other errors, in calling Spiritualism a 'religion,' and so treating it." George Chainey delivered a lecture in this city last fall, and if he was reported correctly by a local paper, he spoke of Spiritualism as a religion, and said that it took hold of humanity's cause where previous religions left off. A convention of Spiritualists was held in this city a short time since, and at least two of the speakers took the same ground—that Spiritualism supplied the want of religion. Now what is religion? It is a system of supernaturalism, fraud, and hypocrisy, based upon the hopes and fears of mankind. What is Spiritualism? It is a system of supernaturalism, fraud, and trickery, based upon the hopes of mankind. The poet says:

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast"—

Hope that somehow or somewhere beyond this life there is, or at least should be, something more in store for the human family than the usually miserable existence we drag out here; and from that hope hav sprung up systems of fraud claiming to be able to gratify it; but in reality it has proved to hav been one of the most debasing and gigantic systems of human slavery ever inflicted upon mankind.

Spiritualism treats of life beyond the grave the same as religion. Religion says you may liv as you may, only believe a few moments before you die, and it will be all right; you will go to heaven, hav a harp, sing praises evermore, and enjoy yourself immensely in plain sight of nine-tenths of the human race suffering eternal torments; among whom may be some of your own immediate friends, which, however, will not mar your happiness, but only serve to increase your joy. Spiritualism says after you hav ceased to breathe you will pass into spirit-land (wherever that may be), and there you will be permitted to roam at large; you can mingle with your friends upon this earth; you can see them suffer, languish, and finally die; you may know the remedy that would touch this case, perhaps save them, but you will not be permitted to do so because the "conditions" are not right, nor will you be allowed to communicate with them except through the catch-penny seance of some juggling medium.

The devotees of religion sing, "Salvation's free," and yet you cannot get one spoonful of it except by paying pew rent, or donating to some pious fanatic. Spiritualists demand a fee for admission into their seances, and unless you pay that fee you will not hav the privilege of receiving a message from any of your friends in the "spirit-land," notwithstanding that communication may be the means of your conversion to Spiritualism. And so I might continue comparing the two systems, but will not.

I am led to inquire at this point why we do not get some communications from men of science—from Humboldt in relation to his cosmos, or from Charles Darwin with some information as to whether his theory of evolution will progress beyond this life. Why do we not get some communication from some one with brains—from them direct, not leached through the half idiotic spirit brain of some Indian squaw, and then peddled out for money through the trick performance of a medium?

But I think I shall be obliged to drop the Spiritualists. In the language of the Bible, "They are joined to their idols; let them alone."

SOUTH BOSQUE, TEXAS, May 23, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I admire your cartoon, "Modern Balaam," and send you 10 cents for as many as you can afford for that sum. If you will make it larger or make a chromo of it I will take $1 worth as soon as I learn of it. Puck had a picture about two years ago that I would like to see reproduced in THE TRUTH SEEKER, viz., "An Ineffectual Attempt to Muzzle the Great Watch Dog of Science," or some such title; an attempt to suppress Liberal literature by the clergy of London, Herbert Spencer being the "Watch Dog." It was splendid and appropriate.

D. F. MARRS.

DETROIT, MICH., June 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me copies of the "Modern Balaam" to the amount of fifty cents. For the other fifty cents send me the colored lithograph of the monument. I did intend to honor myself by subscribing to the Monument Fund, but circumstances prevented it, and I hav procrastinated too long studying how to get the picture. I now expect to hav lots of fun and great satisfaction in placing "Modern Balaam" where it will be most attractiv to the asses. Christ said: "Think not I hav come to bring peace, but a sword." He came to set father against son and mother against daughter; and I will be enabled with that picture to greatly assist the great reformer in that kind of work. A Hebrew barber, to whom I described it on Saturday evening, says he will hav it up in his shop, and I shall try and place them all in the most conspicuous places possible, and in the care of those who will answer all objectors.

J. H. WOOD.

BROADVIEW, N. W. T., May 19, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I feel ashamed of my neglect in not sending you your due for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but don't stop it, for it is the best companion I hav ever had, and I would feel as much lost without it as a papist without his cross. Inclosed find $1, which you can place to my credit, and fifty cents for "Bible Morals" and your ALMANAC. The balance of subscription you may expect soon, as times are getting better since the rebellion, thanks to Mr. Reil, God, and other Indians.

I mail you to-day a Manitoba paper wherein you will see by Riel's letter that God is working hand in hand with the hostil Indians, but if the old man and his insurgents leave my scalp alone you will get the balance due you soon.

I hav a hot time here with the gospel preachers, teachers, and seekers. They seem determined to teach my children (two little boys) their doctrin, and when they can't compel me to send them to Sunday-school they hav formed a sort of praying business in the day-school. I gave my children orders to get up and walk out of school until they had their prayers over, or not go in until they were through; but the teacher made them disobey me and gave them to understand that their father was a liar and a very bad man. My youngest, six years old, told the teacher that his pa wouldn't lie and that there was no God or Santa Claus either. They talk now of keeping my children from going to school, and I guess they can do it, as we hav no regular school section or school law in this place yet. The parents pay so much per week, but it will soon be a thing of the past, and then we will see if my children will go to school or not.

You will see by the paper I send that the half-breeds are conquered, but the Indians are on the war-path; yet it is the best thing that could hav happened for the good of this country, as it and everyone in it was about bankrupt, though I don't believe in paying for anything in blood no matter how good it may be; but it is a great advertisment for the country and has brought a few millions of money into the Northwest Territory, and I hope it may end at once.

W. P. WEST.

ONTARIO, CAL., May 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.00—$1.50 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER, 25 cents for the ANNUAL, and $1.25 for the "Story Hour." Although money is scarce and times hard, yet I feel as though I could not do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It gets more and more interesting. I like to read the letters, and get the different ideas of people, especially on the temperance question, and I fully agree with H. H. Hutchinson; also Mr. Malcolm on the money question, and Mr. Hunt regarding labor and capital.

Now, of all the questions of the day this is one that should engage the attention of every true Liberal. All the trades unions and labor unions that were ever organized can never be of any benefit to the working class until they are conducted under a different principle from what they are at present. How are the laboring classes benefited by the strikes we are continually reading of? They only tend to make matters worse for them. Now there is a way out of the trouble, and to my mind the hint given by Mr. E. E. Park, April 25th, might be carried out in all or nearly all branches of business, and especially agricultural pursuits. And I would suggest that if the working class of Liberals and Freethinkers form themselvs into secular co-operation societies for this purpose, they let none but workers in. Hav your officers, that is, president, treasurer, secretary, and foremen in the dffierent departments chosen from yourselvs. Let all work for a common treasury. The hours might be six or seven.

And here I will suggest that southern California would be one of the best places in the world for such a union. I will giv some of the industries that might be followed: Fruit-growing of all kinds, canning, and drying the same; raising of chickens and eggs; sericulture; also keeping bees for honey. Many others might be added, and carried out by the same union on a small piece of land. For instance, the society is small at first, say only twenty-five, about fifty acres would be large enough. Add to that as the society should grow. The number might run into the thousands and still add to and keep work for all. Old and young, male and female, all might find homes and interest in the common brotherhood. And what more lovely employment could be found? Truly we might hav the Garden of Eden without the forbidden fruit. Families might hav their private homes, while the single might hav their hotels or boarding-houses, with board set at a low figure, all under the management of the union.

I am a resident of Ontario, southern California, and will say that right here is a grand opening for a canning factory and fruit-drying establishment. The union might be started now and run that part, together with the poultry, while the grounds were being prepared for the planting of trees for another spring. I suggest this because there is no need of any delay. I, for one, would be glad to join such a union, and can find others right here. We can also make up some amount of capital. I should like to hear from others, either through THE TRUTH SEEKER or privately, and shall be glad to answer any questions. I hav lived North, South, East, and West, and will say this is the finest climate and country I ever knew, and the healthiest. Pure air, and plenty of pure water.

C. B. JOHNS.

MINNEAPOLIS, KAN., May 19, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Crimes of Preachers," and think it one of the best gems that I ever came across. I can get the preachers where the wool is short. Several of my neighbors hav seen it already, and I havn't had it a week yet. All who see it say, "How do those fellows find all those things out?" Then I ask them how they feel to be led by such pilots.

I hope that all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who hav money to spare will send for everything that contains Freethought, and scatter it all over their neighborhood, and as far as they possibly can. I, for one, will do all I can in that direction. I hav been a subscriber for only a short time (some six months), and to-day find only two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER in my house.

J. H. FREEMAN.

MORRISTOWN, N. J., May 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I shall be under an everlasting obligation to you and to the Liberal readers of your paper, if you or they will inform me if you or they know of an invalid lady who would want a young girl to travel with her as her traveling companion, that is, which includes everything she would want me to do for her. If you or the persons will inform me through the columns of your paper if you know of one, I will write to the lady if she would want me. I shall leave the place named at the heading of my letter, and am going some where else, so for that reason I would like to hear about it through the columns of your paper, which I always manage to get from a friend no matter where I am.

Sum it up in a few words, THE TRUTH SEEKER is a truth seeker after the truth. It is the best of all Liberal papers for me.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A PRIZE TO WRITE FOR.

Our young friends should not forget that Lossing and Spencer's "Complete History of the United States" is offered as a prize for the best story contributed to the Children's Corner before August 15th. The story need not be more than three columns in length (about 2 400 words). Send the manuscript to Miss Wixon at the address given above.

A June Morning.

A wind with a song of ocean
Came after a night of rain,
And the balm of poplar branches
Blew over the western plain;
A shower of golden flax-bells
Fluttering down on the prairie grass,
Through the windy glens where wild bees
Disputed every pass.

'Twas one of the bright clean mornings
When the world seems newly made,
And the human heart grows tender,
And the birds are less afraid;
When the young trees spring as legion,
Just born of their winged seeds,
And their leaves are veined with crimson
Where the mists are held like beads.

Where the plow had been upturning
The soil in the walnut ground,
I walked all the fresh rows over;
And some of the things I found
Were clouds of white wings coming
From the river miles away—
The ghost-like seeds of cottonwoods,
The trees of a golden day.

Wild roses, and roses, and roses,
In the low box-elder grove;
Red roses among the willow trees
Where the velvet spider wove;
Pink roses along the wheat fields,
And such a liquid song
From the white rose near the lark's nest,
Where the grass was lush and long.

The "wild rye" slowly waving,
As a host of sickles swung,
Measuring the time in heart-beats
Of a song that's never sung.
Its spears hav laid the grass lands
In a wave of fallen sheen,
Through all its whitening harvest
Not a gleaner comes between.

There was purple grass and golden,
Silver when the dew was on,
Bending their plumes to the roses
When the blue-bell's dream was gone;
O pink leaves like to sea shells,
Come swift to my waiting band,
And sing to me sweet, my roses,
Your songs of the wester-land.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY B. FINCH.

Onset.

Would you like me to tell you about Onset, where I am living this summer? Look in your map of New England and find Buzzard's Bay on the Massachusetts coast. West of that you will note a smaller body of water, and that is known as Onset Bay. Several little islands dot its smooth surface, and one large one, comprising a large tract of land covered over with a fine growth of oak, pine, birch, and cedar. It is a part of the town of Wareham, connected with it by a bridge. This is Onset, which within the past few years has been converted into a lovely and attractiv summer resort. If I am correctly informed, it was never settled by white people until 1877, when the first house was erected on what is now termed the South Boulevard. Since that time, year after year, as its beauty of location, its cool and healthful breezes, its charming and romantic scenery, became known, more cottages and hotels hav been built, until now the whole island is dotted over with little gems of dwellings, as well as neat, commodious hotels for summer rest and repose.

There is a large auditorium for meetings. I omitted to mention that the place was originally purchased by Spiritualists for a camping ground, but has gradually grown into a watering place exceedingly attractiv to everyone of whatever creed or belief. There is, also, a large cathedral, or temple, a skating rink, and a school-house where a school is now in session.

The island is nearly encircled by high bluffs, surmounted by fine young trees, which overlook the water and are consanttly fanned by cool and invigorating breezes upon which are wafted the spicy and refreshing breath of sweet fern, bay-berry, juniper, and many other health-giving herbs. The boating and fishing are excellent, and fleets of handsome yachts, and all sorts of tiny crafts, float hither and thither on the smooth waters of the bay, while excursion steamers come in and out of the harbor, like majestic birds stooping low while on the wing from port to port.

These perfect June days are glorious from beginning to end, and every one is the color of the roses that are coming into bloom in the hedges and along the highways and by-ways of this old, yet new, country place.

Every morning the wild birds carol such sweet melody as is never heard within city limits though one liv there ten thousand years. The woods are fairly alive with birds, and each one sings his own sweet song. The dear old robin red-breast lures us with the same tuneful notes we heard in infancy. The bob-o-links, the pewees, the chick-a dee dee, the butcher bird, the cat bird with its peculiar me-ow so much like the scream of a cat, the whip-poor-will, all send out their peculiar and well-known notes. The golden oriole sings his song of melody, while the blue bird lifts his clear, flute-like voice, and bewitches us with his pure minstrelsy.

" Sweet song-bird, robed in softest blue,
Proudly the grand old tree
Holds high its arms so stout and true.
Is he not fond of thee?
Thy nest is trimmed with beads of dew,
Thy eggs a radiant rosary."

There is no jealously, no rivalry, among these singers in the trees, but each one does his "level best," and is apparently glad if another can do better.

A papa and mamma robin hav built their nest next door to me in a corner of a piazza, and as I write the mother bird is feeding her four little babies, who stretch up their little necks and open wide their mouths to receive their morning meal.

The tide is growing low, and as the waters slowly recede the great king crabs, or "horse feet," as some call them, can be seen swimming among tangles of sea-weed, close to the shore. Yesterday I took off my shoes and stockings and waded in the water ankle-deep, and brought two of these queer-looking fish to land. It was such fun; how I wished the children were here! The king crab is shaped like a horse's shoe, and has a hard and horny shell, and moves quite rapidly. Lively little fellows are the "fiddlers," that are hopping all about the beach. "Bonnie," my dog, has great sport catching them and tossing them in the air. They are a species of crab, and are used for bait by fishermen. They travel sidewise, and hav little nests in the sand, into which they dive on the approach of footsteps. They can bite, too, when disturbed, as Bonnie found, to his chagrin, when he took one in his mouth. Bonnie is learning to dig clams, and you would laugh to see the little fellow dig, dig, dig, dig in the sand with his two forefeet, and then with his teeth pull out a big, white-shelled clam, and march off with it as proud and grand as a king.

There are many little boys and girls roaming along the shore, gathering pebbles and shells, jumping and dancing and enjoying these lovely days to the very utmost.

I think of one dear child who has gone to come no more, and my heart is very sad, for I know how much her mind was in tune with nature, and how sweet would be life to her amid these bright influences. Eagerly I look into the faces of the little ones I meet, hoping to see one who might chance to resemble her who was once the light of my eyes, the hope of my heart; but all are different; there are none like her anywhere.

I look up to the blue sky, upon which flocks of cumuli float lazily and serenely, and down where, beneath the window, a robin is scratching a luncheon for his babies, and looking up occasionally, as if he would say, "'Tis a beautiful world that we liv in.

" Gather the roses while you may,
Old time is still a-flying,
And this same flower that blooms to-day
To-morrow may be dying."

A woodpecker is busily engaged pecking holes in a tree close by, and has never a thought, apparently, but that the world was made for him.

Bonnie is teasing me for a run in the woods, and lest I should grow too sad if I stay indoors, I will go and gather some buttercups and violets, and read the lesson that they teach, and some time I will tell you more about this sweet summer home at Onset.

A Letter from a Teacher.

MANISTEE, MICH., May 28, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is ever so long since I heard from you, and, in a fit of desperation, I hav seated myself with writing utensils to write you a few lines descriptiv of my new home.

My school closed May 8th, and the following day I left Bear Lake for Brown Town, where I was previously engaged to teach.

I am away out in the back woods, and can commune with nature all the time if I wish to. The country is very wild indeed. I wish you could see the large extent around me where, for miles, there is not a single home. Only the black and charred trunks of tall pine-trees lift their heads to tell what has been in the past and to testify to the destructiv power of the terrible fires which sweep through their midst. Young trees are growing up, but it will be many years before they are large enough to use for lumber. A thick underbrush renders it very difficult to penetrate far into them. Berries of all kinds are abundant, and as there are very few people around here there are enough for us all to eat our fill.

The spring flowers are gone now, but I do not think I ever saw any more beautiful trailing arbutus than I hav seen here. It is much larger than with us, and the flowers are very perfect indeed. My desk has been literally covered with the sweet Mayflowers, and the air of the room filled with their fragrance. I am fed on wintergreen-berries at recess and begin to like them.

I am living in a veritable log house, and teaching in a log school-house. The houses are comfortable and clean. In regard to cooking utensils they are rather in advance of some of my Eastern friends. The very nicest kinds of ranges grace the kitchens, and cooking utensils of the newest patterns are found in daily use. We hav plenty of ventilation, without opening windows, through the cracks and crevices.

It is a logging region, and before long I hope to pay a visit to the camps and gain some idea of the life the river drivers lead.

The musketoes are terrible, and are so thick that, sometimes, life seems unbearable. About six o'clock we make a smudge in an old iron kettle and smoke them out. Such a dense smoke as we do hav! The room is fairly blue. When we think it has been in operation long enough, the kettle is removed. After that comes the grand massacre of any poor musketoes who hav dared to remain and retain their homes in our sleeping-rooms. Armed with an old apron or towel, you rush frantically about until the foe has been exterminated. Peace reigns for a short time, and then, jingle-jangle you hear the bells in the distance, and gradually it comes nearer and nearer. The cows must be very domestic, for they stand near the windows to giv you the benefit of their music. Should a man pass the house, three dogs salute him with growls and barks. Some one has written a poem on "Sounds in the Night." I could not write poetry, but think I could do justice to the subject in a prose article.

I hav only fifteen scholars and they are all related. It is the only family school I was ever in before. The whole district numbers four families. Strange as it may seem to you, there is as much rivalry as in larger communities. I am perfectly oblivious to it all and don't see any little petty assumptions on the part of the children unless they are forced upon me.

The year past has been a profitable one to me. I am gaining more self-control and self-reliance every day, and hav a more just appreciation of my own powers. I want to rise and gain a good position, and I am studying this summer to be in readiness when the way opens, and I can enter the fair land which I know will come to me for my feet to tread if I am only patient, persevering, and courageous. Yours with love, H.

"Tim."

They said the train was an hour behind time, and that information made us all feel put out and annoyed. Therefore, when a boy of about fourteen, poorly dressed and having a trampish look, came along the platform asking for financial aid to get him down to R—— on the train we were waiting for, it was but natural that one and all replied:

"If you want to go to R—— take the dirt road! You look as if you were used to tramping!"

He had no saucy word in reply. When he went and stood in the light of the window, and I saw how he shivered in the cold wind, and how worried and anxious he seemed to be, I grew ashamed of my gruff words. I saw two or three others look him over as I had done, and I had no doubt that they felt as I did. I ought to hav walked up to the boy and said:

"Here, my lad, if you really want to go down to R——, I'm willing to help you. Take this half dollar. How happens it that a lad of your age is cold, ragged, hungry, and away from home and friends?"

But I didn't. I edged toward him, ashamed, and yet not quite ready to acknowledge it to him, and all of a sudden he disappeared. I reasoned that he had gone up the hill to the village, and that his pretending to want to go to R—— was all trick to beat honest men. When you reason that way the heart grows hard pretty fast, and you feel a bit revengeful. We talked the matter over—four or five of us—and the conclusion was that the boy would die on the gallows.

Well, the train came along after awhile; and it was moving away, after a brief stop, when a piercing shriek, followed by shouts and calls, brought us to a stop.

"Somebody's been run over!" called a voice, and in a moment the coaches were emptied.

Yes, somebody had been run over—had a leg cut off above the knee by one of the cruel wheels. Who was it? How did it happen? It was our boy—the lad who was to end his days on the gallows. He had crept under the coach to steal a ride on the trucks. There he was having only a few minutes to liv—his face as white as the snow banks—his eyes roving from face to face—his lips quivering as twenty men bent down and spoke words of sympathy.

"Who are you?" asked the conductor.

"Tim!"

"You shouldn't hav tried it."

"But I wanted to get to R—— so bad! I was up here to find work, but nobody would hav me, and yesterday I heard that mother was dead!"

"But anybody would hav given you sixty cents to pay your fare."

"Oh, no they wouldn't. I asked lots and lots of men and they said I ought to be in jail. I—I—wanted—!"

There we were—the half dozen of us who had repelled him with insult—wrung his heart still more—sent him to his horrible death under the wheels! We dared not look into his face—we even shunned each other.

If it could only come to pass again—if heaven would but send him back to earth and let him stand before us as he did that winter's night—but it is too late!—Detroit Free Press.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—NUMERICAL ENIGMA.

"Behold, all the hairs of your head
Are numbered," the savior has said;
Not a hair or a sparrow can fall,
But the deity notices all.
He also has told us, good lack!
We "can't make one hair white or black,"
And yet both the barbers and birds
Are dy(e)ing in spite of his words.
And now even I will proceed
To number the hairs of a weed;
The velvety nap, pi.e, or down,
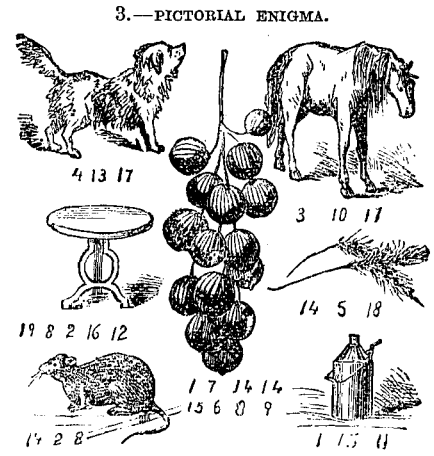
That on such as the mullein is shown:
To 6 just a id 50 and then 51—
Why, children, you'll find you can do it like fun.



REKAB SEMAJ.

2.—CONUNDRUM.

How are these two animals on the question of beer?

3.—PICTORIAL ENIGMA.

Three things that every boy and girl likes. The figures represent the letters in their order.

"'Little Lessons' are grand. I hashed and rehashed the lesson on spiders this evening in the Sunday-school. I am running two Sunday-schools. The children are slow in learning the mystery of the God-head; in comprehending the Trinity; but their eyes brighten and they take kindly to discourses on snails, toads, spiders, and lizards, so I think I'll keep it up."—Bertie Stone.

Poetry.

The Faith Cure.

Who says the good old days hav fled
That fondly nourished superstition,
When charms could conjure up the dead,
And men believed each wild tradition?

When simple wights devoid of brains
Did penance as a cure for phthisic,
And doctors for all stomach pains
Prescribed long prayers instead of physic?

When kings the scrofula could cure,
And bruised ones, for each fresh disaster,
Counted a priest's touch far more sure
Than arnica and sticking plaster?

Go to, thou simple one, to-day
We hav the same old superstition;
We tread once more the well-worn way,
And Faith is now the great magician.

Lotions and drugs hav lost their power,
Blisters and pills no longer needed,
Cripples are cured now in an hour,
Throw crutches by and dance unheeded.

Victims of rheumatism's pain
Renounce physicians and their errors,
Dyspeptic ones are on the gain,
And gout has lost it's old-time terrors.

Ye boards of health who trembling stand,
Let cholera now no more alarm ye,
The antidote we hav at hand
In faith and the Salvation Army.

What miracles are working now
I could not half begin to mention;
To cure us priests are telling how,
And gaping crowds are all attention.

A piece of mud from Chapel Knock
Cured Mrs. Murphy of the colic,
And gave her husband quite a shock
To hav her well and spoil his frolic.

A draught of Lourdes water brought
A crippled Frenchman's leg in order,
And saved a shivering wretch who thought
His spree would take him o'er the border.

Miss Artichoke for years had lain
A paralyzed and helpless creature;
Doctors and cures were tried in vain,
Till faith, at last, arrived to teach her.

Salvationists, who passed that way
Last week, prayed for her long and hearty,
Presto! she rose, and walked next day
Some six miles to a quilting party,

Of wondrous cures each day we hear,
And every one givs greater promis;
Physicians, ah! I fear, I fear
Your day is surely going from us.

Doctors must go, for flesh is grass,
And cannot stand such competition,
And those who hav no faith, alas!
How sad will then be their condition,

It seems as if the clergy might
Hav been content with their vocation!
But somehow they still keep in sight
The notes we hav in circulation.

And now each shrewd exhorter lugs
Into his trade the art of healing,
Nor has to spend a cent for drugs.
Fy! fy! 'tis hardly less than stealing.

How sad to see these learned men
Spending their time in such delusion,
Hunting for miracles, and then
Drawing an impotent conclusion.

What wonder that your minds decay
When moored amid these silly preachings—
That thoughtful thousands, day by day,
Are growing skeptic to your teachings.

Vainly you bid their doubts depart;
The world is slowly growing stronger
From mental weakness, and your art
Is taxed to keep your hold much longer.

Speed, speed the day when blinded eyes
Shall open to a happier season,
And truth untrammeled shall arise
To reign throughout the Age of Reason.

MAN'S BIRTHRIGHT; or, The Higher Law of Property. By E. H. G. Clark. Price, 75 cts. Sold at this office.

Mr. Clark is not a believer in the leveling process of Communism, but he sees that here "in the United States the various systems of monopoly, aided by political corruption, hav been the means of turning between two and three millions of people out of employment, and hav reduced the average workman to eighty-five cents a day on which to support his family," and he thinks "it is time to giv serious attention to the rights of mankind in relation to property." The result of this serious attention on Mr. Clark's part is "Man's Birthright." The premises of the book are that the country is going to the dogs; the conclusion is that it ought not to; the means to prevent it he givs is to tax the wealth of the country just two per cent. Why the wealth should be taxed just this much and no more is learned from the following simple statement:

"The people own the earth—own it while they liv on it—each generation while they possess it. But the people die. Turning to the tables of statistics, we find that two in every hundred die yearly. Now, if such is the case, two per cent of a country's wealth falls back annually into the common estate. If, at the death of every citizen who now passes away from the earth, his effects should be seized by their sovereign owner, it would take just fifty years for the reversion of present individual property to the general store. But this direct reversion is not the thing wanted; for the whole property would only hav to be again distributed into individual hands in order to make it yield its full value to anyone. If we consider the matter a moment, however, we perceive that the table of human mortality—the average death-rate—fixes the precise annual share of the people in all property. If the wealth of the earth reverts from one generation to another every fifty years, then one-fiftieth, or just two per cent, reverts in one year. Thus the interest of the estate—what must be termed the 'natural rent' of it—is exactly two per cent ad valorem. The share of the sovereign owner, therefore, may be simply levied and collected in the form of a tax."

Having thus settled the matter off-hand, Mr. Clark is waiting for the world to grow to him. His book is tersely, forcibly, and brilliantly written, and it may be that he is right, but if so everybody else is wrong. However, this latter contingency is no reason whatever why the book should not be studied, for in the past a single clear-headed man has often upset the notions of whole peoples. And there must be some way out of our present social trouble, which is growing greater day by day.

WORKING PEOPLE'S RIGHTS, By a Printer. Co-operative Printing Co. Price 10 cents.

This is another panacea for the labor-world's woes. The author has considerable more affection for Henry George and the Communists and Socialists than has Mr. Clark, but his remedy is less radical than that of the author of "Man's Birthright." Eventual justice will, he thinks, be secured by a recognition of these rights:

I. All men are born free and, with respect to rights, equal.

II. The land of a country is nature's trust to all the citizens of the nation.

III. All wealth is created by labor, and by labor only, and in equity belongs to labor only.

IV. The equal, natural, and unalienably right of every citizen to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness involves the right of free access to a share in nature's resources.

The author would then hav American workmen adopt the following platform:

1. The repeal of the laws under which public land now passes into private possession, the most of it by fraud.

2. The forfeiture of unearned land grants to railroads.

3. The revocation of treaties with Indian tribes whereby vast tracts of lands are closed to small farmers, but opened to large cattle companies.

4. The prohibition of the possession of land by foreigners or non-resident Americans.

5. The forfeiture to the state of agricultural lands not cultivated, and urban lands not improved.

6. The fixing of the maximum amount in value of land to be acquired by any one citizen by gift, purchase, or inheritance.

7. The Abolition of national and state taxes, save those on land values.

8. The conversion of title to lands now held in fee simple, on their transferral from the present possessors to others by any method whatsoever, into leases from the government for the longest practicable period, subject to renewals to the holders at official valuations, the taxes being payment for the leases, possession being thus made secure in the holding of all lands not exceeding in value the maximum fixed by law.

9. The passage of a homestead law as a substitution for the present land laws, by which public lands may be leased to settlers in lots to suit in the manner prescribed for lands in the previous paragraph.

10. The encouragement of labor by extending to settlers upon public lands sufficient aid to enable them to get transportation to a place of settlement, and to sustain life until a crop is raised, annual interest on the sum borrowed to be paid by the borrower until the principal be paid, the maximum loan to be fixed by law, and penalties to be attached to a violation of faith with the government; this step being taken in accordance with a precedent established by Congress in extending aid in land and money to capitalists in the building of the Pacific roads, under the mistaken policy of thus assisting its citizens to small parcels of public lands, but which has resulted in establishing vast estates held by corporations and a foreign aristocracy, and in defrauding the United States Treasury and the American people of hundreds of millions of dollars.

There is in this book, as in Mr. Clark's, much meaningless talk about what "God" intended men to hav. Such idle sentiments are a detriment to the cause advocated, for the arguments from the God side of the question are all against reform and in favor of existing institutions, with class rule and monopoly. Under the "divine" idea has grown up a social organization which proves to be unequal and detrimental to the interests of the larger portion of the human race. What is needed is a new start from the vantage ground of science, and in such a scheme there is no use for the obstructing idol whose worship and obedience to whose supposed commands hav been the rivets in the enslaving chain. In this country, too, the people are very much to blame for having allowed laws to be enacted and to stand by which one part of society gets about nine times as much as the other portion. For instance, the projectors, promoters, and management of the Pacific Railroad hav been enabled, through controling Congress, to wax rich, while the farmers and settlers along the line hav been left as poor as before, though they are a majority and could hav sent men to Congress who would hav seen to it that a railroad built by the people's money should be run in the people's interest. So with the workingmen of New York, in whose defense and for whose enlightenment the "Working People's Rights" is written. They are ignorant of their power and careless of their votes, and are controled by the church to their own destitution and ultimate slavery to theocracy and plutocracy. If they could comprehend what the papers contained, there ought to be weekly distributed among the dollar-a-day laborers of this city a million copies of both THE TRUTH SEEKER, to educate them as to the real tendency of the church, and of John Swinton's Paper to teach them their own power under democratic republican government. But if they die starving, they will still say, "God is good;" and though the politicians sell them out seventy times seven times they will continue to vote as directed. Brass bands and fireworks hav a thousand times as much influence with them as arguments. Therefore the workingmen's platform in this work will never be more than the formulation of an ideal—a thing to be hoped for, but not realized—until the lethargy of superstitious ignorance is thrown off.

THE BAD BOY AT HOME. His Experiences in trying to Become an Editor. Price 25 cents.

This book is alleged to be the funniest of the age, but the allegation is false. The most humorous thing about it is that anyone should ever hav printed it.

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY. By G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler. London; Progressiv Publishing Co. Price 5 cents.

The two authors of this tract (which is well described by the title) are doing a good work in England in exposing the prevailing religion. They are able men, fluent and interesting writers, and energetic publishers. In this tract new cases of Christian cruelty are unearthed, and new authors cited as authorities. We wish every English reading Christian could hav a copy.

ANCIENT CREEDS AND MODERN CUSTOMS. By James Manderfield. London: Watts & Co. Price 10 cents.

A very nicely printed pamphlet of sixteen pages showing the similarity of the systems of the alleged Moses and the pope—both beggars. The gist of the essay is that the more superstitiously religious people are, the more freely will they bleed financially for the benefit of their gods. "Any creed that piety may conjure up can become popular; but the money which it can beg will always be the standard of its respectability and the proof of its merit. Thus every mode of worship which man can invent is but a newly-found lucky-stone for pious credulity to caress."

From the same author and publishers is "Fashionable Belief versus the Logic of Facts." The price is about 25 cents. It is an essay in answer to the Christian assertions that the Bible is the only rule of conduct for mankind, that Christ is a savior of sinners, and that the Old Testament prophecies were fulfilled. Mr. Manderfield is a clear and scholarly writer, makes his points forcibly, and seems to thoroughly understand his subjects. He is not, however, very radical, and wars more particularly with the "mint and cumin" of Christianity than in exposing the inherent impossibility of its being true. His pamphlets are, however, first-class documents to put into the hands of Unitarians and thinkers of that class to induce them to come up higher.

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

The Missing Link —IN— MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. CONSULTING ROOMS,

Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

FIRST TIMOTHY, ii, 13, informs us that Adam was first formed, then Eve, which is Paul's authority for woman's submission to her husband. What reasoning! Animals were made before Adam; should Adam, then, be ruled by his ox or his ass?—O. B. Whitford.

THE enormous apologetic literature designed to reconcile faith and reason is a sufficient proof that the reconciliation is a necessity for the old faith—and that it is an impossibility. The ablest thinkers are always taking up the impossible problem afresh, and the emptiest charlatan tries to surround himself with serene halos of scientific twaddle. Science, moreover, touches men's interests at so many points that it has the key of the position. The common sense of mankind, as well as their lower passions, would crush any open attack upon the tangible material results of modern scientific progress. Science means steam-engins, telegraphy, and machinery, and, whether the reflection be consolatory or the reverse, we may be fully confident that all the power of all the priests and all the philosophers in the world would be as idle wind if directed against these palpable daily conveniences.—Leslie Stephen.

IF we indeed are sure our faith is best,
Then may we dare to leave it large and free,
Nor fear to bring the creed to reason's test:
For best is strongest, fearing not to see
As well as feel. Then welcome, Liberty!
Down with the scaffolding the priest demands!
Let truth stand free, alone, a house not built with hands! —C. P. Cranch

WHERE are the footprints of the ancient dead
Who dwelt and wrought in Rome and made mankind?
What memory hav the mighty left behind
In this imperial place where they were bred?
Like minute sands the centuries hav sped
To cover nations with their dust-cloud blind;
Fragments of beauty past are all we find,
Whose purpose, with the flying years, is fled.
In this vast universe is left no place
For that fleet breath that fleeting man calls "fame.":
These stones, that mind us of some fading name,
And watched the passing of earth's strongest race
Will vanish too; the long years hold no grace
For earth's memorials of praise and blame.
—The Spectator.

IT is a verbal objection merely that what is without God is not religion. As a question of mere language, this objection is captious and unsound. The nature-worshipers, the sun-worshipers or fire-worshipers, Confucianism, Buddhism, hav perfectly real religions, although they do not admit God. If we take the whole world and all ages, the religions which start from the idea of God hav not embraced one-tenth of the human beings whose religion has started from some other idea. A religion, in ordinary speech and in good sense, is any system which binds masses of men into common beliefs, stimulates them to common action, and softens their hearts in one worship. That body of ideas by which a race of men are moved, which they believe as one man, and by which they liv and die, is a religion always. It is a mere accident whether this body of ideas includes the idea of God or not. Very often it does not.—Frederic Harrison.

SELF-LOVE, in its due degree, is as just and morally good as any affection whatever. Benevolence toward particular persons may be to a degree of weakness, and so be blamable; and disinterestedness is so far from being in itself commendable that the utmost possible depravity which we can in imagination conceive is that of disinterested cruelty.—Bishop Butler.

WHEN Socrates was condemned to die a friend said to him, "What I mourn for, Socrates, is the injustice with which they treat you." "What?" said Socrates, "would you prefer that I should suffer justly?"——It is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well-doing, rather than for evil-doing. —1 Peter iii, 17.

WHO can reasonably expect arguments and conviction from him in dealing with others whose understanding is not accustomed to them in dealing with himself, who does violence to his own faculties, tyrannizes over his own mind, and usurps the prerogativ that belongs to truth alone, which is to command assent by only its own authority—that is, by and in proportion to that evidence which it carries with it?—Locke's Essay on the Understanding.

A MAN that is young in years may be old in hours, if he hav lost no time; but that happeneth rarely. —Bacon's Essays.

FEAR to do base, unworthy things is valor;
If they be done to us, to suffer them
Is valor too.—Ben Jonson.

THE old philosophers—these most learned men—thought that there was in the mind itself something heavenly and divine. But if the chief good consisted in pleasure, as you Epicureans say, then it would be natural to wish to liv, day and night, in the midst of pleasure, without any interval or interruption, while all our senses were, as it were, steeped in and influenced wholly by pleasure. But who is there, who is worthy of the name of man, who would like to spend even the whole of one day in that kind of pleasure?—Cicero.

IF the ship [orthodox Christianity] is dragging her anchors before the rising gale, who can tell how much further she may be driven? However firm may be her present anchorage, it behooves us to look to leeward and see what rocks lie in the direction in the direction in which the wind is blowing. There is no difficulty in telling them off; the personal Deity a relic of old Jupiter; man a highly developed animal, having the same origin as the brutes from which he sprang, and distinguished from them only by the development of certain ideas; heaven the fairyland of the infant race; Providence the Santa Claus; the Bible a collection of ancient poetry, etc., etc. . . On such rocks all the religious and theological doctrins of the past go to wreck with the mythology of Greece and the belief in witchcraft.—North American Review.

Odds and Ends.

A BRIGHT story in grammar is told of a little school girl. "Quarrel," she parsed, "is plural." "Why?" "Because it takes two to make one."

"YES," said Jones, "when my wife gets mad she reminds me of a vessel under weigh." "How so?" inquired Smith. "Because she's got her rancor up."

A LITTLE grammar is a dangerous thing. "Johnny, be a good boy, and I will take you to the circus next year." "Take me now, pa. The circus is in the present tents."

PRETTY teacher: "Now, Johnny Wells, can you tell me what is meant by a miracle?" Johnny: "Yes, teacher. Mother says if you don't marry the new parson 'twill be a miracle."

SHAKSPERE will now hav to be revised in accordance with the biblical revision as follows:

Hear it not, Duncan, for it is the kneol
That summons thee to heaven or to sheol!

SAID Bobby to the minister at dinner: "Can a church whistle, Mr. Longprayer?" "Why do you ask?" "'Cos pa owes $12 back pew rent, and he says he's going to let the church whistle for it."

AT one of our colored churches the brethren were surprised at the shortness of the contributions, but their wonder ceased when they discovered that one of the collectors had tar in the top of his hat.

A BOY, presented with a pie to share with his sister, was told that in cutting it he must giv her the larger part. Reflecting a moment, he passed the pie to his sister, with the remark, "You cut it."

THIS remarkable statement occurs in the Cologne Gazette: "Switchman Schultz was caught by the wheels of a locomotiv yesterday and was instantly killed. A similar accident befell him last year."

"WHY are they called pyramids, pa?" asked Georgie, who was looking at a picture of those wonders of Egypt. "They are called pyramids, my son," replied his father, without hesitating, "because, you see, they appear amid the general desolation of the desert."

PARSON WHANGDOODLE BAXTER distinguished himself once more at the funeral of an aged colored man: "Our deceased brudder was married foah times during his life," said Whangdoodle, "but only one ob de widows am so fortunate as to be able to survive him long enough to be present on dis heah solemnious occashun."

MRS. MINKS: There it is again. Tobacco, always tobacco. What will you do when you get to heaven, where there are no spittoons? Mr. Minks: Perhaps there will be some there. Mrs. Minks: Indeed there won't. The idea! What will you do then, Mr. Minks? Just answer that. Mr. Minks: I really don't know, my dear, unless we can get seats near the edge.

JOHN HOWLAND, the barber, who was a violent Unitarian, got into a controversy with one of his customers, who was an Episcopalian. Finally, Mr. Howland said: "Who are you that knows so much more than the rest of us?" "Who am I?" said his aged opponent with his face covered with soap lather, "why, I am an humble, praying Christian you d—n heathen you!"

WHEN Helen of Troy did her Paris annoy
With remark that it was her intention
Very shortly to beam at the cake and ice cream
Acropolitan Feeders' convention,
The expression he made in return, it is said,
Put the Trojan coquet in a flurry,
And was she to blame when she heard him exclaim:
"I'm going to Helena, hurry?"

TOBACCO-SMOKING is a common thing in some of the rural churches in Holland. This suggests an idea. Let the clergymen who hav been asking why the people do not go to church, giv notice that hereafter gentlemen will be allowed to bring their cigars and morning papers with them and smoke and read during the hours of service, and it will not be long ere the pews will renew their old-time popularity.

"MY dear friend," said a minister at the beside of a sick man, "do you feel that you are prepared to die?" "I realize only too well that I am not," replied the sick man, feebly. "I would be glad to speak with you concerning matters which at this time must concern—" "You are very kind, sir," interrupted the patient, "but the physicians are holding a consultation, and I would like to learn their verdict first."

THE Sunday-school lesson was about Moses and the Israelites in the wilderness, and the teacher was asking questions of her scholars. "What did Moses strike the rock for?" she inquired. "For water," answered the class promptly. "Was Moses blessed for what he had done?" "No, ma'am." "Why not?" This was a poser for some time, but finally, a tough looking small boy held up his hand. "Well, Tommy, why not?" asked the teacher encouragingly. "'Cos, mum, he didn't strike it for beer."

AN Oshkosh minister relates the following incident: He was attending the spring meeting of a ministerial association in the Northwest. A certain minister, noted alike for his veracity and warm zeal, was opening the session with prayer. The day, which he forgot for the moment, was about as inclement as possible—rain, hail, and stormy wind. He prayed, "O Lord, we thank thee for this gathering, for the privilege of meeting each other once more, for the beautiful weather—which we had last fall."

"THERE," said a woman to a tramp, "is a nice dinner, but I shall expect you to saw a little wood for it." "Certainly, madam," politely replied the tramp, attacking the dinner with both hands, "but you will pardon me, I trust, if I venture to correct your English." "My what?" "Your English. Some modern authorities claim that grammar is played out. I know better. The word 'saw' is a verb, in this case, singular number and imperfect tense. You cannot say, 'I shall expect you to saw wood.' 'I shall expect you to see wood' is correct. If you will indicate the pile to me I will now look at it as I pass out."

Notes and Clippings.

SAM JONES, the revivalist of Georgia, according to the Kansas City Times, is a howling idiot.

IT is reported that the Prince of Wales was greatly pleased at his being selected to unveil the memorial statue of Darwin in London. He has a great esteem for the scientist's life-work.

MISS CLEVELAND, the president's sister, who has written a book, will hav a copy bound regardless of expense to be presented to Queen Victoria, who also calls herself something of a writer.

REMARKING on the fact that the Revised Old Testament has made its appearance, the Hollenberg, Kan., Argus remarks: "A half inch of dust will make it look as handsome as the old one ever did."

THE Reverends McGlynn and Littlejohn, in recent speeches, hav planned out a new civil service plank: No man should be put into office who is not a church-member. The politicians will at once "get religion."

THE Toronto Salvation Army has offered to supply two hundred men in place of striking laborers. The Salvationists might do more toward effecting the only salvation possible to those who work for a living by helping to sustain the strikers.

THE German government has discharged all women who were employed in its postal, telegraph, and railway service as clerks and in other capacities. As during the last twenty years they nearly monopolized such service in some towns, much suffering has ensued among the discharged. The motiv alleged is that women are unfit for such public service.

"WHY Not Eat Insects?" is the title of a recent English book. The writer thinks that such a diet would hav certain advantages for poor people, and he insists that an "appetizing relish" is to be found in "boiled caterpillars, fried grasshoppers, and grilled cockchafers." His argument rests mainly on the descriptions of half-starved travelers concerning their personal enjoyment of cooked insects, and the fact that certain savages thrive on such diet.

AT a fair and collation recently given for some church object a bad boy gained access to the lunch room some hours in advance of the regular performance, and did some disagreeable things. Between the crusts of the strawberry shortcake he bestowed a coating of mustard, infused kerosene oil into the pickle jars, distributed snuff in the ground coffee packages, and finding the "grab bag," dropped several cream cakes into it. The committee are searching for the boy.

WILLIS BOYD ALLEN told a Boston audience of a saloon-keeper who sprinkled liquor on the sidewalk in front of his dram shop for the purpose of tempting the appetite, through the sense of smell, of some poor victim. Many accepted the statement as a mere embellishment of a fictitious tale, but a city missionary who was present corroborated it. Another activ temperance worker related how carefully it is necessary to guard tanks in which icewater is kept, in places for reformed men, lest whisky be poured in surreptitiously.

THE oldest paper in the world, the Pekin Gazette, has lately taken a new lease of life. This venerable journal, alone almost in a changeless land, has changed its form. Established in the year 911, the Pekin Gazette has been published regularly since 1351. Under the new arrangement three editions are published: the first, the King-Paou, printed upon yellow paper, constitutes the official gazet of the Middle Kingdom; the second, the Hsing-Paou (commercial journal), also printed upon yellow sheets, contains information interesting to the trading community; while the third, the Titani-Paou (provincial gazet), printed upon red paper, consists of extracts from the other two editions. The total circulation of the three issues is 15,000 copies. The editorship is confided to a committee of six members of the Academy of Han-Lin.

GENERAL BOOTH predicts that the year 1900 will find 20,000,000 soldiers in the Salvation Army. If the morale of the Army at that period is no higher than at present, it would be better for religion and order if the year 20,000,000 didn't find any more than 1900 in its ranks. Twenty millions of soldiers in the Salvation Army, says the Norristown Herald, would overwork our criminal courts.

WE are getting to use the term crank too freely as the designation of any man or woman of special individuality. A man who fights a great corporation on public grounds is called a crank; so is a man who devotes himself to any unique work of charity or philanthropy. Reformers in general, no matter how sincere or self-sacrificing, are about as certain to be dubbed cranks as the sun to rise and set.—New Haven News.

THE Rev. Dr. Todd has hauled out of the New Haven Central Association (orthodox). He believes the association givs too much freedom to independent thinkers. For instance, a theological student applied for a license to preach, and was asked, "Do you believe in the deity of Christ?" and the student replied, "I am not prepared to say that I do." Another was asked "Do you, in your own practice, pray to Christ?" The answer was, "I do not." Both these applicants were licensed as orthodox preachers.

THEY get ready for camp-meetings in a business-like way down in Texas. It will be noticed that in the following extract from the Bastrop Advertiser, nothing is said about the preaching, but this was probably an oversight: "Immense preparations are being made for Major Penn's camp-meeting, which begins in Hill's prairie on the 1st day of July. August Albrecht will run a restaurant, ice-cream, lemonade, and soda-fountain on the grounds—a building now being erected for that purpose forty feet in width by seventy in depth."

JUDGE MACKAY, father of the American consul under arrest in southern Brazil, bears this testimony to his son's piety: "My son is a very religious young man. He says his prayers every morning, and practices with a Colt's navy revolver the balance of the day. His mother, mindful of his spiritual welfare, has sent a Bible. I, mindful of his bodily welfare, hav just forwarded to him two excellent revolvers that will shoot like a cannon. I am of the opinion that in the country where he is located a revolver is of more practical use than a Bible."

THE revision of the Old Testament has revived the hopes of some people who expect to hav things smoothed for them all through this life. It was this interesting fact that induced Shuttle to attend church yesterday. "How did you like the sermon?" inquired a friend, as he passed out of the vestibule. "Never was so disgusted in my life. Why, the man took 'Thou shalt not steal' for his text." "That's a good text." "It's the same old text. I thought the new version would read, 'Thou shalt not compromise for twenty-five cents on the dollar.'"—Hartford Post.

THE New York papers, in giving the history of the defalcation of Paying Teller Scott, tell a pathetic story of a little boy employed by a merchant. The merchant sent him to the Manhattan Bank with a check for $1,000. With the package in his pocket and his hand on it, the boy ran back. The merchant found only $850 in the package. Scott said that he had given the boy $1,000. His word was enough. The merchant dismissed the boy as a thief. When Scott's dishonesty came out this merchant bethought him of his loss, and was convinced that Scott had stolen the money, giving the boy $150 short, seeing that he was a little fellow, who did not understand business, and had afterward branded the lad as a thief to save himself. Aud what did this merchant do? Did he waste time in hunting up the wronged boy and restore him to his place with an advance of wages, as the noble employer always does in stories? No; he put on his hat, ran to his lawyer, and instructed that gentleman to sue the bank and recover that $150.—Detroit Post.

THERE was a tall desk in Victor Hugo's bedroom. It was the one he most used. He arose every morning at 6, washed in cold water, and then took a cup of black coffee and raw egg. This refection kept up strength and did not draw blood from the brain. If ideas did not come rapidly, he went to the window, which was all day open, winter and summer, sought inspiration by gazing thence, returned to the desk, sketched, and then wrote. If his "go" slacked, he walked about, again looked out, and drew. At 11 he breakfasted. His Pegasus was the knifeboard of an omnibus. He mounted it early in the afternoon, and did not return until late.

THE discovery of a nervous system in sponges has been made by an Australian naturalist, Dr. Von Lendenfeld. According to the American Naturalist for June, in certain calcareous sponges this observer has detected ganglion-cells, with branches connecting them with other nerve-cells, which are spindle-shaped. In the Leucon sponges sensory cells are present, but not concentrated round the pores, or so-called mouths of the sponge. These cells are scattered here and there in groups over the general octodermal surface. These results clearly show that the calcareous sponges, at least, can no longer be considered as protozoa. Heretofore the jelly-fishes were the lowest forms of animal life in which a nervous system was known to exist.

ALLUDING to "Christian Science" as a new name for what the Apostle Paul called the "gift of healing," a writer in a recent issue of the Hartford, Conn., Times so fully expresses the Banner of Light's sentiments that it adopts his remarks: "When we consider the attitude of the church toward Galileo and our new system of astronomy which science has discovered; when we remember how long and bitterly it opposed the science of geology—how in all ages the church has been the enemy and opponent of science, we can scarcely avoid the conclusion that this ("Christian Science") is a ridiculous misnomer, calculated to excite the skeptic's scorn and the ridicule of everyone familiar with the history of science and the church."

WE are indebted to Pompeii for our great industry of canned fruits. Years ago, when the excavations were beginning, a party of Americans found, in what had been the pantry of a house, many jars of preserved figs. One was opened, and they were found to be fresh and good. Investigation showed that the figs had been put into jars in a heated state, an aperture being left for the steam to escape, and then sealed with wax. The hint was taken, and soon after fruit canning was introduced here, the process being identical with that in vogue at Pompeii twenty centuries ago. There are many ladies among us who can tomatoes and peaches for domestic use, and do not realize that they are indebted for this art to the people of Pompeii.

THE torture of the Sun Dance is thus described by the Regina Leader: "On Friday the lieutenant-governor, Colonel Oswald, Ajt.-Major Atkinson, Major Laurie, Captain Stevenson, and Dr. Elder visited Pi-a-pot's reserve and saw the Sun Dance. The beauty of the situation of Pi-a-pot's reserve was greatly admired, surrounded as it is by forest. There were 150 wigwams, and about 1,000 Indians all told. The Sun Dance took place in the center of the camp, in a large wigwam constructed of branches of trees, put together in a most artistic manner. On a sort of balcony were a number of braves with whistles, who beat time to the music they made—very mournful music it was. They had been going on turning and playing the whistles and beating time for forty-eight hours, and without a morsel of food. On the second day the party saw one man tortured. He was naked, save for a thin pair of drawers, and painted a lurid whitish color. One of the medicin men came up and thrust a wooden skiver in his breast, and then tied round the skin above the hole made by the skiver a piece of tape so as to draw it up tightly. The tape or cord was attached to a beam, and the tortured brave moved round in time to the tune, the skin being drawn out about six inches from the breast."

The court knocked its assailant down, and called upon the jury to separate the combatants. It then fined the fighting lawyers $50 each for contempt, and adjourned.

THE statue of Liberty, presented to this country by France, arrived in New York last week on the transport Isere. The event was celebrated by a great naval and military display. About one hundred steamboats got in line, and went down the bay to meet the Isere. All that had cannons fired them as often as possible, and the guns at the forts on each side of the narrows added to the noise. The captain of the Isere expresses himself as greatly pleased with his reception.

"The Moral Aspects of Vivisection."

An article under the above title by Professor Davis in a recent number of the North American Review cannot fail to awaken an intense and painful interest in every sympathetic heart.

Most intelligent persons hav some general knowledge of the practice of vivisection, and will, therefore, not be surprised at the astounding exhibitions of cruelty and wickedness incidentally referred to by the writer of this paper. But when it is remembered that these disclosures are scarcely more than mere hints of its enormous and extensiv brutalities; when the barbarous experiments of Magendie, Brachet, and other French physiologists; the atrocities systematically carried on in the great French veterinary colleges, upon the most useful of the domestic animals, the details of which are too abhorrent for repetition, are called to mind, no humane reader can escape the conviction that this attempt to vindicate it by a course of reasoning tending to show that with certain restrictions and limitations it is, in the interest of physiological science, necessary, has signally failed, and that the great heart of humanity, the tribunal before which all such questions must ultimately come for revision and final settlement, will reaffirm with still greater emphasis its judgment already rendered, that the conscious, deliberate, and gratuitous infliction of the most atrocious and long-protracted tortures the imagination can conceive, upon unoffending and helpless beings, and especially upon those that liv in our companionship, administer to our comfort, repose in us their simple confidence, look to us for protection, and exhibit a patience and faithfulness not always returned, is cruel and demoralizing in the extreme; that no results to man however beneficial can justify it, and that any appeal to rights in its behalf must be fallacious.

No one can for a moment contend that the "stern operator," as he is here graphically described, plying his nefarious vocation, going steadily on in his ghastly work "a long, long while," the bitter cries of agony all unheard, has even the semblance of what is usually denominated a human heart. Mr. Darwin, in his "Descent of Man," relates the incident of the dog suffering under vivisection, that licked the hand of the operator, and he remarks, "This man, unless he had a heart of stone, must hav felt remorse to the last hour of his life." The great naturalist, who was no less distinguished for his amiability and his humanity than for his talents and learning, knew very well that to a successful operation of that kind an adamantine heart must be a prerequisit; that none but a nature of transcendent brutality could witness, much less engage in it.

But we are told that this is first and prominently a question of ethics, of casuistry, a pure case of conscience; that it is a question involving relativ rights, the limits of which, though, in some cases, extremely difficult to determin, must lie generally between man's welfare and that of the brute. For, quoting Lord Erskine, "the animals are given for our use. Their freedom and enjoyments, when these cease to be consistent with our just dominion and enjoyments, can be no part of their natural rights." And quoting further the "pious, gentle, and genial Cowper,"

> "The sum is this: If man's convenience, health,
> Or safety interfere, his rights and claims
> Are paramount, and must extinguish theirs."

It is true, as this writer says, that "the butcher's trade is revolting, but we pay him well." If Pope's picture of the State of Nature, when

> "Man walked with beast joint tenant of the shade,
> The same his table and the same his bed;
> No murder clothed him and no murder fed," was drawn from the conditions of primeval life, it is too painfully apparent that his

> "Man of times to come,
> Of half that liv the butcher and the tomb,
> Who, foe to nature, hears the general groan,
> Murders their species and betrays his own,"

has long since appeared. But even the butcher, though his calling is, like that of the hangman, to a certain extent brutalizing, is supposed to inflict upon his victims no unnecessary torture. To say that the "surgeon is not cruel" is pointless. His operations are professedly remedial; they are performed for the benefit of the sufferer, and usually, perhaps invariably, by his express or implied consent.

After stating that the prime charge against vivisection is its cruelty, the writer postulates that cruelty cannot be justified on any ground whatever; that nothing can palliate or excuse it. But cruelty is essentially a trespass, an infringement of rights, and the trespass alone makes it morally wrong, vicious, and wicked. As the brute, when confronted by man's "convenience, health, or safety," has no rights, it follows logically that man, in the exercise of his "paramount right," by a treatment of the brute in any way that may promote his welfare, commits no trespass, and is, therefore, not open to the charge of cruelty. This, it is said, is in strict conformity with the law of kindness: "Be kind to your kind." It is not wrong to sacrifice the welfare of the brute to the welfare of man, for it is not a trespass on its rights, they having in that relation shrunk away. If, then, knowledge be our highest welfare, and if, in the pursuit of knowledge, the brute stands in the way, all its rights vanish. The conclusion seems clear that before such stupendous advantages to the human race, the right of the brute to exemption from inflicted pain becomes null. Hence vivisection is not a trespass, and so is not cruel and not wrong.

From the law thus laid down we are admonished that this question cannot be settled by appeals to humanity, or the best impulses of our nature; not by the abhorrence it naturally excites; by the shocking agonies, the distressing cries of pain, and the loathsome and disgusting tortures that almost invariably attend it. All these must be controled till "judgment" is rendered. Questions of this kind are not to be decided by appeals to the tender heart, but to the tender conscience; a conscience, by the way, that can see no distinction between the surgical operation, the slaughter-house, or even the anatomical dissecting-room, and the physiological laboratory in which pain is not merely incidental and momentary, but in which deliberate and long-continued torture is made a business—a business, too, that must be conducted with "much delight" and with the "pleasure of the chase." The "pitiful folk" must not let their feelings judge; they must accept without demur the judgment of the physiologist, both retrospectivly and prospectivly, of the importance of a method of investigation, to which for cold-blooded atrocity civilization certainly offers no parallel.

It seems never to hav occurred to the writer of this essay that no judgment can be either safe or sound that does not spring from the co-ordinate action of those faculties of a well-balanced mind that are naturally called into exercise by a presentation of the facts, or to which the facts naturally appeal in any given case; that the judgment of a mind upon any subject affecting our relations with other sentient beings, and involving our moral obligations toward them, in which the human feelings hav for the occasion been laid aside, were that possible, or in which they never had place, which is not only possible but too common, must be a distorted judgment, usually the judgment of a despot, often the judgment of a fiend. There can be no act of judgment by the human mind upon any subject of the kind referred to into the formation of which the emotional nature does not enter as a potent factor. While in the formation of such a judgment there might be no doubt of the exclusion of the feelings (by which term is meant, of course, the "tender emotions") it might bear melancholy evidence of the presence and potency of the strong emotions, as fear, hate, revenge, vindictivness, etc., stimulated to unwonted severity by faith in a cloud of legend and fable, accepted with unquestioning credulity for the genuin history of foregone times, and as divine authority in the conduct of human affairs. Judgments of this latter kind, based upon the same principle of relativ rights, and supported by a similar line of reasoning; judgments claiming divine sanction, and to hav been fashioned after a divine model, we find scattered in profusion down the ages. Such were the judgments of St. Augustine, Calvin, and Edwards as expressed in their formulas of orthodox Christianity. The doctrins of the two former, as Mr. Lecky says in his "History of European Morals," "surpass in atrocity any tenets that hav ever been admitted into any pagan creed;" and of the latter Canon Farrar has just now observed, "He disgusted, offended, and stunned the greater number of his adherents by utterances that he himself entirely believed, but which we now read with shudders of inexpressible abhorrence." These were all men of surpassing intellect, and eminent representativs of the "tender conscience," and neither of them ever fell under the suspicion or incurred the reproach of a "tender heart." They were either wanting in human hearts, or they had plucked them from their bosoms, while by a process of "calm, cold reasoning" they "settled important questions of right and wrong, of justice and injustice, of humanity and cruelty." Compared with three other persons, a Howard, a Nightingale, and a Hopper, whose names readily drop into the recollection as representativs of the "tender heart," can there be any doubt of the pitiable and wretched nature of their achievements? The rapid disintegration of a belief in those old doctrins, thus settled by "calm, cold reasoning," under the sanction of a "tender conscience," is believed to be due, in large measure, to the fact that the human element has, for the last few years, more and more permeated the public thought concerning them.

Sir Matthew Hale, one of the most eminent jurists of modern times, noted for the general wisdom and justice of his decisions, in the exercise of a deliberate judgment, to which it will be readily admitted the feelings were no guide, "with the facts and their estimated value" fully before him, as late as the middle of the seventeenth century, sent two women to the gallows for a crime which an age of intelligence tempered with humanity has determined never existed.

No one can for a moment doubt the intellectual ability and the loyalty to right of the great founder of Methodism, or of that distinguished New England divine, Cotton Mather, of Boston; yet these celebrated advocates of the doctrin that "questions of morals are not to be settled by appeals to humanity, or the best impulses of our nature," counseled and advised the execution of men and women for witchcraft in obedience to the dictates of a tender conscience, and as a religious duty, the latter being mainly responsible for what has passed into history as the "Salem tragedy," which served to round out the incredible number, estimated by Dr. Sprenger, in his "Life of Mohammed," at nine millions of human beings, sacrificed to the bloody Moloch of an impossible crime within the Christian epoch.

It is comparativly but a few years since a movement was made in this country by a few philanthropists for the abolition of flogging in the navy. The "calm, cold reasoners" at once sprang to their feet with pictures of mutiny and insubordination, and a forecast of total ruin to the efficiency of the naval service. The reason of humanity, however, at length prevailed, the proposed measure became established law, and sufficient time has elapsed to show, not only the total failure of the predictions of its opponents but the superior wisdom of a judgment from the formation of which the element of human kindness had not been excluded, and to illustrate the principle that, as Tennyson says, is not only the least efficient agency in promoting disciplin and good order among men, but that in the nature of things it defeats its own end.

> "The blind wild beast of force > Whose home is in the sinews of a man"

Two years ago a majority of the legislature of Maine was accidentally composed of men who were in the habit of forming their judgments upon important questions of right and wrong, of justice and injustice, of humanity and cruelty, with the humanity left out, and the result was the re-enactment of an old law which had not been in force in the state for forty years, the relic of a barbarous age, under which it would be deemed suitable and proper, and even necessary for the suppression of crime, and for the protection of a commonwealth of six hundred thousand people, in the highest stage of civilization the world has ever seen, living in peaceful, orderly, and quiet communities, under the administration of just and wholesome laws, to take two, three, or a half dozen human beings every year, place them upon a scaffold erected for the purpose, and with due ceremonies and formalities proceed to strangle them in cold blood.

These illustrations may help to show the pernicious and merciless nature and effects of the principle underlying the italicized words in the foregoing quotations, and which is invoked in justification of this brutal and demoralizing practice; a principle which it is not too much to say is at the foundation of nearly all the cruelties that hav ever been perpetrated by man upon what are commonly termed the lower orders of creation. First claiming an immortality that he especially denies to the brutes, and then arrogantly taking them under his dominion to the extent of his power, and not content with their services patiently and cheerfully rendered, and their contributions to his sustenance and comfort, he proceeds to sacrifice them wantonly, and often in the most cruel manner, to his avarice, his ambition, or his pleasure.

Freethought in Asia and Europe.

From the London Freethinker.

Traveling round with the sun, we find Freethought activ in Japan, which has been called the France of Asia. Imbued with Western culture, the Japanese are deserting their nativ religion, and our missionaries cannot persuade them to embrace Christianity. Freethought literature is extensivly circulated there, and producing good fruit.

India also is awakening. Positivism is known to be making considerable progress among a certain educated section of nativ society, and Atheism is still more prevalent. We receive copies of the Philosophical Inquirer, the Antichristian and the Thinker. Each is edited by a Hindoo and a determin ed opponent of all forms of theology.

Freethought is rapidly advancing in Russia. The universities are hotbeds of "Infidelity" as well as Liberalism. Educated men and women there are nearly all Freethinkers. A Russian professor assured us the other day, in an interesting conversation, that his colleagues all smiled at Christianity as a creed for slaves and fools, and they were doing their best for Freethought, though sadly cramped by the iron despotism of the czar. The best blood of young Russia, congealing amid Siberian snows for the crime of loving freedom, pulses in the hearts of Freethought heroes and heroins who regard kings and priests with equal hatred.

Germany is Freethought to the core. Among its scientists and philosophers it is difficult to find a Christian. Every educated man is more or less a Freethinker; it goes without saying. Haeckel does not, like Darwin, hesitate about religion while bold in science; he frankly owns his skepticism, and wonders why Englishmen are so timid. Mrs. Grundy may still be a power in Germany, but Bumble is played out. Nobody fears him, except perhaps in the rural districts. In Berlin about five per cent of the inhabitants (mostly women) go to church on Sunday, and the rest spend their leisure more profitably and agreeably in the museums, art galleries, theaters, cafes, public gardens, and country fields.

In France the sunrise of Freethought is splendid. The church pales before it, withers, and vanishes like a ghost at the approach of daylight. We doubt whether there has been a single Christian in any French cabinet for the last eight years. President Grevy is himself a Freethinker. Gambetta was buried by the nation without religious rites, and the same happy fate has befallen Victor Hugo. Not a single priest figured in his funeral procession. The church stood aside with looks of impotent hatred while the people buried their hero like pagans. It is not a funeral, said M. Floquet, but an apotheosis. It is not a burial, said M. Augier, but a coronation. To the people he was a king by genius, and god by his mighty heart. What need of dead divinities of Greece or Palestine, Olympus or Calvary, while humanity produces greater glories? When the true gods come, the half gods go, says Emerson; and Paris turns from the deities of the church to worship the poet who expressed her noblest aspirations in immortal words.

London shows us the ignominious spectacle of a vulgar bigot as Lord Mayor, and a Common Council too largely sharing his views and character, refusing to consider a resolution of condolence with the French people in their great loss. Sir John Bennett might hav saved his time; for, after all, the condolence of such a body would be rather an insult than an honor. Fortunately, the city of London does not represent the metropolis in this matter. The London Municipality, when it comes, will know how to fraternize with the municipalities of other capitals on such occasions.

The London workmen are outside the churches, and their leaders are nearly all Freethinkers. Our principles are rapidly gaining ascendancy with the masses. It is a significant fact that the London weekly papers, one after another, embrace the policy of printing a long list of Sunday lectures in Secular halls. By and by we shall hold great public meetings in the metropolis, as we did in Birmingham on Whit-Sunday. Freethought is advancing even in stolid, Protestant England, with its Bible and its beer. Here, as in France, although more slowly, education is being laicized, and the church knows that this is the beginning of the end.

Documentary Testimony.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Apropos of the discussion now going on between ultra Materialists and Spiritualists, I wish to briefly describe certain phenomena now going on at this place.

Some time last winter a few skeptics formed a circle for the purpose of independent investigation of alleged spiritual phenomena. They soon obtained raps, table-tipping, etc., and early this spring a slate was placed under a table and a message was written upon it.

The rest of the circle accused the gentleman who held the slate of perpetrating a trick, and he was naturally indignant at the accusation. At the next meeting of the circle the raps averred that the spirits would write, and when asked where to put the slate, they said put it in a little closet built in the room where the circle was held, at the residence of Dr. J. B. Bonton.

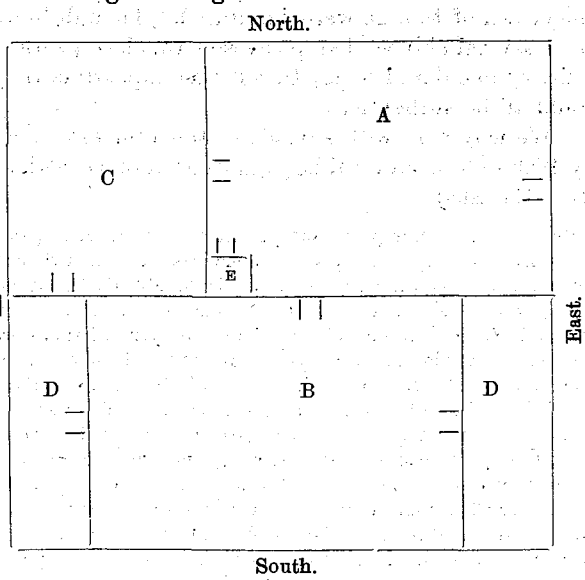
Accordingly, the slate was placed in the closet and the door locked, Dr. Bonton taking a seat on the outside. Soon raps announced that the door should be opened, and a message was found written on the slate.

Mr. G. H. Walser took a slate then, and under the most rigid test conditions a message was written, and the name of D. M. Bennett signed to it.

On Wednesday evening, June 3d, I procured a new slate, and went to Dr. Bonton's residence, where I found some twenty persons assembled. After a thorough examination of the cabinet, or closet, and finding it to be as represented, we saw the slate placed on a shelf in the closet and the door locked. Dr. Bonton took his place in the circle outside, and the room remained lighted with full lamplight.

Soon raps on the door were heard, and I took the light and stood at the closet door when it was opened, and saw that the slate was just as when the door was closed. But upon it was the following:

Friend Stewart: I endeavored to make my influence felt and known to you in your debate with Braden.



You are to do a great work; keep on and be brave in it.

Yours, D. M. Bennett.

The writing and signature are almost fac-similes of specimens of D. M. Bennett's writing in my possession, especially the signature, there being just about the difference that would naturally exist between pen and slate writing.

On the following Friday I went, in company with Mr. Greeley, and made a most thorough investigation of the premises, going into the cellar, upon the roof, and through every room, and testing the strength of the floor, ceiling, and walls of the closet.

Following is a diagram of the house:

A, sitting room. B, parlor. C, kitchen. D D, porches. E, closet where writing takes place.

The closet is seventeen inches deep, some three feet wide, and six feet high, being framed into the house, and as will be seen in the diagram, the walls of the closet are partly formed by the walls of the rooms. The ceiling of the room is formed on the rafters of the roof, and the closet at the top takes the shape of the roof, thus making it impossible for any one to be secreted above, while the floor of the closet is the continuous floor of the room. There is a ceiling in the closet made of matched flooring, securely nailed in its place.

I hereby append an affidavit made after our examination of the premises:

Liberal, Mo., June 5, 1885.

We, the undersigned citizens of Liberal, Barton Co., Mo., hav a personal acquaintance with Dr. J. B. Bonton, and know him to be a man of truth and a worthy citizen.

We hav been given the privilege of examining the conditions under which certain slate-writing takes place in the said Dr. Bonton's house, alleged to be through the instrumentality of spirits. We hav availed ourselvs of said privilege, and hav made a thorough examination of the said premises, and we hereby pronounce it utterly impossible that said writing can occur through visible or tangible human agency.

The following additional affidavit shows that similar writing takes place at the house of Dr. Clark:

Liberal, Barton Co., Mo, June 5, 1885.

This is to certify that I am a citizen of Barton county, Mo., and a practicing physician of Liberal, Mo.

That on the evening of May 24th there was no one present but myself and wife. That on said evening my wife placed a clean slate with a fragment of pencil on a bed in a bed-room, and fastened the door. Some twenty minutes afterward, on opening the door, the following message was found on the slate:

"It is me—Mattie."

The above is the fact in the case as witnessed by me,

J. W. Clark.

State of Missouri, Co. of Barton. } ss.

On this, the fifth day of June, 1885, personally appeared J. W. Clark, to me known to be the person whose name is subscribed to the foregoing.

Subscribed and sworn to before me,

Frank L. Yale, Notary Public.

Now, Mr. Editor, as this communication is sufficiently lengthy, I will defer any comments on the subject for the present.

One thing, however, I will say, that if D. M. Bennett did write the foregoing message to me, he certainly assisted me in the debate with Braden, in overthrowing the position assumed by Christian Spiritualists and the whole metaphysical screed concerning the dualistic theory of matter and spirit, for my position in that debate was that there is nothing in the universe but matter and force, and that all phenomena in nature are referable to them.

Mr. Perry—Mr. Truesdell—Miss Gibson.

If the readers of The Truth Seeker will turn to its issue of May 9th, they will there read in my reply to Wm. Hart: "If Mr. Truesdell assumed the role of mediumship for years to discover the tricks of mediums, . . . If Mr. Truesdell has been thus disguised as a detectiv, . . . Mr. Truesdell was self-appointed," etc., on which supposition and claim I base a question, "Why should he be stigmatized any more as a fraud and a liar than any detectiv who plays a similiar role for the same purpose?" Which resolved itself into the query: Is it ever justifiable to employ detectivs to steal and lie in order to bring criminals to justice; and if so, is it not as legitimate in ferreting out bogus mediums as in catching horse thieves?

In The Truth Seeker June 6th, Mr. Perry, instead of answering these questions, says: "She (E. E. Gibson) makes him (Mr. Truesdell) a self-constituted detectiv, with the high secret motiv of helping a deluded public to first believe a damnable lie in order to effectually wipe it out by subsequent exposure." Do I? As I understand it, a deluded public already "believed a damnable lie," else how could they hav been "deluded;" and Mr. Truesdell, in order to expose the lie, performed the same tricks that the mediums said were done by spirits, then told a deluded public how he did it through a book, which the mediums and Spiritualists curse him for publishing, because he told the truth and exposed their frauds. Had he still continued his tricks and pretended that spirits performed them, he would be as strongly defended and as dearly beloved as Slade, Baxter, Mrs. Fay, and the other noted exposed mediums are today. His sin is in deceiving for the purpose of exposure, instead of swindling for money! Then telling how did it, and exposing these mediums who hav deluded a too confiding public! What a crime! Then of how much sorer punishment are those deserving who are still continuing the guilty practice!

Mr. Perry says, further, in continuation of his sentence quoted above, "the logic is a failure, because ten thousand big lies exposed will not blot out one little truth." Very true, and, following his logic, ten thousand horse-thieves caught would not blot out the one little truth that Mr. Perry was not one of those ten thousand horse-thieves unless he was one of them. So ten thousand mediums caught does not prove all mediums frauds, but it does prove that those who are caught are frauds; and that is all I claim, as will be seen in my next paragraph to Mr. Hart, where I say, "Mr. Truesdell's exposures hav nothing to do with genuin phenomena." Let us all try to be fair, and to get at the real meaning of our opponents, for in no other way can we ever arrive at the truth.

Mr. Perry's offer to Mr. Truesdell, of which he speaks in his article, was made through me, as he states; and, as Mr. Truesdell must know what this offer was, in order to accept or reject it, I sent him the letter; but as Mr. Perry proposed to take away the very security against fraud on which Mr. Truesdell depended, viz, "I must be the last one to handle the slate," by not even allowing him to be present, he thought it not fit to accept; but wrote me recently that he would like to use these facts in an article. Never thinking that Mr. Perry's proposition was private, as it must hav been public if accepted, I answered, "Why, yes, publish it if you desire," having the example before me of others, for instance, Mr. Lacy, a Spiritualist gentlemen, author, and poet, having done the same by me in Light for Thinkers; but as no offense was intended, I felt none, though mine was a private, personal diagnosis, not intended for the public, while Mr. Perry's, I understood, might be made as public as Mr. Truesdell's offer. To be sure, I might hav asked permission of Mr. Perry, but it did not occur to me that it was necessary, so I hope he will forgiv me if, through ignorance, a private matter has been made public.

Thus much in answer to his question "of whom" was permission obtained? I desire to be fair on both sides of this great subject, for I know, by personal experience, that there are genuin phenomena incorporated within what has been named "Spiritualism;" whether produced by spirits or otherwise, I do not consider yet proved; therefore, I hold a suspended judgment, largely preponderating against the Spiritual theory, for I do not believe that spirits exist. But how do I know that they do not exist and are not the cause of the genuin phenomena?

Barre, Mass, June 8, 285. Ella E. Gibson.

The Religious State of New Zealand.

The religion of New Zealand, although church and state are not united, is quite stupid enough to suit the most primitiv Scotch Presbyterian, and these old fosil preachers are still trying to enlighten the people upon the mysteries of circumcision and such like antiquities, still thought essential to salvation in New Zealand, or at least in Dunedin; while at Christ Church, an English colony, the Church of England prevails with the utmost rigor of pomp and show which superstition and bigotry can devise. And yet morals are at a low ebb. Sporting seems to be the order of the day; horse racing, cock and dog fighting, rat baiting, and beer drinking seem to be religious excercises in the colonies. The Salvation Army runs riot here, with a full brass band in the lead—the most fanatical and degraded lot I ever saw, who seem to think that God is deaf, and the more noise the better. On the other hand, Freethought is rapidly on the increase, and Secular societies are being organized in all the large towns. At Dunedin, the largest city on the island, the Freethought people own a most magnificent hall, and hav a large membership and Lyceum school. Their prosperity is largely due to Robert Stout, the present premier of the government of New Zealand. I was a little surprised to find two Infidels and a Jew at the head of government in this church and priest-ridden country—prophetic of a better state of things in the future, when the people wake up to the sham of royalty by divine right. J. L. York.

A Borrowed Religion.

A Christian friend of one of our friends became indignant over the perusal of the articles on Mexico recently published in these columns, and especially so over our comments thereon. He would like answers to the following questions:

"You say in your issue of May 23d 'that Catholicism especially is, in its material essentials, patterned after the religion of the Roman empire.' Please show wherein it is patterned after the Roman religion, and giv your authority.

"Is Chambers's Encyclopedia a standard work?

"Did the Aztecs offer human sacrifice?"

If the writer of these questions had made himself familiar with the history of Christianity from the time of Constantine to the sixth century, he would never hav asked them. The amalgamation of Christianity with Paganism began with the "first Christian emperor," and was thoroughly completed under his successors. Constantine was a politician, and his adoption of the new religion seemed to make him more unscrupulous than he was when a Pagan. Draper says that "if he built Christian churches he also restored Pagan temples; if he listened to the clergy, he also consulted the haruspices; if he summoned the Council of Nicea, he also honored the statue of Fortune; if he accepted the rite of baptism, he also struck a medal bearing his title of 'God.' As years passed on Christianity was incorporated with the old Greek mythology. Olympus was restored, but the divinities passed under other names. Views of the trinity in accordance with Egyptian traditions were established. Not only was the adoration of Isis under a new name restored, but even her image, standing on the crescent moon, reappeared." Isis and her child are the Christian Madonna and child. The extent to which the adoption of Pagan mythology and ceremonies was carried may be learned from the words of Faustus to Augustine: "You hav," he says, "substituted your agapæ for the sacrifices of the Pagans; for their idols your martyrs, whom you serve with the very same honors. You appease the shades of the dead with wine and feasts; you celebrate the solemn festivities of the gentiles, their calends and their solstices; and as to their manners, those you hav retained without any alteration. Nothing distinguishes you from the Pagan except that you hold your assemblies apart from them." In quoting this, Draper adds: "Pagan observances were everywhere introduced. At weddings it was the custom to sing hymns to Venus. Heathen rites were adopted, a pompous and splendid ritual, gorgeous robes, miters, tiaras, wax tapers, processional services, lustrations, gold and silver vases, were introduced. The Roman lituus, the chief ensign of the augurs, became the crozier. Churches were built over the tombs of martyrs, and consecrated with rites borrowed from the ancient laws of the Roman pontiffs. Festivals and commemorations of martyrs multiplied with the numberless fictitious discoveries of their remains. Fasting became the grand means of repelling the devil and appeasing God; celibacy the greatest of the virtues. Pilgrimages were made to Palestine and the tombs of the martyrs. Quantities of dust and earth were brought from the Holy Land, and sold at enormous prices as antidotes against devils. The virtues of consecrated water were upheld. Images and relics were introduced into the churches, and worshiped after the fashion of the heathen gods. It was given out that prodigies and miracles were to be seen in certain places, as in the heathen times. The happy souls of departed Chtistians were invoked; it was believed that they were wandering about the world or haunting their graves. There was a multiplication of temples, altars, and penitential garments. The festival of the purification of the virgin was invented to remove the uneasiness of heathen converts on account of the loss of their Lupercalia, or feasts of Pan. The worship of images, of fragments of the cross, or bones, nails, and other relics, a true fetich worship, was cultivated. Two arguments were relied on for the authenticity of these objects—the authority of the church and the working of miracles. Even the worn-out clothing of the saints and the earth of their graves were venerated. From Palestine were brought what were affirmed to be the skeletons of St. Mark and St. James and other ancient worthies. The apotheosis of the old Roman times was replaced by canonization; tutelary saints succeed to local mythological divinities. Then came the mystery of transubstantiation, or the conversion of bread and wine by the priest into the flesh and blood of Christ. As centuries passed, the paganization became more complete. Festivals sacred to the memory of the lance with which the savior's side was pierced, the nails that fastened him to the cross, and the crown of thorns, were instituted. Though there were several abbeys that possessed this last peerless relic, no one dared to say that it was impossible they could all be authentic.

"We may read with advantage the remarks made by Bishop Newton on this paganization of Christianity. He asks:

"'Is not the worship of saints and angels now in all respects the same that the worship of demons was in former times? The name only is different, the thing is identically the same, . . the deified men of the Christians are substituted for the deified men of the heathens. The promoters of this worship were sensible that it was the same, and that the one succeeded to the other; and, as the worship is the same, so likewise it is performed with the same ceremonies. The burning of incense or perfumes on several altars at one and the same time; the sprinkling of holy water or a mixture of salt and common water, at going into and coming out of places of public worship; the lighting up of a great number of lamps and wax candles in broad daylight before altars and statues of these deities; the hanging up of votiv offerings and rich presents as attestations of so many miraculous cures and deliverances from diseases and dangers; the canonization or deification of deceased worthies; the assigning of distinct provinces or prefectures to departed heroes and saints, the worshiping and adoring of the dead in their sepulchers, shrines, and relics; the consecrating and bowing down to images; the attributing of miraculous powers and virtues to idols; the setting up of little oratories, altars, and statues in the streets and highways, and on the tops of mountains; the carrying of images and relics in pompous procession, with numerous lights and with music and singing; flagellations at solemn seasons under the notion of penance; a great variety of religious orders and fraternities of priests; the shaving of priests, or the tonsure, as it is called, on the crown of their heads; the imposing of celibacy and vows of chastity on the religious of both sexes—all these and many more rites and ceremonies are equally parts of pagan and popish superstition. Nay, the very same temples, the very same images, which were once consecrated to to Jupiter and the other demons, are now consecrated to the Virgin Mary and the other saints. The very same rites and inscriptions are ascribed to both, the very same prodigies and miracles are related of these as of those. In short, almost the whole of paganism is converted and applied to popery; the one is manifestly formed upon the same plan and principles as the other; so that there is not only a conformity, but even a uniformity, in the worship of ancient and modern, of heathen and Christian Rome.'"

The Rev. Robert Taylor, in his "Diegesis," p. 235, says that the only difference in those times between the two religions "was that Jupiter was turned into Jehovah, Apollo into Jesus Christ, Venus's pigeon into the Holy Ghost, Diana into the Virgin Mary, a new nomenclature was given to the old materia theologica; the demigods were turned into saints; the exploits of the one were represented as the miracles of the other; the pagan temples became Christian churches; and so ridiculously accommodating were the converters of the world to the prejudices of their pagan ancestors and neighbors, that they generally observed some resemblance of quality and character in the saint whom they substituted to the old deity." The "priests, altars, temples, solemn festivals, melancholy grimaces, ridiculous attitudes, trinkets, baubles, bells, candles, cushions, holy water, holy wine, holy biscuits, holy oil, holy smoke, and holy vestments," of paganism were all incorporated into Catholicism. Ammonius Saccus, the teacher of Origen, taught that "Christianity and paganism, when rightly understood, differed in no essential points, but had a common origin, and really were one and the same religion." That popery has borrowed its principal ceremonies and doctrins from the rituals of paganism, adds Taylor, "is a fact which the most learned and orthodox of the established church hav most strenuously maintained, and most convincingly demonstrated. That Protestantism has borrowed its principal ceremonies and doctrins from the rituals of popery is a fact which the most learned and orthodox of the Catholic church as strenuously maintain, and as convincingly demonstrate. The conclusion, therefore, that Christianity is altogether paganish, is inevitable."

Gibbon, in "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," in writing upon the introduction into the church of pagan ceremonies, says: "As the objects of religion were gradually reduced to the standard of the imagination, the rites and ceremonies were introduced that seemed most powerfully to affect the senses of the vulgar. If, in the beginning of the fifth century, Tertullian, or Lactantius, had been suddenly raised from the dead, to assist at the festival of some popular saint or martyr, they would hav gazed with astonishment and indignation on the profane spectacle which had succeeded to the pure and spiritual worship of a Christian congregation. As soon as the doors of the church were thrown open, they must ha been offended by the smoke of incense, the perfume of flowers, and the glare of lamps and tapers, which diffused, at noon-day, a gawdy, superfluous, and, in their opinion, a sacrilegious light. If they approached the balustrade of the altar, they made their way through the prostrate crowd, consisting for the most part of strangers and pilgrims, who resorted to the city on the vigil of the feast, and who already felt the strong intoxication of fanaticism, and, perhaps, of wine. Their devout kisses were imprinted on the walls and pavement of the sacred edifice, and their fervent prayers were directed, whatever might be the language of their church, to the bones, the blood, or the ashes of the saint, which were usually concealed by a linen or silken veil from the eyes of the vulgar. The Christians frequented the tombs of the martyrs in the hope of obtaining, from their powerful intercession, every sort of spiritual, but more especially of temporal, blessings. They implored the preservation of their health, or the cure of their infirmities; the fruitfulness of their barren wives, or the safety and happiness of their children. Whenever they undertook any distant or dangerous journey, they requested that the holy martyrs would be their guides and protectors on the roads; and if they returned without having experienced any misfortune, they again hastened to the tombs of the martyrs to celebrate, with grateful thanksgivings, their obligations to the memory and relics of those heavenly patrons. The walls were hung round with symbols of the favors which they had received; eyes, and hands, and feet of gold and silver, and edifying pictures, which could not long escape the abuse of indiscreet or idolatrous devotion, represented the image, the attributes, and the miracles of the tutelar saint. The same uniform original spirit of superstition might suggest, in the most distant ages and countries, the same method of deceiving the credulity, and of affecting the senses of mankind; but it must ingenuously be confessed that the ministers of the Catholic church imitated the profane model, which they were impatient to destroy. The most respectable bishops had persuaded themselvs that the ignorant rustics would more cheerfully renounce the superstition of paganism, if they found some resemblance, some compensation, in the bosom of Christianity. The religion of Constantine achieved, in less than a century, the final conquest of the Roman empire; but the victors themselvs were insensibly subdued by the arts of their vanquished rivals."

"Should anyone inquire," says Mosheim (Hist. Chris., vol. i, p. 392), "what causes could possibly hav led the Christian teachers to adopt the rites of paganism, I answer, that in all probability their only motiv was an anxious desire to enlarge the bounds of the church. The rites, themselvs, certainly possessed no very particular recommendation in point of grandeur or dignity; but a hope might very naturally be entertained that the heathen worshipers, upon finding somewhat of an accordance to subsist between the religion in which they had been bred up, and Christianity, as to externals, might the more readily be prevailed on to dismiss their prejudices, and embrace the latter." . . "The oriental Christians of this age were accustomed to compare baptism with that lustration with which it was the practice to consecrate, in a certain degree, those who were about to be initiated in the mysteries, and the profession of faith, delivered at the font, with the watch-word, or sign, communicated to the candidates for admission to the secret rights of heathenism, on which account it was usual for this profession of faith to be solemnly delivered in the very act of baptism to every one admitted into the church. Indeed, in its operation the profession of faith, to which we allude, was by no means dissimilar to the sign of mystical initiation amongst the heathen."

It occurs to us that these are authorities sufficient to quote for the benefit of our indignant Christian, but they could be multiplied many times were it necessary. That it was no rash assertion to say that Catholicism, in all its material essentials, is patterned after the pagan religion of the Roman empire, we think, is fully shown. Indeed, Draper, in his "Intellectual Development," charges that Catholicism is a more "dreadful Materialism" than the philosophy of the Materialists themselvs. But even in this the Catholics are imitators of the pagans. When image-worship crept into the early church, it was a revival of pagan idolatry, and, Gibbon says, led to the adoption of the pagan rites of genuflexion, luminaries, and incense.

Whether Chambers's Encyclopedia is a standard work or not depends upon what standard the reader desires. Chambers's is a popular work, on account of its cheapness, but we should not take it as final authority on any matter. A great many of the articles for cyclopedias are written by clergymen—especially on religious subjects and history—and are of course made to uphold the Christian version of theological affairs. The Britannica has the greatest reputation for scholarly work, but it will be recollected that the publishers of that threw out Robertson Smith's article on the Canon of the Old Testament because it contradicted current opinions of that book. It is unsafe to take the ipse dixit of any one work, unless corroborated by others. The seeker for truth should read many volumes, giving to each the weight it is entitled to because of the known honesty and fitness for his work of its writer. A cyclopedia edited in the interest of Christianity would most likely be unreliable in treating of other religions, and giv as evidence for its own faith tradition and beliefs which the common sense of the world would laugh at.

So far as we know, the accounts of human sacrifices among the Aztecs are true in substance, though much exaggerated. They seem to hav had numberless Abrahams and Jephthahs among them, ready to do the bidding of their priests. Religion has ever been cruel, in all lands and climes, but we doubt if the number of victims offered to the Aztec gods is as great as the number slain on account of the Christian religion. The Aztec priests would hav been kept very busy to murder as many millions as perished in the Crusades, in the Inquisition, and in the numerous religious wars of Europe.

News and Notes.

A GRAND FIELD-DAY.—NATURE VS. CHURCH.—A FREETHINKERS' PICNIC.—THE TROJAN PHALANX.—THE GREAT CONVENTION.

A beautiful ride through sunset and the brilliant moonlighted night brought me in the early morn to the stately city of Albany, which, crowned with its Capitol that has already cost seventeen millions of dollars and still cries for more, looked quite queenly on the banks of the flowing Hudson. It was a bright June morning, and lovely landscapes stretched away on every side. A happy-hearted pilgrim, I wended my way up the Broadway of Albany, and soon found myself at the residence of President McCabe of the Albany Liberal Association, and, with the genial greeting of himself and wife, felt that I was in safe hands for a royal heterodox time. Mrs. McCabe, is a good Christian still and loves the Methodist church into which she was born, but for all that she is a thorough-going Liberal in heart and spirit, full of generous fellowship and ready to lend a hand without a particle of regard for sectarian boundaries. If all Christians were like her, I don't think we should hav much to quarrel about. Peace and good will would then be the prevailing law.

I suppose the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know J. J. McCabe who is the efficient president of the Albany Society, who never does anything by halves, and who works for the success of Freethought with an enthusiasm that knows no failure, and a practical sagacity that hits upon the right thing to do at the right time. He is a poet, too, and sings of the good time coming. He has music in his soul, and I hav just had the pleasure of reading his "Poems and Poetry" recently published, where we find some vigorous Freethought verse and touches of romance. His lecture, "An Evening with the Poets," is quite entertaining, and "Science and Theology," which he delivered before the Ingersoll Secular Society of Boston, is a very fine presentation of these two opposit modes of belief and moral culture, and is a valuable contribution to our Freethought literature. The Albany Association is quite fortunate in the possession of an officer of such ability and earnestness.

A Freethinkers' picnic, on Sunday, out in the green fields, with old and young altogether—what a splendid thing! and I hope that the summer will be filled with them from one end of the land to the other. How the gloomy old churches would sink into insignificance, pelted with laughter and drowned with the music of joy!

I suppose most of our Liberals hav heard of Mrs. Iliohan's Sunday-school at Albany, one of the most promising Free-thought undertakings in the world. Mrs. Iliohan has a rare faculty for interesting the children and teaching their minds. She can touch the hearts of the young with the beauty and the nobleness of scientific thought, and make truth far more delightful than the sentimental dreams of religion. The Liberal Sunday-school must become a great feature of our future advance, for we must meet the multiplied instrumentalities of the church. The church seeks the young, and would capture even the infant with the subtleties of theology. As a matter of self-defense we must train the youthful faculties with what science can giv both for mental and moral advancement. We must teach the art of life, unfold the ideal, and fill the heart with hope and aspiration based upon the world in which we now are. In this religion of humanity, in this cultivation of noble sentiment and purpose in the ardent soul of youth, Mrs. Iliohan has accomplished a work of vast significance—a work whose fruit is not in to-day, but in the infinit future of the race.

Nearly a hundred were together, men and women, boys and girls, and the big wagons were ready, and away we went. The clerk of the weather was all right on the main question—he had given us a clear sky and a southerly wind, and the most brilliant sunshine of the season, that was like sparkling wine and almost intoxicated with delight—but he forgot (I suppose he had an orthodox turn) to giv us a little bit of a shower the night beforehand just enough to lay the dust. As the roads round about Albany are sandy, and as the wind, in spite of the Sabbath, did frolic around quite lively, and the wagons were of colossal size, and the wheels so large that they thundered along the highway—why, there was considerable of a dust—yea, clouds of it—and at times the doleful old orthodox ejaculation seemed quite appropriate—"Dust thou art, to dust thou shalt return." But we kept right on, although we had no expectation of going to the other side of Jordan and having a cool time of it—in Sheol—and so after a five-mile ride the comfortable country homestead of Mr. McCabe floated upon our hungry sight, with its tall trees, its wavy grass, its comfortable mansion, and soon we tumbled into its happy embrace, as reckless as the flying bird. And what a rollicking time we had all day long, swinging and dancing, playing ball, hunting for strawberries, and when the time for dinner came, eating with an appetite that is one of the greatest blessings of human existence. Ah, how much better off we were than the dyspeptic Christians praying in their melancholy churches, and, as some one puts it, absorbing religion and rheumatism at the same time.

Soon after the arrival of the Albanian hosts on this camping-ground of freedom we were joined by the Trojan phalanx, and right glad we were of their merry company. I guess most of you know Robert Wade, the good Hercules of Freethought in Troy, who has borne the brunt of many a battle, and with him was Mr. Jeffries, president of the Troy Secular Union; Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Wilbur, and others, the brave and the fair of this industrial center. The hand of fellowship was struck, and New York, Albany, and Troy met in happy greeting, and from thence an arch of triumph shall be woven for human progress.

By and by, when the shadows began to deepen and the sunlight to take on a deeper gold, we all gathered together beneath the apple-trees, and had an out-door business meeting, and talked up the Convention, and made arrangements for its ample success. Our Troy and Albany friends are taking hold of this affair with splendid enthusiasm. They realize what an immense practical power it will be both for home improvement and world-wide advancement. The program of the Convention is not yet fully determined upon, but the following speakers hav been selected by the Excutiv Committee for the course of lectures to be given: Robert G. Ingersoll, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, James Parton, Courtlandt Palmer, T. B. Wakeman, Charles Watts, Mrs. Krekel, and Helen H. Gardener. Such an array of speakers cannot fail, with the other attractions of the Convention, to command the attention of the public and win the recognition of the press. With such noble local elements as are in Albany and Troy, and with the grand response which must be made from the state and the country, the Convention will perhaps be the most notable so far in the annals of Freethought. It is proposed to hav course tickets for the seven lectures besides Mr. Ingersoll's, for which there will be separate tickets, and the price for the course ticket is $1, giving admission to all sessions of the Convention up to Sunday afternoon inclusiv. Mr. Ingersoll's lecture will be on Sunday evening. The zeal of our Troy and Albany friends is shown in the fact that they hav agreed to dispose of six hundred of these dollar tickets before the meeting of the Convention. Thus its financial success is assured, and financial success means a crowning success in every other direction.

So our hearts beat high with hope; our banners are floating on the breeze; the spirit of unity prevails; the fire burns in many a heart; from rank to rank goes the word of cheer.

We all returned from the picnic-ground in season for a lecture in the evening, which I gave upon the "Demands of Humanity."

I was glad to meet again with our good friends, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Williams. Mr. Williams was formerly president of the Albany League, and he has done most valuable service, and is a most noble Liberal.

Charles Luck, the genial secretary, is always on hand. He has the fire of youth and its indomitable spirit. He can laugh dull care away, and at the same time do earnest deeds.

Mr. Joseph McDonough is a prominent business man in Albany, and has for years been an outspoken Freethinker. He says it has not injured him, that he knows of, to thus speak his own mind. He has been respected for his courage. He is one of the finest extemporaneous speakers in our ranks. He is thoroughly posted in our ideas and history. He recently gave a lecture on "The Struggles of Freethought" before the Troy Secular Union, and his audience were delighted with his eloquence and ability.

Next Sunday evening Mr. Howard Williams lectures before the Albany Liberal Association. He is a young journalist of promis and ability, lately from London, England. He has the enthusiasm of humanity, and is a most earnest worker for freedom. He will be of great service in the Freethought ranks, with his facil pen and wide knowledge.

So we had a feast indeed, as all our readers will admit. We hav had the best of company, and all the glory of mother nature, and we hav renewed courage for our toil. Onward and sunward, that is our route, and I feel as if I had bought a through ticket, palace car and all, for this goal of all our race except for the deadheads. We don't want any deadheads on our line. We must work our passage somehow, by muscle or brain.

Now, Friends, Liberals, attention. We propose to open our books for the sale of tickets and subscriptions for the Albany Convention at once. The expenses of this Convention for Opera House, speakers, advertising, and music will be at least a thousand dollars. We must do this work on a grand scale, and the results will be in proportion. The churches will realize that our organization is to be respected. We do not purpose to take up a single collection or to make a single appeal for money at the Convention. We must settle its pecuniary affairs before the Convention meets, and so not be troubled afterward. Our Troy and Albany friends hav bought six hundred tickets. We ought at least to sell in the States and elsewhere four hundred tickets before the Convention. Who will speak? Send your names and money at once, and the ticket will be forwarded. Buy one ticket, at least, whether or not you purpose to come to the Convention. Buy it for good will Get your neighbors to buy. Levy a good-natured tax on some of our Christian friends. They are continually asking us Liberals to patronize their church fairs, etc. One good turn deserves another. Let them buy a ticket for our affairs. Perhaps they will come. I want every Freethinker in New York state, especially, to be interested in this matter, and, together with Albany and Troy friends, sell a thousand one-dollar tickets before the Convention. If we more than pay the expenses of the Convention, and the State Association has a nice little bank account of a couple of hundred dollars or more, you may be sure that something lively will be done next wi nter that will make the old bones of theology shake. We do not purpose to be idle.

Moreover, besides the sale of one dollar tickets in which every Liberal can join, there will be personal subscriptions received from those good and fortunate Liberals who hav, in spite of their heterodoxy, been smiled upon by the goddess of this world, and hav a little more money than is actually necessary for the needs of the hour, and who esteem it a luxury to giv of their wealth to that which is so dear to their hearts, like Courtlandt Palmer, Mr. and Mrs. McDonough, and others. I am not rich, alas! but I esteem it a privilege to put my mite into this stream which is destined to float one of the richest argosies that ever gladdened the eyes of the nations.

The call is gone forth. Look at the list below. Let it be rapidly increased. All names will be announced in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. This year there will be a treasurer's report, and a strict account of all moneys received and expended will be published.

In Memoriam.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: The death of T. C. Leland, so sudden and unexpected, is certainly a misfortune to the Liberal cause, and every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will so consider it; he was emphatically a worker and believed fully in work, and for such work will be held in honorable remembrance by us all; but Mr. Leland was not entirely absorbed in the public life which he lived to such good acceptance; he was a true friend, and, as such, his death is to me a special loss. We old people make few new friends, and when one like him we hav just put away from our sight leaves us, it is to those blessed with such friendship a deep sorrow. Alas! alas! that we shall see his his face no more.

I thank you for the notice by card of his funeral. I found it impossible to attend. The sickness of my sister, for more than two years, has changed my habits so much that I hav become a "stay at home;" and then the infirmities that come upon one when within two years of the time alloted to humanity make it easy to find large lions in the way, and so, both of necessity and from disinclination, I go very little from home, but every word of good for the truth's cause is always a delight, and surely the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has my weekly blessing. Mr. Wakeman's speech over the remains of our friend was so very good, and Mr. Putnam's poem I think one of his best; and now we bid him a heartfelt good-bye.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

Bible Harmony.

Since the Bible contains many things which are totally inconsistent and incredible, I shall therefore point out a few passages to which I shall refer specifically, so that the reader may see for himself, and test their digestibility, so as to more accurately determin the harmony of holy writ, wherein is stated, among other things, that of several men, each has had more than one father; that some had more than one natural mother; and that father and son were both of one mother; also that a king of Judah was two years younger than his youngest son, and that a king of Israel built a city after he had been dead ten years, and many such contradictory, absurd fables too numerous to mention. Yet advocates of Christianity claim that such irreconcilable absurdity is infallibly true, and instead of adducing a particle of proof, defame and slander others for disbelieving it. Would it not be proper to quote a few passages and compare them, so that a correct estimate of their similarity, and of the purity and harmony of the holy book, may be formed?

It is stated in Luke that Salah was a son of Cainan:

Salah, which was the son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad (Luke iii, 35, 36).

It is stated in Genesis that Salah was a son of Arphaxad:

Arphaxad lived five and thirty years, and begat Salah (Gen. xi, 12).

In Matthew is stated thus:

Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus (Matt. i, 16).

In Luke is stated thus:

And Jesus . . . . being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli (Luke iii, 23).

Now, my Christian friend, unless you can believe that Joseph was the son of Jacob, and that he was also the son of Heli, you will hav to believe that the holy book tells downright lies, which hav been imposed on you by priestcraft.

Moreover, can you believe that one son had two mothers?

Abijah was a son of Maachah:

Rehoboam [king of Judah] loved Maachah, the daughter of Absalom, above all his wives [18 in number, 28 sons and sixty daughters] . . . . And Rehoboam made Abijah, the son of Maachah, the chief (2 Chron. xi, 21, 22).

And Abijah was a son of Michaiah:

In the eighteenth year of King Jeroboam [king of Israel] began Abijah to reign over Judah. . . . . His mother's name was Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chron. xiii, 1, 2).

Suppose it should be assumed that Maachah and Michaiah were only different names, but one and the same person, yet it would make it no less absurd, especially since their fathers' names are recorded also. Or if it should be presumed that there were two kings of Judah by the name of Abijah, in such a case see "Bible Inquirer," page 18, where Bible references and citations are given that all the names of the kings of Judah from David to Zedekiah can be seen at a glance.

God will hav all men to know the truth:

The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works (Ps. cxlv, 9). Who will hav all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. ii, 4). The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes (Ps. xix, 8).

God conceals the truth, and imparts deception:

There is, verily, a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof (Heb. vii, 18). The Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes (Is. xxix, 10). God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear (Rom. xii., 8). Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgment whereby they should not liv (Ezek. xx, 25). And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord hav deceived that prophet (Ezek. xiv, 9). Ah, Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people (Jer. iv, 10).

Propheey is reliable:

We hav also a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place. . . . Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost (2 Pet. i, 19, 21). O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets hav spoken (Luke xxiv, 25).

Prophecy and priestcraft denounced by the Lord:

The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means (Jer. v, 31). From the prophet even unto the priest, every one dealeth falsely (Jer. vi, 13). For both prophet and priest are profane. . . . Thus saith the Lord of hosts, hearken not unto the words of the prophets. . . . For who hath stood in the counsel of the Lord, and hath perceived and heard his word? who hath marked his word and heard it (Jer. xxiii, 16, 17, 18)? As troops of robbers wait for a man, so the company of priests murder in the way by consent, for they commit lewdness (Hosea vi, 9). Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never hav enough, and they are shepherds that cannot understand; they all look to their own way, every one for his gain (Is. lvi, 11). Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing. . . . By their fruits ye shall know them (Mat. vii, 15, 20).

Good tidings of great joy to all people:

And the angel said unto them, Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born . . . a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. . . . And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men (Luke ii, 10–14).

The good tidings were not great joy to all people:

That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, . . . from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias. . . . Verily I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation (Luke ii, 50, 51). Suppose ye that I am come to giv peace on earth? I tell you nay (Luke xii, 51). The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child; and the children shall rise up against their parents and cause them to be put to death. . . . I came not to send peace, but a sword (Matt. x, 21, 34). And he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one (Luke xxii, 36).

Christ spoke intelligibly to the world:

I spake openly to the world; . . . and in secret hav I said nothing (John xviii, 20). That the world may know that I love the father (John xiv, 31). Who will hav all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. ii, 4). For I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance (Mat. ix, 13). Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house (Matt. v, 15).

He spoke intentionally so as not to be understood:

He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts, that they should not see with their eyes nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them (John xii, 40). But without a parable spake he not unto them; and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples. He said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God; but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables. That seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing, they may hear and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them (Mark iv, 34, 11, 12). I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. xv, 24).

The twelve apostles were to sit upon twelve thrones:

The father loved the son, and hath given all things into his hand (John iii, 35). When the son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix, 28). [If so, then Christ has not yet occupied that throne.]

The twelve apostles never did sit on the twelve thrones:

Hav not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? (John vi, 70). Woe to that man; . . good were it for that man if he had never been born (Mark xiv, 21). But he turned and said unto Peter: Get the behind me Satan, thou art an offense unto me (Matt. xvi, 23). Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my father which is in heaven (Matt. x, 33).

The twelve left him all, and forsook him:

Then all the disciples forsook him and fled. . . Now Peter sat without in the palace, . . but he denied before them all. . . Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man (Matt. xxvi, 56, 69–74). Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory (Luke ix, 26). To sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to giv, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my father (Matt. xx, 23).

God's chosen people a kingdom of priests:

Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation (Ex. xix, 6). For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord had chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth (Deut. xiv, 2). Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, . . which in time past were not a people, but are now the children of God (1 Peter ii, 9, 10). Be ye therefore merciful as your father also is merciful (Luke vi, 36).

The same book says their father was a murderer:

Ye be witnesses unto yourselvs, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell (Matt. xxiii, 31–33)? Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do; he was a murderer from the beginning, . . he is a liar, and the father of it (John viii, 44).

God (in his book) declares himself to be the murderer:

I will destroy man whom I hav created from the face of the earth: both man and beast, . . for it repenteth me that I hav made them (Gen. vi, 7). Because they had looked into the ark of the Lord, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and three score and ten men (1 Sam. vi, 19). The Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them (Josh. x, 11). So the Lord sent pestilence upon Israel, and there fell of Israel seventy thousand men (1 Chron. xxi, 14). And it came to pass that at midnight the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt (Ex. xii, 29).

God's laws were never to be revoked:

This is my covenant which ye shall keep between me and you, and thy seed after thee. Every man-child among you shall be circumcised. . . And the uncircumcised man-child . . shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant (Gen. xvii, 10, 14). My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips (Ps. lxxxix, 34). Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets, . . for verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled (Matt. v, 17, 18). Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all (Jas. ii, 10).

God's law revoked by the Christian dispensation:

Behold I, Paul, say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing (Gal. v, 2). For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment, . . for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. (Heb. vii, 18). The law and the prophets were until John, since that time the kingdom of God is preached (Luke xvi, 16). But now we are delivered from the law (Rom. vii, 6). Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances (Eph. ii, 15).

David's cruelty to innocent people:

David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, saying, lest they should tell on us (1 Sam. xxvii, 11). And David, . . . went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it. . . . And he brought forth the people that were therein, and put them under saws and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln; and thus did he unto all the cities of the children of Ammon (2 Sam. xii, 29, 31). Thou shalt not build a house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight (1 Chron. xxii, 8). The sword shall never depart from thy house, because thou hast despised me (2 Sam. xii, 10).

David's acts were to God's entire satisfaction:

I hav found David, the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will (Acts xiii, 22). Who followed me with all his heart, to do that only which was right in mine eyes (1 Kings xiv, 8).

No man on earth is righteous:

In thy sight shall no man living be justified (Ps. cxliii, 2). There is none righteous, no, not one (Rom. iii, 10). For there is not a just man upon earth (Eccl. vii, 20).

Just Lot was righteous:

Just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked; for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds (2 Pet. ii, 7, 8). And Lot went up out of Zoar, . . . and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters. . . . Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father (Gen. xviv, 30, 36).

God was with Joseph, yet his brethren stole and sold him:

The patriarchs . . . sold Joseph into Egypt; but God was with him (Acts vii, 9). Judah said unto his brethren: What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood? Come and let us sell him to the Ishmaelites, . . . and his brethren were content; . . . and sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver (Gen. xxxvii, 26, 28).

He who steals and sells his brother must die:

If a man be found stealing any of his brethren of the children of Israel, and maketh merchandise of him, or selleth him, then that thief shall die; and thou shalt put evil away from among you (Deut. xxiv, 7).

Hating our relativs enjoined:

If any man come unto me, and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple (Luke xiv, 26).

Hating our relativs condemned:

Honor thy father and mother (Eph. vi, 2). Husbands, love your wives. . . . No man ever yet hated his own flesh (Eph. v, 25, 29). Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer (1 John iii, 15). He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen (1 John v, 20)?

Man and beast go to one place after death:

The dead know not anything; . . . For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest (Eccl. ix, 5, 10). For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts, . . . as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; . . . All go unto one place (Eccl. iii, 19, 20).

Not all—some go to endless misery:

These shall go away into everlasting punishment (Matt. xxv, 46). Where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever. . . . And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire (Rev. xx, 10, 15). And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever (Rev. xiv, 11).

Canadian Notes.

The Toronto Secular Society held a grand strawberry festival on Wednesday evening last. The first part consisted of a miscellaneous concert, introducing a variety of sentimental and comic songs, together with readings and recitations, making up a first-class entertainment. Secondly came an unlimited supply of the most luscious and tempting strawberries, with the delicious accompaniment of clotted cream; verily a feast for the gods, a fitting prelude to tripping on the light fantastic toe, which brought a delightful evening to a close.

Dr. Wild, of the Bond Street Congregational church, has thought proper to bring charges against the Freethought settlement in the United States. He accuses them of unbridled licentiousness, disgusting debauchery, and all manner of filthy practices and obscenity. Will the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER be kind enough to procure all the information he can on the subject, and forward it to the present writer, R. B. Butland, 37 King street West, Toronto, and also, if he thinks it advisable, will he kindly write an article on the subject, and issue it in THE TRUTH SEEKER?*

The Alton Secular Society is a very remarkable one. They hav built the first Freethought hall in Canada, and hav made the name of Alton a familiar household word in every corner of Canada. Alton possesses a very remarkable family in the Algies; the various members of the same family supply the platform with lectures on every topic of interest in the world of literature, science, and art. They are well-read, well-informed on every subject, good speakers and writers for the public press; they are excellent readers, reciters, and declaimers on the public platform, and possess the histrionic faculty as exemplified by the excellent manner in which they produce dramas, farces, and standard plays.

The Toronto Secular Society are fortunate in the possession of a comic vocalist of the very first water in the person of Mr. Arthur Tilney, who is, beyond comparison, the funniest man in Canada, and ranks among the brightest stars of comedy to be found on the stage in any part of the world. Managers of concerts are making it a point to engage him as the leading attraction.

As regards the origin of the mental faculties of animals, and more especially their specific expressions, the so-called instincts, we must regard instincts as essentially the habits of the soul, acquired by and transmitted and fixed by inheritance through many generations. Instincts are, therefore, like all other habits, which, according to the laws of cumulativ adaptation and inheritance, lead to the origin of new functions, and thus also to new forms of the organs. Here, as everywhere, interaction between function and organ goes hand in hand. Just as the mental faculties of man hav been acquired by the progressiv adaptation of the brain, and been fixed by continual transmission by inheritance, the instincts of animals, which differ from them only in quantity, not in quality, hav arisen by the gradual perfecting of their mental organ, that is, their central nervous system, by the interaction of adaptation and inheritance. Instincts, as is well known, are inherited, but experiences and new adaptations of the animal mind are also transmitted by inheritance, and the training of domestic animals to different mental activities which animals are incapable of accomplishing, rest upon the possibility of adaptation. We already know of a series of examples in which such adaptations, after they had been transmitted through a succession of generations, finally appeared as innate instincts, and yet they hav only been acquired from the ancestors of the animals. Inheritance has here caused the result of training to become instinct. The characteristic instincts of sporting dogs, shepherd dogs, and other domestic animals, and the natural instinct of wild animals, which they possess at birth, were in the first place acquired by their ancestors by adaptation. They may in this respect be compared to man's knowledge a priori, which, like all other knowledge, was originally acquired by our remote ancestors a posteriori by sensuous experience. It is evident that knowledge a posteriori arose only by long enduring, acquired adaptation of the brain out of originally empiric or experimental knowledge a posteriori The truth of the doctrin of filiation is proved by the well-known facts of comparativ anatomy and embryology. All the great and general laws and all the comprehensiv series of phenomena of biology can only be explained and understood by the theory of development, and especially its biological part, the theory of descent; and without it they remain completely inexplicable and incomprehensible. The internal and causal connection between them all proves the theory of descent to be the greatest inductiv law of biology.

The advocates of the evolution philosophy naturally ask, Why does the human germ assume in succession the forms of the germs of all other animals in gradation, from the lowest to the highest? Instead of, as would naturally be expected, having its own, proper and peculiar form, why this apparently needless, useless waste of energy in this straight down the crooked lane all around the square way of working? Why this particular process? How came it about?

There is only one answer, that all the various forms of animal life that hav ever lived on the surface of the earth hav been evolved out of preceding organisms by a regular gradation from the lowest organism, which originated by spontaneous generation, up to the highest, culminating in man. It is utterly impossible to giv any other answer or any other theory that will account for all the phenomena. Arrested development (rudimentary organs) are proofs positiv of the evolution theory, the embryo teeth and feet of whales, embryo feet in serpents, eyes which do not see in fish living in rivers underground in the dark. In some cases we find these rudimentary organs are inconvenient, in others positivly dangerous. All these are perfectly consistent with and proofs of evolution, but which it is impossible to account for in any other way. R. B. BUTLAND.

"THE God of the Christian" is an arithmetical conundrum, an amorphous spawn of intellectual debauchery which starts with the axiom 3=1. Christ himself is the second person of the Christian Godhead, and, at the same time, the whole of the Christian Godhead. The Father is the first person of the Christian Godhead, and, at the same time, the whole of the Christian Godhead. The Ghost is the third person of the Christian Godhead, and, at the same time, the whole of the Christian Godhead. The Christian God is infinit; but Father, Son, and Ghost are all equal; and although it takes the three of them to make up the Godhead, yet any one of them, with the two others deducted, makes up the Godhead. In other words, you take two from three, and three remain. Each one of the three parts is not the part, but the whole. The whole is God, and God is infinit; but each one of the three parts is God, and God is infinit; ergo, there are three infinits, three pleroma, three somethings, each one of which is everything.—W. Stewart Ross.

Clerical Studies.

Close by a cathedral in Marseilles there livs a merry cobbler, who very innocently has given grave offense to the black-gowned dignitaries of his parish.

This cobbler, perched in the corner of an old wall, has a pet monkey, who all day long is capering and grimacing among the parings of hides and soleless shoes with windows at the toes. Some cobblers are satisfied with a canary bird or goldfinch in a cage; this friend of ours keeps a sapajou. Everybody takes his pleasure where he finds it, and this is no crime. But this monkey, prescient of his proximate humanity, manifests mysterious religious tendencies. His favorit pastime has been climbing along the front of the cathedral. There, seated on his tail, he peeps through window panes at what is going on within. Several times the sacristan, crossing the street, has come to giv the cobbler a rating in the name of the curate. But the pious votary of St. Crispin pleaded that his monkey, having been brought up among good Christians, and indeed under the very shadow of the church, was a beast without guile, and that his curiosity rather evinced pious inclinations. He also remarked that our pious forefathers, those wonderful builders and sculptors of friezes in the bygone ages of faith, had not scrupled to adorn with heads of beasts the cornices of old cathedrals, as Notre Dame bears witness. Thus the monkey obtained grace.

One morning, however, observing the door of the sacristy open, he slipped in, and finding a square cap and surplice to his liking, put them on. Thus sacredly accoutred, he enters the sanctuary and gets upon the steps of the great altar. In the body of the building at this time there were only two old ladies kneeling, with their heads bowed against a prayer desk, in ecstatic meditations.

Then the monkey, emboldened, began to toss about the missals, the candlesticks, vases, and statuets.

The devout ladies, roused, became conscious that the tonsure displayed by the hindquarters of this prodigy was neither the curate's nor the vicar's; cried aloud, "O Lord, hav mercy on us," and ran away as if the devil was after them.

The whole church membership was presently in commotion, and the penitents believed that the devil had in fact taken lodgings in the house of God.

Curate, vicars, beadle, bell-ringer, and the Swiss guard, all drew back, frightened at the monkey's gambols on the altar.

The Swiss, whose religious education is defectiv, owing to his birth in a country of heretics, was the first to suspect that, however probable the subtil instigations of the enemy of mankind, the phenomenon admitted of a naturalistic explanation, and as it did not seem proper that the devil should hav things all his own way, this view gained credence.

Then the Swiss alone, armed with his truncheon, marched upon the sapajou, who, apprehending danger, climbed along the frame of a picture representing the flight of Israel from Egypt, and, from molding to molding, from cornice to cornice, reached an open window, and absquatulated. A minute later he was quietly playing before the cobbler's door.

The curate, whose terror now gave way to indignation, lodged complaint against the cobbler with the police, and the cobbler was summoned to answer. Confounded by this strange event, he no longer defended the pious inclinations of his monkey, but he pleaded, "Would it not redound more to the glory of religion to change the beast's heart, than to tie him up? In Spain, where I was raised, good Catholics were used to hav their asses and their pigs baptized, and surely my monkey is more human than they. Try this on him, and I will go his surety for good behavior to the extent of supplying the curate with shoes." This proposition rests sub judice, the question being considered too intricate for the curate to decide upon his own responsibility. An answer is expected from his holiness the pope.

Without altering any of the facts in this narrativ I hav permitted myself a few pious reflections.

The religious education of animals is not a new idea. It dates at least from the epoch of the prophet Balaam, and Wordsworth, in his "White Doe of Rylstone," has voiced it with tender sublimity. But the clerical education of the monkey is a promising suggestion, especially since it has become difficult, at least in Europe, to engage children of respectable families for the service of the altar as enfants de chœur. I hav noted this myself in Paris, even under Louis Napoleon. I commend it to my Darwinian brethren in Christ, such as Henry W. Beecher, as a second title to immortality, to be added to his illustrious and physiological researches in Christian Socialism, where he has found that "bread and water" are plenty good enough for workingmen, and ought to satisfy them.

You also, Brother Swing, you also, Brother Talmage, though not an evolutionist like those whose catholicity embraces Jesus and Malthus and Darwin in one clasp, you ought, all of you, to feel a divine sympathy with our monkey, for do you not every Sunday "play such tricks before high heaven at the altar as make the angels laugh?" EDGEWORTH.

He Rests from His Labors.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It was with heartfelt and most sincere feelings of sorrow that I read in a morning paper a notice of the death of my friend and whilom associate in the Liberal cause, Theron C. Leland. It was my good fortune to hav made his acquaintance over a quarter of a century ago, and at a time when many of the great social questions which, although not all solved, are yet in a fair way of ultimate solution, were new, strange, and exceedingly unpopular.

Mr. Leland was among the earliest to catch the gleam of the new truth, and among the first to suffer the penalty which follows the bold assertion of unpopular doctrins.

He did not liv to see, as we may not, the full realization of his hopes and aspirations for a higher and better life for man on this planet; still the aspiration was a source of ennoblement to himself as well as to others with whom he came in contact, and which aspirations, though not fully realized, can never fail to hasten their realization. None realized better than he that for the "city yet to be,"

"——We still must labor,
For its sake bear pain and grief,
In it find the end of living,
And the anchor of belief."

Mr. Leland was no pessimist. No one who had the honor of his acquaintance can ever forget his genial, buoyant, and hopeful disposition. His was a spirit that no defeat could dishearten, or calamity crush. He was not only hopeful, wise, and witty "in himself, but the cause of these qualities in others."

To his eminent services in the cause of Liberalism I need hardly refer, as they are known to all, and hav been fittingly recalled in THE TRUTH SEEKER'S obituary.

The objectiv life of our associate has indeed ended, but his subjectiv life has only just begun. To that subjectiv world that more and more dominates the living, he has contributed more than the average of men. The instrument or personality through and by which the impress on the world was made has vanished from sight—gone to recombine in other forms in nature's endless circuit—but the impress of the personality remains forever as a part of the spiritual inheritance of the race. In a higher and better sense than that meant by the so-called sacred writer, he rests from his labors and his works do follow him. HUGH B. BROWN.

The Early Martyr Lie.

It was a law of the Roman emperors that no subjects should assemble for any purpose. The law was like that of England, referred to by Buckle, vol. i, chap. 7. The English law xxxvi of George III. was very severe, and declared if the meeting held an hour after being ordered by any magistrate to dismiss, the penalty was death. Any justice appointee of the crown could prevent the meeting. It was for persistently violating this law that the early Christians were punished. The act had no reference to Christians. The Emperor Trajan refused to permit a fire company to be organized because it would lead to assemblages of the people. "My subjects must not meet together," said he. See Pliny's letters. All these stories of early martyrs are lies. The so-called martyrs were determined violators of a just and wholesome law of the times. Never was a Christian persecuted because of his belief. It is true that the early Christians so habitually violated this law that they drew upon themselvs a peculiar notice, suspicion, and odium. Finally they became so identified as law-breakers that the words "Christian" and "law-breaker" were synonyms. C. I.

Mr. Hacker Very Badly Off.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The numerous readers of the Liberal papers who received their first Liberal views when young from the lectures of J. Hacker and the Portland Pleasure Boat, that he published seventeen years, will regret to learn that the old gentleman has now passed his eighty-fourth year in very feeble condition. He was taken down suddenly some weeks ago, and says he suffered more and severer pain in one week than ever before in any ten years of his life. He now is able to sit up about one-half the day and works about a little, but, though cheerful, has little hope of ever being any better. ELLA E. GIBSON.

INSURRECTIONS AND REVOLUTIONS.—Insurrections are generally wrong; revolutions are always right. An insurrection is too often the mad and passionate effort of ignorant persons, who are impatient under some immediate injury, and never stop to investigate its remote and general causes. But a revolution, when it is the work of the nation itself, is a splendid, imposing spectacle, because to the moral quality of indignation produced by the presence of evil it adds the intellectual qualities of foresight and combination; and, uniting in the same act some of the highest properties of our nature, it achieves a double purpose, not only punishing the oppressor, but also relieving the oppressed.—Buckle.

What Is a Christian?

When dictionaries and church manuals are so cheap it would seem that religious journals ought to speak with some degree of accuracy. But here we hav the Independent endeavoring to convince its readers that Victor Hugo was really a Christian:

"He was neither a Socialist nor an Infidel, though he found much in the social order of the world which inflamed him against it, and much in the current conventional Christianity which drew his fire. His ethical position as a man and an author was unmistakably Christian. His great work, 'Les Miserables,' is Christian in its primary intention, and we repeat, with Dr. Pressense, that 'we shall forever bless the memory of Victor Hugo for the manner in which he reproduces the drama of a good conscience in the admirable chapter, entitled Une tempete sous un crane.'"

This memorandum of August 2, 1883, given to M. Vacquerie, is also quoted:

"I giv 50,000 francs to the poor. I wish to be carried to the cemetery in their hearse. I refuse the prayers (oraisons) of all churches. I ask for a prayer (priere) from all souls. I believe in God. VICTOR HUGO."

Further evidence the Independent pretends to think it finds in the letter written to the London press by the Rev. Dr. Pressensé, "in which he declares that M. Renan has proceeded 'without warrant' in the 'strange article' in which he has endeavored to make out Victor Hugo's God a mere abstraction. He asserts that, to the end, and in the delirium of sickness, he held fast his faith in God, in the immortality of the soul, and in the greatness of man's destiny, and that from the depth of his heart he honored Jesus."

That Hugo believed in a God and hoped for immortality we hav no doubt. But so did Thomas Paine. That he honored the character known as Jesus, may also be true. But so does Robert G. Ingersoll. That he sometimes argued against Atheism we are prepared to admit. But so did Voltaire. Yet we doubt if the Independent would hav the brazen hardihood to claim that either Paine or Voltaire was a Christian, or that Colonel Ingersoll is.

A Christian is one who believes that a faith in Christ as the son of God, and the savior of mankind through his death upon the cross as an expiatory offering or vicarious sacrifice for the people's sins, will save his soul from sheol and insure its arrival in heaven. It will not do to simply believe in God and a future life. Belief in Christ as the savior is the one prime essential of a Christian. And no matter how bad a character a man may possess, if he has this faith, he is a Christian. And, per contra, no matter how good a man may be, unless he has this faith he is not a Christian.

Victor Hugo did not hav this faith, and consequently was no Christian. Though the Independent expected "from him a great deal of reckless assault on Christianity," yet, because he was a great man, a humanitarian, his life work is called "Christian." We cannot conceive why an intelligent journal should do this, unless it be to conceal from the common people the fact that France's greatest man was an Infidel, and to keep up the delusion entertained by most church-members that all that is good in the world is Christian. But such a reason would be no less than dishonest. Hugo's "Les Miserables" is humanitarian "in its primary intention," and no more Christian than it is Mohammedan. A philanthrophic spirit is not a Christian spirit. On the contrary, the spirit which Christianity has inspired in its more noted characters has led them to commit the most monstrous crimes against humanity. The good that the church has been is the outward manifestations of that benevolence which is inherent in a greater or less degree in every human heart. The evil wrought by Christianity has been the result of fanaticism bred by a most intolerant theology.

It is greatly to be regretted that religious journals feel it necessary to slander Victor Hugo's intellect by saying he was a Christian.

Minister to Italy.

Since Keiley has been withheld from accepting the Italian mission because of his avowed hostility to the Italian government, and openly-expressed sympathy with the pope, Mr. Cleveland has appointed as minister to Italy Judge Stallo, of Cincinnati, whom the Tribune calls "well nigh the most conspicuous Freethinker in this country." The Tribune adds:

"Whether he will be particularly welcome at the Vatican is not, perhaps, a matter about which President Cleveland thought fit to ask himself."

To this the Sun says:

"And why should Mr. Cleveland ask himself any such question? The minister to Italy is accredited to the government of King Humbert, and his instructions contain no reference to the Vatican.

"It is true that Judge Stallo is eminent as a rationalistic philosopher, a follower, so far as a man of original mind can be called a follower, of Spencer and Haeckel; but some compensation for the Freethinking of the minister may be found in the circumstance that Mr. Alden, the new consul-general in Rome, is both a pious Christian of the Anglican or Episcopalian communion, and a very learned ecclesiologist. At the same time, his pronounced sentiments in favor of ritualism carry him far, but we trust not too far, toward the confines of the greatest of all churches, the church of St. Peter."

On this matter the Sun is right. The president should giv no weight to the religious proclivities of his appointees. The capacity of an officer of this country should be measured by Jefferson's political creed in appointments: "Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he faithful to the Constitution?"

The ground for objecting to Mr. Keiley as minister to Italy was that he was an offensiv partisan of the pope. The pope, as is well known, claims that temporal power in Rome should be his. He is in constant warfare with the government of King Humbert, saying that the rightful head of Roman affairs resides in the Vatican, where he is now a prisoner. The pope, therefore, is the head of a virtual rebellion in Italy. Mr. Keiley is on the side of the pope, and against the rightful government. He makes no secret of this. It would hav been a piece of impertinence, if not a graver offense, to hav insisted that the Italian government should accept as the representativ of this government a man notoriously opposed to its own.

As well might the president send as Minister to England a man in open sympathy with and an activ helper of the rebellious portion of Ireland. Representativs of this government should be absolutely neutral in the domestic troubles of the governments to which they are accredited.

The Tent.

Mr. Reynolds has moved the tent from Kalamazoo to Hickory Corners, Mich. Hickory Corners is a small town, in which only one Freethought paper is taken, but it has a hundred or so Liberally inclined people and a large number unacquainted with Liberal ideas. It is just one of those places, Mr. Reynolds thinks, that the tent is intended to reach. Too small for expensiv lectures, yet needing to be woke up on the pressing questions of Secularism, the popular tent method of free lectures will arouse an interest among the people that must last when the lecturer has departed, making the people less inclined to yield to the efforts of the churches.

We are sorry that the Spiritualists of Kalamazoo hav worked rather to hinder than to help the Freethought efforts in that city. Mrs. Gault, herself a firm Spiritualist, rebukes them as being "no help to the cause." This is all wrong, for who has stood up straighter for the rights of Spiritualists than the Liberals? What paper has given them such extended opportunity to discuss their philosophical doctrins and set forth their material phenomena as THE TRUTH SEEKER? The churches would, if they could, wipe the Spiritualists out of existence, and it is worse than folly for Spiritualists as a body to obstruct the work of allies they may sometime sorely need.

We think, however, that in most places the Spiritualists will zealously aid the missionary efforts of Mr. Reynolds, and we advise him not to form a too hasty opinion to their disparagement. We hope his tent campaign will be the starting-point of a grand propagandist work, to be pursued summer and winter, by men competent, and who possess the confidence of the people.

Catholic Idolatry and Superstition.

One of the saddest results of Christian superstition were the scenes enacted in Montreal this month over the remains of two Catholic prelates. A correspondent of the Evening Post, of this city, in relating them says it proves plainly that the age of superstition and belief in priestcraft has not departed from Montreal, notwithstanding that its inhabitants are wont to boast of it as the commercial metropolis of the dominion and a center of culture and education. For six consecutiv days, says this writer, the body of Archbishop Bourget lay exposed in St. Peter's Cathedral. A motley crowd, including all sorts and conditions of men, smitten with every conceivable infirmity, blind and maimed, flocked to the death-chamber of the archbishop, and as they approached his bier fell on their knees, and touching the cold clay reverently, called upon the departed prelate to heal their infirmities. A French paper, describing the scenes, related that immediately after the archbishop closed his eyes in death, which took place in the presence of about three hundred people, the room being thrown open to all the faithful, two priests and three nuns were placed around the body to direct those who came to touch the prelate's hands and vestments with their beads and other pious objects, and to preserve them as talismans. Millions of articles were in this way brought into contact. A few minutes after the archbishop had breathed his last, a fashionably-dressed lady drove up in her carriage, and, with a sick child in her arms, knelt reverently, and clasping the hands not yet cold in death, cried in the most piteous manner, "O Monseigneur, you cured one of my children; will you do as much for another?" At her side knelt the son of Hon. Louis Beaubien, a school commissioner, a member of the Legislativ Assemby of the Province, a member of the Council of Agriculture and Public Instruction. The young man was blind, and as the dead prelate had in his lifetime promised to cure him, he prayed: "Hear me, O Monseigneur; now is the time to cure me. You told me I would see; cure me, cure me!" He then retired, and in company with a vast multitude of the faithful who, suffering from all kinds of infirmities, proceeded to partake of the "host," remaining in the vicinity until the conclusion of the obsequies, and daily expecting to hav their prayers answered.

On the 13th instant the scenes in the cathedral were revolting. The body, we are told, lay on a high catafalque around which four priests were busily engaged receiving books, beads, crucifixes, and even children, to be placed in contact with the body. Others were doing a rushing trade in disposing of rosaries which had already been "sanctified" by contact. During these proceedings a procession of priests, headed by ten bishops, entered to sing the last libera prior to laying the remains in the vault. The body of the archbishop was taken from the catafalque and removed from the wooden casket to one of metal. A rush was made for the discarded coffin, and so indecent became the scene that the police had to be called in in order to keep the fanatical multitude from injuring each other in their attempts to capture the lining and trimmings. Finally order was restored. Then the priests commenced breaking up the coffin and distributing it to the people in small pieces. The French Catholic papers announce that hundreds of miracles hav been performed through idolatrous contact with the corpse, and say that hundreds more are expected to follow.

But these disgraceful scenes were not confined to St. Peter's Cathedral. In another sanctuary, that of Notre Dame Pitie, were exposed the remains of the predecessor of the archbishop, who had been interred in its vaults nearly fifty years previously. The Sisters of the Congregation, with the approval of Mgr. Fabre, the present bishop, secured one of the dead prelate's feet as a relic to be deposited in a special altar and venerated each year on the anniversary of his death.

Such scenes as these exhibit a most deplorable absence of civilization in Montreal. These doings were not confined to the ignorant classes, nor to the "Canucks" of the surrounding country. Professional men and "educated and cultured" women, says the correspondent, were seen crowding round the coffin, in many instances with their children in their arms, in order that their little ones might be "sanctified" by the touch of the dead. And when a son of a school commissioner and member of the council of public instruction, judges and lawyers, mayor and aldermen of the city, are seen taking part in such barbarous practices, a good idea can be obtained of what Catholicism is doing for the province in which it has almost unlimited power. And the archbishop himself was largely responsible for this exhibition of superstition, for during recent years it is said he claimed to be gifted with miraculous healing powers through the "intercession of the Virgin." Throughout his whole life the archbishop was a fanatical Catholic. He forbade Catholics to hav social intercourse with Protestants, and refused to recognize a dominion statute passed to prevent clerical influence in elections. He aided the "Christian Brothers" in establishing schools, forbidding his flock to attend any others, even though under the supervision of the lay members of his congregation. The result is seen in the gross ignorance of the Catholic population of his diocese.

It is painful to read of such groveling superstition in any country, but the pain is keener from knowing that it is but the legitimate and expected result of the teachings of a religion that has a dangerously strong foothold in our own nation, and especially in our own metropolis.

The Modern Balaam.

Quite a number hav written for prices in quantities of the picture published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. We hav therefore had a large number printed on calendered paper, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we will send, postage free, at the following rates: one dozen, 30 cents; one hundred, $1 50; one thousand, $10. We hope a large number will be ordered, and posted up everywhere, as those who hav written about it say the cut speaks volumes.

Editorial Notes.

THE selectmen of Clinton, Mass., refused to rent the town hall for a lecture by Colonel Ingersoll on a Sunday night.

IT is, perhaps, an ungallant thing to say a word against a lady, but Miss Cleveland's presentation of an elaborately bound copy of her new book to Queen Victoria, implying thereby a sort of equality with the occupant of the British throne, is in very bad taste for a republican. Miss Cleveland seems to hav a very erroneous idea of her place in American politics.

UPON the discussion of the "nude in art," which is again rife, the Nashville Banner has a pertinent say: "If the advocates and opponents of the nude in art would devote a greater part of their energy to clothing the poor and naked, and thereby render comment upon the nude in nature unnecessary, they would contribute more notably to the sum of human enjoyment."

IN one of his recent sermons on evolution Mr. Beecher said: "But if the Bible is the word of God, according to the old theory of plenary inspiration, then Mormonism is right." This is what the Liberals hav said ever since Mormonism has been a factor in religion. Mr. Beecher has a picturesque way of putting things in his series of sermons, but he is guilty of an enormous amount of plagiarism from the Infidels.

THE successful community of the future will be based on agreement concerning the things of this world; not upon the lonesome fact that its members can all subscribe to a creed dealing with the next. It is folly to try to organize a new society in which every member has separate ideas of how to liv here, and has in common with his fellows only the belief that when dead they will all go to one place. Such a community could succeed only when the members were all dead.

THE members of Dr. Kittredge's congregation in Chicago hav retained counsel to restrain the Sunday sports now common in that city. A temporary injunction has been issued forbidding Sunday hippodromes, and from the tenor of the bill it appears that the persecutors intend to put a stop to outdoor sports on Sunday as far as they conflict with the state laws or can be construed as public nuisances from a Sabbatarian point of view.

MR. BURNHAM WARDWELL, the prison reformer, has left New York for Vineland, N. J. During the week he passed in New York he spoke at the Constitution Club, the New York Spiritualists' Association, the Baptist Conference, the Labor Lyceum, the Science of Life Club, and elsewhere, everywhere exciting great interest in his work by his ardor and earnestness. He devoted one morning to a pilgrimage to Greenwood, for the purpose of visiting the resting-place of D. M. Bennett.

COMMENTING upon our comments on Mr. Green's offer to pay a clergyman to occupy a whole evening at the coming Albany Convention, the Investigator says: "Any clergyman, orthodox or otherwise, appearing at the Freethinkers' Convention, and desirous of speaking, would no doubt be indulged in a short speech. But to crowd out Liberal speakers to make room for an orthodox clergyman, who would attend for the purpose of opposing, and paying him for his work, reminds us of an old Puritan law which sentenced the offender to be flogged and made him pay forty shillings to the officer who performed the task! If the Freethinkers should run short of speakers, it will be time enough to call on clergymen for help."

MR. BEECHER said last Sunday that "those sublime theologians, the newspapers," were asking him why he did not go out with Colonel Ingersoll, and he wanted to say that he believed that "Mr. Robert Ingersoll is a gentleman, and worthy of anything but ridicule. He is as good as many men in the pulpit, but one does not need to be very good for that." Let us assure Mr. Beecher that Mr. Ingersoll is as "good" as the best of the pulpiteers—and a good deal better.

FOR refusing to arrest two men who attempted to steal his pet dog, John Stetson, the theatrical manager, called a Boston policeman a "d——d fool." The policeman reported this language to the Police Commissioners, making a charge of blasphemy against Mr. Stetson, who was compelled to pay costs of court. Mr. Stetson thinks it a great town where a man is made the subject of court proceedings for saying "d——d," and sneaking dog thieves are left to go undisturbed under police protection.

FRIENDSHIP LIBERAL LEAGUE, of Philadelphia, and the Pennsylvania State League hav received charters from the state, and are therefore duly incorporated organizations with legal rights and obligations. We note with sorrow that the editor of the Agnostic is picking a bone with Professor Seymour and the Pittsburgh Truth. This is all wrong, gentlemen. Though the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Leagues are strong organizations, they are not strong enough to quarrel. Besides, it sets a bad example for smaller Leagues.

WE learn by a telegram from Lancaster, Pa., that another old Abolitionist has left this world. Orson S. Murray died at his home in Warren county, Ohio, on the 16th instant. In accordance with his desire his son, Charles Murray, editor of the Cincinnati Price Current, had the body conveyed to the crematory and incinerated. Mr. Murray was a Freethinker and Materialist. He was one of the original Abolitionists, and had the honor to be mobbed in Boston, the home of culture, along with Wendell Phillips. He suffered the hard injustice meted to Infidels by Christians in Cincinnati, his testimony being twice ruled out of important cases because of his Atheism.

THE Rev. Washington Gladden has given, in the Christian Union, his opinion that editors of our great papers are so devoted to making money that their ostensible purposes as ethical teachers are constantly crippled. In answer to this the Times says that it has been observed that clergymen hav often deserted their duty for an increase of salary; and while it does not go so far as to say that money is the first consideration of the preacher, it thinks that there are more hypocrits in the pulpit than in the editorial sanctum. "If the light of noonday could be suddenly let in upon the secrets of newspaper management and upon the workings of the clerical mind," it says, "we are confident that for every editor who suppresses the truth and for the sake of gain writes what he does not believe, there would be found two ministers of the gospel who hav continued to preach the doctrin of eternal punishment years after they were inwardly convinced that it was a monstrous and hideous lie."

THE Christian Advocate, in considering the recent congress of churches at Hartford, says that a complete unification of churches is impossible, but thinks that unity among individual Christians can be attained. The Advocate closes by saying:

"Under the conditions of a cordial recognition of one another's churches, as component parts of the kingdom of Christ, a closer union of American Protestant Christians would be an unmixed blessing. It would enable us to present an undivided front against our common antagonist, Rome. It would enable us to resist more effectivly unchristian legislation by the states of our Union, to protect the Lord's day, the sanctity of marriage—in short, to guard the moral life of the nation. We could better then check the encroachments of Secularism, which is slowly but surely taking the American commonwealth off from its original Christian foundation. We Methodists are ready to unite for these ends with our fellow-Christians."

The gist of this is that while the Methodists insist on keeping up the separate church organizations and creeds, they are willing to unite to oppress the Catholics, to tyrannize over the people by Sunday laws, etc., and to fight the Secularists and put God into the Constitution, making this a Christian nation in which none but Christians would hav equal legal rights.

SUNDAY before last Mr. Beecher gave his views upon immortality. In the fewest words, they are that good people go to heaven, while bad people are annihilated. Some of his remarks, directed against New England Congregationalism and its cheering doctrin of eternal punishment, are worth quoting:

"If you sweep out with the broom of indignation that hideous pit that theology has dug under the world; if you take away all those grotesque, infernal, and malign images that yet populate the brains of men, then you hav taken away all the difficulties that inhere in the origin of evil and the origin of sin as springing from the very nature of our evolutionary government in this world. It is these considerations that hav revolutionized my educational beliefs. I cannot separate myself from my fellow-man. I cannot content myself with sitting down in a sweet little parish in New England, where everything is regulated by the highest morality, where the garden sings with birds, and where a sweet and loving people regard me with trust and admiration, and then cipher out a doctrin of the sinfulness of man, and the reasonableness of eternal punishment. I cannot do that. When I think of the condition of men after death, and think of all Africa and Asia, and of the myriads who hav passed away through thousands of years, I ask myself, What has God done with them all? Where are they? Are they wailing in unmitigable torments? If they be so, let me never mention the name of God again, and let me never violate my own nature by calling him father. It tramples under foot the very foundation thoughts we hav of fatherhood. But if you take that all away, and then, having a clean foundation, say, 'Suppose that men go out of existence, and that is the end of it; suppose that men attain to Jesus Christ through faith in Jesus Christ. So far as they hav gone away from animal conditions, and are susceptible of further conditions in a life to come, plant them again. Or if, having been planted and nourished, they hav not developed'—what happens when a taper goes out? The earth does not shake; the sun does not fall; nobody notices it when it goes out. And when a man has not reached the stages that are possible to him, he simply goes out. What inhumanity is that? He that would liv again must liv well now. As for the rest, that, beginning high, go down lower and lower, they lose the ability of renovation. In the great abyss of nothingness there is no sorrow, no pain, and no memory. The idea that God continued through ages and ages to manufacture damnation—I hate it because I love God. I won't be silent about it. I am a lover of mankind. It is my business to make the path in which men's thoughts travel just as plain as I can; to remove errors—and no errors are more mischievous than this theory of the origin and punishment of sin. It can be used only where ignorance prevails. Men can be crammed with it. They can hav the facts recited to them and be told, 'You've got to believe it or be damned.' Of course they will respond, 'Well, rather than be damned, I'll believe it.' I say you are damned if you do believe it. It is hideous. It turns creation into a shamble and God into a slaughterer."

Could Mr. Beecher ever evolute so far as to know that Christ, if he lived, could hav no supernatural power, he will be at one with the Materialists, as he is now with nine-tenths of the Infidels.

W. A. CROFUT, in the World of the 14th, says of his old phonographic teacher: "Theron C. Leland, who died last week, was the oldest and, excepting E. F. Underhill, the best known of the activ phonographers of America. I studied phonography under him thirty years ago, when I was a youngster. Underhill and Theodore Tilton had just been turned out of his school. The teacher also served as amanuensis for C. Edwards Lester, a prolific author and one of the great literary lights of that time, and our school was in a corner of the office. I remember a phonographic feat which would still be considered very remarkable—indeed, I do not think it has ever been repeated or paralleled. Leland announced a lecture, at Clinton Hall, on the novelty phonography, and during his address Mr. Lester, whose figure was familiar, appeared on the platform and said: 'It is well enough known that I am the New York correspondent of the London Times. Mr. Leland is my amanuensis. I will now dictate to him, in your presence, my regular weekly letter. He will take it down as fast as I utter it, put his phonographic notes in an envelope without reading over, and seal it in your presence, post it to-night, and it will go abroad by the morning steamer, and be set up by a compositor in the London Times office who understands phonography, and it will be printed as you hear it spoken.' The program was exactly followed out, and Lester's letter appeared in the 'Thunderer' without being revised or read over either by the author or the reporter. This extraordinary triumph of the mysterious art gave Leland great prestige, and his classes were filled with pupils who caught his own enthusiasm. He was one of the most industrious, faithful, sincere, humane, brave, and earnest of men."

AN Independent Liberal church has been built at Greenwich, Mass. Mr. Henry W. Smith is the generous builder. At the dedication exercises he thus explained why he built the edifice:

"I did not build this church for myself alone, but for the community; not alone to embody my personal views, but to permit free expression of the views of all honest and earnest seekers after truth. We dedicate this church to God—that eternal life and soul that is over all, through all, and in all. We dedicate it to the preaching of the word—not the word alone of Moses and Jesus, but the combined wisdom of all nations; the knowledge embodied in the records of the race; the truth embalmed in the libraries of the world. We dedicate it to perfect freedom of thought. We demand assent to no settled creed. I wish this church to be broad enough to recognize truth wherever found. Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, Materialists, and those whose belief has yet no name, let all unite in the study of the great problems of life and duty. Larger than all creeds, nobler than all personal views, is the grand doctrin of philanthropy—the love of humanity. My own personal views are well known. I believe in the ministration of angels. I believe God's angels find it their duty and pleasure to labor for the uplifting of humanity. I hav called myself a Spiritualist, because that word is the only one that expresses a belief in the living presence of the angel-world. My own experience has brought to me absolute knowledge of the interblending of the two worlds, a certainty beyond doubt or cavil that the grave is not the end of life. I know that beyond the tomb lie the fair, bright fields of eternity, where families, sundered by the hand of death, are once more united in the bonds of love; where the wrongs of earthly life are righted by the hand of eternal justice. Upon this ground let us stand, and let enthusiasm for our common faith be united with loving charity for our little differences of opinion. Thus we shall stand with a united front opposing the hosts of darkness, the enemies of progress."

Judging from the exercises which followed, this church will be very orthodoxly Spiritualistic; but if Liberals can occasionally be allowed to occupy the platform, it will be an improvement on the Christian organizations.

Letters from Friends.

POMONA, June 8, 285.

MR. EDITOR: The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL received, and it fills the bill; it is well worth the price to gaze on the faces of the thirty-nine representativs of Freethought once. The world does move. The evidence of that fact is demonstrated right here in Pomona, a village of about fifteen hundred people, where we hav some seven churches and three weekly newspapers (and only one wears the collar of the church), two of which hav opened their columns to Freethought. The names of the papers that hav recognized the fact that the "world does move" are the Index and Progress, and I suggest to all Liberals through the country to make a note of this.

The followers of the "meek and lowly" in Pomona had been circulating the falsehood that R. G. Ingersoll had retired from the lecture field, had gone back on all that he had said heretofore; in short, had backed down. This was constantly reported on the streets, and was announced from the various pulpits in Pomona. It seems as though they took my silence in the matter as an acknowledgment that such was a fact, and as Christians never read any of the Liberal papers, there was no way of refuting the lie, unless some of the local papers would admit us to their columns. I applied to the editor of the Index, Mr. E. L. Buck, who gave me the use of his columns for the purposes above stated. I wrote a denial, and included some vigorous assertions as regards the veracity of Christians generally when their target was Infidels. The next week appeared a reply from an ex-clergyman, who doubtless felt the holy fire burning in his sanctified breast; he asked me the usual conundrums that are so "pat" with these fellows, who "feel it in their hearts," and I, of course, like a business man, proceeded to giv the facts in the matter, quoting largely from their holy scrap-book to show its utter unreliableness as a guide to the morals of the human race. This seemed to arouse their wrath, and I soon had another, and another, asking me the usually silly questions, but in another paper, the Progress, which had opened its columns to us. And now there are several on both sides contributing to the columns of these two papers, on both sides of the questions. And I am happy to report to our friend Liberals elsewhere that the cause of common sense will not suffer or our banners trail in the dust in Pomona. We are on deck, and shall remain there until the last gun of the sky-pilot is effectually spiked.

I expect to be able to report twelve months hence that there will be several churches to rent in Pomona.

We hav two splendid Liberals here who hav come to my assistance in the above-named papers, and who are doing good service for Freethought. Their names are J. W. Sallee and a Mr. Mell; there are others here that will come to the front in time.

It is wonderful what a little back-bone will do, especially when the back-bone is strengthened by logic, reason, and common sense, and that is what the clergy lack.

And now let me say to Liberals that all that is necessary to make their cause popular with the masses is to continue to present facts. They are the sledge-hammers that will eventually knock hell, hades, or sheol, out of the minds of the people.

H. L. SHAUG.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN, June 4, 285.

MR. EDITOR: With your consent, I will answer, as briefly as possible, the letter in No. 22 by Isaac Paden; then I hope to hav done with it, as far as Liberals are concerned, at least. That orthodox Christians should resort to law to suppress vice and set themselvs up as judges and dictators for other people's morals and appetites is natural enough under their education. But how anybody indorsing the Eighth Demand of Liberalism can be a Prohibitionist is not so clear. Yet, if the Prohibitory law could ever be a success, or result in any good, I might forego my liberality in its favor; but, being a lover of liberty (the more the better), and seeing the results of two years of its working in Kansas, in which time she has paid more revenue on alcoholic drinks than ever before in the same length of time, and seeing the saloons in Leavenworth increase from 100 to 120 during the same time, I cannot giv it much credit as a moralizer. Besides, two of our best judges hav declared it unconstitutional, so I consider such laws impracticable, meddlesome, and injurious. Mr. Paden places a great deal of stress on "the liberty to get drunk." Has he dwelt on the theme so long that he thinks all anti-Prohibitionists are drunkards? All Prohibition lecturers seem to want to convey such an idea. How ridiculous! Not more than one in twenty drinks to excess. The appeal to the better feelings of all such moderate drinkers, and the question, "Should they hav a next-door neighbor who had the misfortune to be born with an appetite for liquor, and gets drunk every chance he gets, and abuses and starves his family," claiming "this to be the condition of thousands and thousands of otherwise respectable men." How respectable? In what way would such a man be respectable? "Is it not selfishness in them to refuse to dispense with the use of liquor if (?) by doing so it would cause the happiness of their neighbor?" Certainly it would, be if it would do so, but it is not my drinking that makes him drunk, nor would my abstinence make him sober. The matter lies wholly with himself and family, and right here is the place to begin. Herein lies the remedy: Make woman the equal of man in the eyes of the law, and let society giv her an equal chance to earn a living; open all the avenues of employment to her that men hav, and withhold the sneers of society; repeal the law that says, "Wives submit yourselvs to your husbands in all things;" make marriage a civil contract, and thereby put such drunken, abusiv, family-starving (otherwise respectable) men on their good behavior instead of their divine authority, and it will hav a tendency to sober them up quicker than all the prohibitory laws ever enacted. "Is not the worship of the sectarian God as sacred to the Christian class as the worship of the goddess of liberty to drink liquor is to the drinking class?" Certainly it is, but while we consider it much more injurious, we are not in favor of prohibiting it by law, if we could, as they are trying to do in the goddess of liberty to drink case, but hope to be able to do so in time by education.

In conclusion, he asks; "What is such argument used for?" and givs the correct answer—"To make the idea of Prohibition look ridiculous." Just so, Brother Paden; it deserves to be shown up in its true light, and the sooner people come to see the impracticability and ridiculousness of it and all such laws, the sooner we will get rid of them.

H. H. HUTCHESON.

BRADFORD, PA., May 24, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 50c., for which please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and Remsburg's "Bible Morals." I read your TRUTH SEEKER with intense delight. The articles upon ancient Mexico are intensely interesting. I hav been permitted to get a faint glimpse of what that wonderful country was before the conquest—in civilization in advance of Spain to-day. It is an undeniable fact that there is not a foot of earth on which Spain has planted a colony but what she has left a withering, paralyzing, fearful curse. When the Catholic church can crush Liberalism, she will turn her attention to the Protestant churches. I am a humble but earnest advocate of Freethought. Let me add that if the cartoons in March 21st and May 2d could be distributed broadcast, it would do a work difficult to obtain in any other way.

Yours truly, J. W. PRENTISS.

WANSHIP, UTAH, June 6, 285.

MR. EDITOR: A party of two hundred and fifty new converts to Mormonism has just arrived in Salt Lake City. It must require a thorough Bible-believing people to accept so unpopular a faith. I should think they could see that the Mormon God is failing to protect his people in carrying out his orders (to marry numerous women), and that the government is determined to prevent them from obeying their god. For all those that hav obeyed him in this are compelled to flee from their homes and hide from the officers of the law (prophets and apostles not excepted), or hide their numerous wives so they cannot be convicted. Every stranger is suspected to be an officer with a warrant for their arrest, and they are not enjoying the peace of mind that the elect should. But the Bible furnishes precedents for prophets hiding for violating the laws of the lands. Also of polygamous people being God's favorits. So Bible believers can still be converted to Mormonism. Now the proper way for the government to repress polygamy, would be to require their chaplains to devote their entire time to teach the people that the Bible God's ways and the ways of the government are absolutely incompatible.

The polygamists now suffering imprisonment are looked upon as martyrs, and it is counted a good investment for glory hereafter. The amount expended to prosecute these people should be invested in Remsburg's "Bible Morals" to be the text books for all Sunday-schools, is the opinion of

Yours truly, WM. REYNOLDS.

NEW YORK, June 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: For Genelli's information I will state that in the "Basic Outlines of Universology," a book of nine hundred pages published in 1872, but the "text" or main portion of which was completed, according to a statement in the introduction, in September 1866, the Philosophy of Integralism is duly set forth, and, as a philosophy, arising of necessity from the science (Universology) of which the book in question is an exposition. This is only one among various books published by Mr. Andrews. And, besides, his acquaintances in New York and vicinity know that he has improved every opportunity available to him, and has been constantly teaching his science and his philosophy. So the answer to Genelli, when making the statement that his own belief regarding first principles is original, asks, "Why not thus with Mr. Wakeman?" is apparent. "Constant Reader" was dealing with a question of fact, and it was neither in his province, nor did he presume to giv any reasons why. He is willing to believe, if anyone can offer sufficient evidence to convince him, that Mr. Wakeman is unconscious of the injustice that he is doing not only Mr. Andrews, but himself as well, but even if this proof were offered it would not change the fact—scarcely justify it. It would palliate the offense. Proof of all this is available and producible at any time if required, but, perhaps, it may not be necessary.

I might reply at length to Genelli's suggestion and queries, but will only say that I think he is mistaken in his assertion that Universology "always has been." It is true that philosophers and thinkers of the past hav conceived the possibility of "the unity of the sciences," but no one claimed ever to hav discovered it until Mr. Andrews. Plato said: "God perpetually geometrizes," but nobody understood what he meant—probably he could not tell himself—until Mr Andrews had discovered and explained it.

For a synoptic exposition of Universology let Genelli read the article, "The New Civilization," in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1885.

CONSTANT READER.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., June 9, 285.

MR. EDITOR: As lightning has now shattered the capstone of Washington's monument, notwithstanding the precaution of lightning conductors, we shall doubtless soon hear from the disgruntled mob of church bigots how "it hath pleased God" to humble those enterprising sinners for attempting to imitate Babel's tower in running their worldly shaft away up so much nearer heaven than the ordinary church steeple. Ah me! I dread to think that God should be offended at the tower built in honor of the only man that could not tell a lie, and still remain on good terms with that most notorious liar, St. Paul, who justified himself in lying, and bragged in public of having taken them in with guile. Alas! for the good old times, when we had a scapegoat devil to bear the blame of this devilish mischief to life and property. 'Tis sad to contemplate the fact that the Westminster Abbey rabble, Henry Ward Beecher, yea, and even our own priest-scalping Ingersoll, hav destroyed both hell and the devil, the very bulwarks of orthodox Christianity, and left them nothing to know them by.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.25, which please fix up as directed. I am glad to be able to send a few new names to your list as subscribers. I am one of those good-natured fellows who can't find any fault with your paper, but would suggest that you send the "man with the badge-pin" on a journey, so that he may write letters to your paper, as he did last year when he went to Maine. He's a brick, and we are just in love with his reports of the Liberal Club meetings. In fact, we devour every word written, with hungry eyes and minds thirsting for knowledge.

SQUAW CREEK, IDAHO TER., June 3, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and the balance in copies of the modern history of sky-pilots, "Crimes of Preachers." I use them as tracts in doing missionary work. Every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER knows who D. M. Bennett was and his persecutors. I would ask them one and all if they know who James Vincent is; and for fear there may be some recent subscribers not posted, I will say he is the senior editor of the American Nonconformist, published in Tabor, Iowa, at $1.50 per year—published weekly when possible. It is the paper tried to be suppressed by those worse than bloodhounds, by trickery and an attempt to get him into the insane asylum, even trying to get his Christian wife to help in their hellish work. He now lies on his bed of pain, one leg gone by the surgeon's knife. Will those who stood by THE TRUTH SEEKER see the American Nonconformist go down with her colors nailed to the mast when one dollar and a half in subscription for one year might save a sinking ship? In haste, with kind wishes to every truth seeker,

A. G CHURCH.

CINCINNATI, O., June 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Doubtless it might be expected that some (perhaps much) abuse would be heaped upon the head of the man who is bold enough to oppose and positivly deny the fanatical assertion of a spiritual existence, and this, sir, as a Materialist, I do most honestly deny, inasmuch as no proof was ever or ever can be manifest to show the least truth of such an assertion. I challenge the entire religious world to show and prove one single case wherein any dead person is still alive. Sir, it is on this glaring falsehood that religious superstition in all its multiform knavery and duplicity, is plundering the thoughtless millions; it's the chief stock-in-trade of all the pedlers of gospel-craft and spook wonderment, and merits the condemnation of every honest-minded man or woman. Sir, Materialism is the bright star that is, and will shine clear through this dark and murky ignorance, and must, ere long, triumph over the stale and meaningless nonsense which hath fooled mankind for ages, and still keeps them as slaves to false and crafty zealots whose only motiv is to fleece them and liv in luxury, idleness, and uselessness. These wind-bags and their minions prate about what they know to be false, but a hypocrit is ripe for any system with money in it. An impostor glories in fraud, and exults at a successful cheat. Sir, this Infidel-Materialist fears no abuse of man, gods, or devils; he is ironclad proof against all and every attack, whether it be my Lord Severance, or any other man. I fear nothing but that which is degrading to manly honor, truth, and honesty.

Yours, T. WINTER.

BRONSTON, KY., June 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I think one of the greatest errors of the world is the belief that the cause of everything that we see and know to exist is an intelligent personal God, who does hear and can grant or reject the prayers of his children at pleasure.

If such a personal intelligent God does not exist, all the prayers that hav ever been offered to him are wholly useless—time and energy spent in the wrong direction. Prayer is the lever by which the priesthood, from the most ignorant iron-jacket Baptist preacher in the backwoods of Tennessee to the pope in Rome, keep the mass of mankind paying homage and tribute to them.

I hav five children. I am teaching them to be truthful, honest, sober, and industrious, and to do unto others what they would hav others do unto them under like circumstances. I also teach them to look after the goods of this world, and to try in an honorable way to procure themselvs a home and surround it with all the comforts they can, so that when they become old they will not become a public charge.

J. N. BROWN.

WENTWORTH, DAK., June 8, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot forbear relating the grand success of the last meeting of our League. We arranged at the last meeting for a grand picnic, and although the orthodox God sent a week's rain before (and during the time sent a bolt of lightning through the barn of an orthodox preacher) to scare us out, yet Sunday morning, June 7th, was as beautiful as any Liberal could wish. At about 11 A.M. we proceeded to the grove on the shore of Lake Madison, ate our dinner, and then held our League. Following is the program: Opening, reading Underwood's prayer, W. L. Horton; oration, "Liberalism, a Year Ago in Wentworth and as We Find It To-day," R. Clauder; music; "The Nine Demands of Liberalism Defined," R. R. Wentworth; music; select reading, "Talmage Under the Hammer," W. L. Horton; closing remarks by Brother R. R. Wentworth. The Wentworth Cornet Band was in attendance and gave us some fine selections. There was an audience present of between two and three hundred. Everybody was well pleased, and all joined in saying it was the best thing they had heard since Professor Jamieson left us. How I wish we were able to hav another course of lectures by friend Jamieson, but times are so hard we cannot think of it now. A few more such events as the one yesterday and sky-pilots will begin to fear us. They were mighty scarey before. They tried to get up a Sunday-school concert in town at the same hour, but there were not over a dozen persons left in town to attend, and by the angry glances shot at us to-day I feel that they feel their case is hopeless. I will hav to beg your endurance a little further. The Wentworth Bund, our paper, is dead as a mackerel, and in its place rises the Dakota Letter. The proprietor, J. E. Patten, is an outspoken Liberal, and will devote a share of his paper to our cause. Things begin to look up, and I feel more like hoping we may yet succeed. Too much cannot be said in favor of Brothers R. R. Wentworth and Rudolph Clauder in their untiring efforts to promulgate our principles. Nor can I forget to say to Brother Jamieson, The little sprig you planted may yet flourish and become a grand oak. With best wishes to you and the TRUTH SEEKER staff, I am yet Fraternally, W. L. HORTON.

ALTOONA, PA., June 1, 285.

MR. EDITOR: There seems to be quite an antagonism between the Materialists on one side, and Spiritualists on the other, through the columns of the good old TRUTH SEEKER. Although this question of Spiritualism has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and in nearly every case proved fatal to the great philosophy and phenomena, yet I beg leave to giv my honest thought concerning it. To me it seems almost as great a superstition as old orthodoxy. Certainly we admit that they are Liberal and hav done, and are now doing, a great and noble work in the cause of state secularization. It is only the superstitious part that we oppose, the same as in Christianity. We hope that science may soon reign supreme. With its world-wide truths it is fast crowding the spirits from the earth—not spirits contained in barrels, but those arising from the vivid imagination of our Spiritualistic brethren. The article on Spiritualism in a recent number of this paper by "N. G. W." was a heavy blow against these visionary phenomena. Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y., has, for many years, frequently shown, from a scientific standpoint, the utter absurdity of this delusiv doctrin, and with his trenchant blade has dealt it blows from which it never can recover.

As far as I am personally concerned I would state that, for a number of years, I hav endeavored to investigate this so-called "Spiritual science," but hav never found one single, solitary grain of truth in any of its claims. I hav been present at table-dances, spirit-rappings, slate-performances, visited places where photographs of those in the spirit-form were on exhibition, and yet it all seemed to me as nonsensical as a negro minstrel performance. The people to whom I went were, no doubt, honest in their convictions, but, as phrenologists say, "their organ of hope was very large," something they should restrain, or use it in making happy "one world at a time." There are thousands of people that believe in spooks, and in curing certain diseases by pow-wowing. When all these people advance by investigation, they most generally launch off into Spiritualism and take mediumistic degrees.

But it is not our aim to assail in any abusiv way whatever our Spiritualistic brethren. Could it be proven that their doctrins are true we would gladly accept them. Believing that our conclusions are correct in regard to their principles being founded on delusion, we think that our justification is complete.

Did I possess the riches of all the orient lands, or all the crown-decked jewels of all the brainless kings, I would gladly giv it all to hear one word from a once loving mother who now sleeps beneath the starry dome of heaven, and o'er whose grave for years hav crept the trailing vines. Not from one that ever passed away, or who sleeps the sleep of death, has come one solitary word. Seasons, years, centuries, yes, ages pass, yet no response. This earth in its unweary cycle moves steadily on. The stars and suns keep their courses amid the countless constellations, while the millions of years that pass are as drops of water in a shoreless sea. Generations pass from life to the silent tomb and there, with all the proof that was ever known, they sleep, "wrapped in the dreamless drapery" of eternal silence.

It is with anxious eyes that we look for the dawn of a day when demons and devils, gods and ghosts, popes and priests, spooks and spirits, witches and wizards, shall hav vanished from the mind of man. When all mankind, living in loyal friendship, shall unite to fill this, the only life we know, with all the blessings of health, happiness, and peace, then shall we witness that entire union of all hearts which is surely "the truest bliss this earth affords." WILLIAM J. BURNS.

NORTH JAVA, N. Y., June 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your notice of my indebtedness to THE TRUTH SEEKER brought me to my senses, and I resolved to remit at once and get you a new subscriber, which I hav found. Inclosed find $5.25. The paper grows better with age, and should I liv for the next hundred years, and if it is kept up to the standard of what it is to-day, you can count me one of your subscribers.

I shall not say "stop my paper" because I find articles that do not suit me. It seems there is bigotry out of the church as well as in. IRA ADAMS.

PINAL, ARIZ., June 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: After some months' unavoidable delay, I inclose $3.25 to pay a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 285. Good as has been THE TRUTH SEEKER in the past, I must say I think that within the past few months it has even surpassed itself.

I am glad to note that the fierce battles beyond the clouds hav in a manner subsided, and given place to topics of more terrestrial and rational utility. One single article such as Mr. McArthur's "Catholicism in Ancient Mexico," published in THE TRUTH SEEKER recently, will do more to enlighten the enslaved mind of man than ten thousand volumes of speculation as to which was first—mind or matter? That summary of historical evidence should be published in pamphlet form and circulated and read by everybody. I am glad to notice also that recent attempts at legislation and the combination movement of the churches has had a tendency to disclose, to some Liberals at least, the aims and object of the hosts of superstition, as well as the true source whence they derive all their power, viz.: first, the state, and second, capital. These three—church, state, and capital—combined will crush out the life and liberty of the people of these United States unless speedily checked, and this is the force that we Liberals must sooner or later meet and overcome before we can hope to realize the universal mental liberty, peace and good will among men, which we so fondly dream of. And the sooner we learn this fact, and giv more attention to politics present and less to the religion of the future, the better it will be for us.

Let our able lecturers now in the field, with more to follow, first instruct the people in their political rights and duties; how to wield the power of the ballot in their own favor instead of their oppressors', and thus become a free and ind pendent people in fact as well as in name. Teach the people to do their own thinking in politics as well as in religion, and the evils we now complain of would speedily vanish.

JOHN A. BROADBECK.

SCOTT TOWNSHIP, IA., June 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of June 7th came to hand on the 12th. In answer I would say that I am sorry that circumstances hav been such as to compel me to let my subscription run behind, but I am much obliged to you for sending it, for I hardly know how to keep house without the good old TRUTH SEEKER. There is one thing sure: you may set me down as a subscriber to your valuable paper as long as I can see to read it, and when my eyesight fails, if I can hear still, I will hire some one to read it for me. I am living in a neighborhood where there is a large majority of the straightbacks, and some of these are a good deal like the gun barrel that was so straight that it leaned back a little. However, I hav one neighbor that is sound. His name is Alex Risk. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I tell you the long-faced sky-pilots giv us a wide berth. It is singular how quick and easy these sky-pilots learn to navigate the ethereal regions. They must be more web-footed than a duck. And then it is singular how they know so much more than other folks in regard to the upper regions. I hav been lending my books to some of my neighbors, and induced one of them to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months. He and his wife and whole family are of a Liberal turn of mind. Inclosed you will find $5.50, for which send papers and books as directed on inclosed paper. WM. REDFIELD.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., June 16, 285.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: We are having a splendid visit with our ex-reverend, also enjoying an intellectual feast listening to his splendid lectures (fifteen). We hav heard every one—many of them as good as Colonel Robert could giv us. I am sure there is not another man in the field that could make them interesting to the audience for two weeks. He has been working too hard, and I am sorry to say he has not been appreciated as he deserves to be. The spiritual element here is no help to the cause. Last Saturday evening his lecture was powerful. The subject was the "Defense of the Devil." Mr. Gault says everyone in Kalamazoo ought to hav listened to it. The interest seems to be increasing. If he could stay two weeks longer these half-Liberals might get awake. We were sorry to hear of Brothers Brown and Green resigning, but since there is to be a new set of officers, allow me to nominate Mrs. Reynolds for secretary, and giv practical evidence that we are in favor of equal rights to woman as well as man. You could afford to pay her $250 a year, and you would hav your work well done. She is a woman of education and ability, and would be an honor to the cause. Those who met her at Cassadaga will agree with me. Our interests are yet in York state, so allow me to say this for the New York Association. Hoping we shall all meet at Albany Convention, I remain

Yours for equal rights of Woman, POLLY M. GAULT.

CLEVELAND, O., June 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I send you by this mail the Catholic Universe, a paper than which there is not one in the United States more full of un-American ideas. I hav marked several things in it that could be commented on; they are all rich and could be laughed at if a man did not feel more like cursing when he reads them. Take, for instance, "First Communion Day;" it makes me think of the little boy, a hard nut, who stayed away from his work, where I also worked; when he came back after a few days, I asked him what had detained him. He replied to the effect that he had been prepared by his priest for and had taken his first communion. In a few days he stole a certain article, which was confessed by him, and no change could be observed in his deportment otherwise, as regards to lying, swearing, etc. When questioned by me in regard to what the priest's or church's preparations consisted in, he said he was told all about the blessed Virgin and the saints' miracles—not a word about a better life here, not one word about honesty. But I should like to comment on all the articles I send you marked, but will speak of only one more, "Lord Napier and the Sisters of Mercy." Did you ever think, Mr. Editor, that the Catholic church lets nothing be done free except in war times, or on the occasion of some great calamity when the public will know all about it? Who ever heard of their visiting the poor quietly? And what enormous charges they do make for their services almost invariably! M. G. F.

CANTON, ILL., June 8, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I will pay my subscription just as soon as I hav time to turn something into market.

I hav a suggestion to offer for your eminent consideration, viz., most all political parties hav a plank in their platform in favor of total separation of church and state. I don't see why a Liberal belonging to any of those parties could not run for the legislature or for Congressman, and, if elected by his repectiv party, prepare a bill embodying the Nine Demands of Liberalism, in presenting which he could say: "I was elected on a platform declaring in favor of a total separation of church and state. Not only my colleague, but our opponents as well, were elected on the same or similar platform. [Here read the bill.] We find church and state united in the various ways as enumerated in the bill. Therefore I move your honorable body that we prohibit these privileges by a unanimous vote of the house." This would not be betraying any trust imposed upon them by their constituents. My plan would be to get as many delegates as possible to the various conventions and caucuses. There could be a goodly number got, especially in the rural districts. I never attended a caucus but what I could hav been a delegate if I had wanted to. Organizing new parties is too much like Jonah's gourd. If we understand each other we could no doubt get quite a number nominated throughout the United States. In our last election in this county for state attorney, John W. Krieger, of Farmington, Ill., and W. M. Vandeventer were the candidates. Both were Infidels. Krieger was the most outspoken, and he ran ahead of his ticket, but Vanderventer, of Canton, Ill., was elected, it being a pretty strong Democratic county.

You understand, I mean not to work as Liberals, but as Democrats or Republicans, or whatever other party has that plank in their platform that Liberals chance to belong to. This would not be asking anyone to sacrifice any principle, politically or religiously; we should always be sure to hav a Liberal spoken of for the position of the offices above named. If we should get several nominated, as in the above case, then it would be a mere political choice among Liberals. It is not the object to try to get a Liberal Democrat or Republican to vote the other's ticket; it would be too much like the Methodist trying to get the Democrats to be Abolitionists in the time of the war by excommunicating them. They said they would rather giv up what little religion they had than their politics.

I think this plan would, eventually, teach the two old parties, as well as all new ones, to say in their platforms just what they mean to carry out, and would finally evolute the Liberal party. We believe in evolution, you know. Besides forcing all parties to expunge things from their platforms they hav no intention of carrying out, it would popularize our cause, and this would bring out everybody that is a Liberal. The timid become dreadful bold when a thing gets to be popular, and they are generally the big men—the office seekers. And hence, as soon as all parties leave out the above plank, then the evolution of our Liberal party would set in. Having been fed at the public crib to some extent, they would become ravenous, and would unite in a party of their own. Until other parties excluded this plank, it would giv us as many chances as there are parties. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

MR. EDITOR: I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER that J. Hacker is again in feeble health, and in need of help. Please find within one dollar for him. I don't hav to pay any pew rent, or for any pipes, tobacco, or cigars, nor am I extravagant in anything that costs money, and it would seem that I can afford to spare a dollar for the old veteran. I send it through THE TRUTH SEEKER so as to call the attention of others to the matter. I hope those that hav ample means will be mindful of the dear old pioneer and send on the needful.

B. F. ROBBINS.

WE STAND CORRECTED.

LEBANON, O., June 15, 1885.

MR EDITOR: In reading over the last copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, June 13th, I come across a paragraph that I must protest against. Being one of the old Abolitionists myself, mobbed and driven out of the state of Illinois for declaring myself one and acting accordingly, I do not want to be classed with those dupes of superstition worse than Christianity itself. In speaking of an accident that had befallen one Geo. Lynn, of Lockport, Ill., you ask: "But why did Mr. Cumming or Mr. Swinton suppress the fact that Geo. Lynn is a Radical Freethinker and Spiritualist, as are nearly all of his old comrades in the Abolition war?" If you had only said "Radical Freethinker," it would be about right. But "Spiritualists!" Pshaw! They were not all or nearly all daft.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and 30 cents for "Modern Balaam." I can't do without THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I must tell you a little circumstance that happened at my house. We had a wedding, and the preacher said the ceremony. When he got through, he rolled up his eyes and said, "Let us bray." I told him that was not on the bill. We did our praying with the plow and cultivator. He came to me in a few minutes and said I had better take that back. I told him, "No sir-ee." Dinner was on the table, and there was quite a company present. I asked them to walk in to dinner; all went in but the preacher and his wife. He said he could not eat where he could not "bray." As I don't like a hypocrit, I think I did just right. F. WELLS.

LEMOORE, CAL., May 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Miss Ella Kimball, a young lady about twenty-five years of age, and residing near Smith Mountain, Tulare Co., Cal., was examined by Drs. Russell and Asay on Monday of last week and pronounced insane. The same evening she was sent to the Stockton asylum in charge of her father and friends of the family. Symptoms of madness were first noticed in the unfortunate girl about six weeks since, when she became infatuated with a so-called "Sanctify Band" which made its appearance in the neighborhood. She professed perfect sanctification, and claimed to be spiritually married to the leader of the band, desiring to be in his company constantly. It was found necessary to watch her continually, as when left to herself her first impulse was to start in search of the band. Her mental affliction, which assumed the form of a violent suicidal mania, is attributed to religious excitement. T. J. CONLEY.

Mamma's Version.

Oh, oh, oh! where would you go,
Little feet?
"Ga-ga-ggaa!" says baby's voice
So sweet.
Little, restless, rose-hued feet,
Baby voice, so heavenly sweet.

"Ga-aa-wa-ga!" What did you say,
Baby, dear?
She said, "Papa," I declare!
Papa, hear!
Darling, cunning, little dear!
She said, "Papa," don't you hear?

"Ca-ja-wa-ba!" There the darling goes Again!
She said, "Mamma," then, bless her!
Just as plain!
Now I know you heard it, then.
Oh! she said it just as plain!

A Little Maid's Discontent.

A restless child, I often pined
For joys that lay beyond my hand,
For greener hills, and brighter meads,
Than those upon my little strand.

One summer day I cried outright,
That life was such a listless round
Of homely tasks with nut-brown friends—
And spurned the ways their feet had found.

My mother's voice came low and sweet—
"This is the time of rosy June,
The loveliest month in all the year,
When birds and blossoms sing in tune.

"And roses white, and roses red,
Whose brims are beaded with the dew,
Shall drink your health in dainty cups,
And bring glad birthdays down to you."

Then reach no more for things afar
When summer comes with joyous Junes,
And natal roses fi'led with songs
From soft harps tuned to golden noons.

Though humdrum toil, and weary rounds,
Be yours with nut-brown friends or foes,
A little maid with lips of song
May be the twin of June's sweet rose.

Keeping School.

Dear Children: I promised a few weeks ago to tell you how I used to teach school and preach when I was a little girl, but I hav been ill since and could not fulfil my promis until now.

But, first, I must tell you how schools were "kept" fifty or sixty years ago, else you will not understand me; it was done very differently from what it is now, for the manner of teaching has changed as has everything else. Then, a class of scholars was called out into the floor to read and spell every forenoon and every afternoon, all but the first class, which was supposed to be beyond the need of spelling, so they used to read in their seats and rarely spell at all. The first scholar would rise and read a paragraph, or, until he or she heard, "Enough, the next," when he or she would sit down, and the second, third, and fourth would read until the class had "read round," after which, the school-master or school-mistress (sometimes she was called "the school-marm") would say, "The second class may read," then they would all file out of their seats to area in front and stand in line, the one at the head reading first, then the next, and so on down the whole line, when they would be told, "Take your seats; third class take their places," and so on, until all the classes had read; down to the small scholars who could not put words into sentences, and the alphabet class learning their letters. Lessons would then be heard in geography and grammar, or "parsing," until the boys would be so pleased to hear, "Boys may go out," but, oh, so sorry when a large ferule, striking on the open window sill or doorway, "rapped them in." Then, "Girls may go out," sent the girls rushing for the door, to be "rapped in" again in five or ten minutes, as were the boys, after which more lessons were heard, the boys "ciphering" on their slates, as there were no blackboards in those days, and no arithmetic classes, and the girls did not hav much to do with "figgers"—reading and spelling, and sometimes writing, being considered enough for them, with some exceptions.

But it was fun to see the classes called out to spell. I hav forgotten to tell you that these were not graded schools such as there are now, but composed of all ages, from twenty-one down to four, and even three, all in one room and taught by one teacher; hence these many classes in different degrees of advancement. Well, this was the way they spelled: The master, or mistress, would "put out" the first word of the lesson that the class had been studying from the spelling-book, to the scholar at the head, by pronouncing "Contract," and he or she would try and spell it thus: "C-o-n, con, t-r-a-c-t, tract, contract." "Right!" the master would say, and then put out to the next scholar the word "Condemn." He would spell as did the first, "C-o-n, con, d-e-m, dem, condemn." "Wrong," the master would say; "try again." Then he would blunder over it again, and if he misspelled it, the master would say, "The next," and he would try it, and if he spelled it correctly the first or second time, the master would say, "Right; take your place," and the scholar who had "missed the word" would step down in the line as the one who had spelled it stepped out, and the latter would take his place above him. Sometimes a word would be tried by nearly every one, or "go round the class," before it would be spelled right, and then the lucky one who had spelled it would march up above all who had missed it, or take his place at the head, as the case might be. I hav known a whole class to miss a word; then was no changing of places. Each morning the scholar who was at the head the night previous took his place at the foot of the class; and I hav known him or her walk up the length of the whole class the first day, and be at the head sometimes two or three nights in succession. Every time a scholar was at the head at night, the master gave him a head mark, and the scholar who had the most marks in his class at the end of the school was awarded the premium; so you see there was great competition. Sometime I will tell you about the premium I won when I was nine years old, if you would like.

All teachers did not hav the scholars "take places" in spelling, but let them stand each day as they happened to file out, and put out the words just the same, though some did not permit them to try the word but once. But they did not study their lessons much under this rule, as they were never told the utility of education—not even why they went to school—and when very young, they supposed it was for the sole benefit of their parents and teachers. And so lazy boys and girls, as they grew older, became very disobedient, thinking the teachers were tyrants and spies set over them to watch and punish them, thus making a great deal of trouble, and never realizing they were damaging themselvs.

When I first began to go to school I watched all that the teacher said and did, and it was not many years before I wanted to "keep school" too. But how should I begin? I had neither school-house nor scholars, so I must make them. My school-house was my bed room, and I took books and stood them up on end in a line on the floor as my scholars, just far enough apart so that when I touched with my finger the first one at the head it would strike on the second in falling, and that on the third, and so on until the whole line would fall down. The arranging them thus was, "Second class take your places," or, "Second class may read." I took the spelling-book, and "put out" the words to the books in imitation of the "mistress." Of course, I had to spell or miss the words myself, and when my second or third book missed a word by my purposely spelling it wrong, I stepped down from my exalted position (a chair, which was my desk), took the book that I played had spelled the word, and walked it up above those that had misspelt it, saying, "Clara, or James, right—take your place." Then I would return to my desk, and put out another word, and so on. Frequently my scholars (books) would be refractory, and I would go to them in a pet and giv one or more of them a good shaking, or pinch their ears, as I had seen my teachers do. But though I played this, I learned better before I taught school with real boys and girls for scholars.

When I had played spelling long enough, I would say, "Take your seats," step down from my desk, and touch my first book, and they would all fall down to the floor. I would set them up again, again ascend my throne, and say, "School is dismissed," step down, touch them, and they would all fall down. Then I would pick them and pack them away for the next time. I used to let the boys and girls go out in the same way by throwing down my books. I also taught reading, writing, and the other branches, with books for my scholars, until, as I grew older, I would coax little boys and girls, hav them go through exercises as if I were really a school teacher. I liked it much better than playing with rag-babies and dolls, broken china and old glass.

But I think I hav told you enough about "school keeping" for one time, and shall hav to defer my "preaching" to my next letter, as this is too long already. Your friend,

Barre, Mass. Ella E. Gibson.

To Mamma.

Pretty, useful, loving tokens—
Birthday gifts—I hav a score;
But than all my other love-gifts,
Here is one I value more.

'Tis a sheet of paper white—
I that sheet a treasure hold—
On which a loved hand did write,
On which a treasured love is told;

Told in words, oh, sweet and dear—
Words that none but she could write;
In her own quaint and graceful way,
Told on that dear sheet of white.

Above all other gifts I hav,
I that sheet of paper hold;
Dearer, sweeter, 'tis to me,
Than all else a thousand fold.

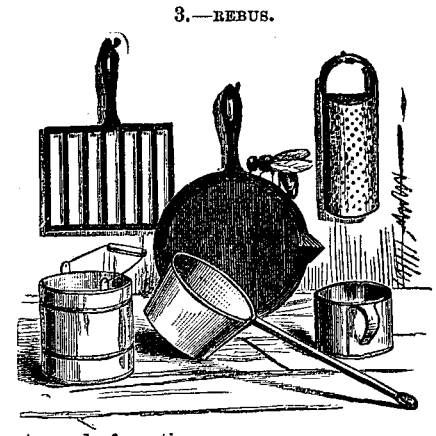
Our Puzzle Box.

1.—GEOGRAPHICAL PUZZLE.



A port on the southern coast of Africa started to visit her sister, a mountain in Washington Territory. The weather was pleasant, but looked something like mountains in Africa. She wore on her head a mountain in Oregon. Her dress was a river in Texas. Her cloak a river in New York. Her shoes, a country in Africa. Her jewelry was set with a city in Idaho. She had in her pocket a city in Nevada—in her hand a can filled from a spring in Wyoming, and to save it all she put in the can a city in Ireland. She saw a great lake in Nevada, but did not enjoy going through another lake in Nevada. She had for her dinner a country in Europe, baked and seasoned with a river in Dakota, and a city in Guinea—for extra flavoring she took a river in Vermont. The distance was an island south of Connecticut, but she at last reached her destination, just as the mountains in Africa were rising. She received a warm welcome from her sister, was refreshed by an export from Brazil, seasoned with an island in St. Mary's river, Michigan, and a river in Montana. She stayed until a bay east of Central America began to fly. She received calls from a mountain in New Mexico, and a city in Oregon. Upon her return she was frightened by a lake in British America. She screamed, and there came to her assistance an island in the Irish sea. He drew from his belt a river in Dakota and killed it. She thanked him for his kindness and arrived at her home just in time to dress for the wedding of a city at the west end of Lake Ontario, and the country seat of a gentleman in southern Michigan. If any one can solve the above, after so doing he may wash his face in a river in Wyoming, and await results. Jennie.

2.—INVOLVED REVERSE.

How sweet, indeed, the wedding song
Could we its strains through life prolong!
For spite of book, priest, law, and ring,
Love is the all-important thing.
The wedding song may hide a curse,
A very devil in reverse;
And prove "a" veritable "foe,"
In fact, as well as verbal show.

1. Sinis-ter—in-sister. 2. Carat.

ANSWER TO PRIZE RIDDLE.

Matter I find in the poor man's home;
Matter beneath the palace dome;
In some form there's Matter wherever I roam,
In every land, in the rock, clay, or loam;
Or yet in the river's and ocean's foam.

It exists amid intense cold or heat;
'Tis a Matter of cost to all who eat;
Those who are cheerful and truly discreet,
Will find it a friend and joy complete;
But intemperate users, a foe must meet.

Though dramsellers make it a Matter of gain,
The drunkard will find it a Matter of pain;
Though brandy saved Grant when all else was vain,
(Doctors say it was brandy, Newman says "it was pray'n',")
Yet for one that is saved are a thousand slain.

If one cannot make this puzzle out
There is "something the Matter" with him no doubt—
Stupidity, worms, or, if aged, the gout—
And yet, strange paradox, reason to rout,
And still more destructiv of "faith most devout,"
If the Matter but came to his mind he would shout
"It is Matter, though no matter how the Matter came about!"

THE ARMY PROBLEM, AND W. J. BURNS'S ANSWER.

"I found, I took, I mashed," the nut,
With egotism supernal;
I did it with "a single butt."
You failed to get the kernel!
The rate of motion is the same,
Advancing and reviewing,
Which makes your answer very lame
In spite of rodent's chewing.
If down the line the general rides
Ten miles to meet the army,
They must hav risen like angry tides,
Or foamy tankards balmy.
They walk fifteen while he rides ten!
Fifteen for his returning!
Then twenty-two five-tenths the men,
While he fifteen is spurning!
So while he rides your thirty-five,
The army has proceeded
Too far, some two score miles, alive,
The station all unheeded.

At morn they part at station one,
And meet again, at set of sun,
The general and the army's head;
The army moves fifteen as said.
He rides along the entire corps;
Rides back the same and fifteen more.
The corps and general move all day
With speed unchanged the entire way,
He meets the foot where it may fall,
After reviewing one and all;
Returns along the moving line,
To gain the head, to fractions fine;
Together join at station two,
Precisely to a moment true.
Now try once more the rodent's power!
I'll giv a prize, "The Story Hour,"
To him who prints in Puzzle Box,
Solution full (by teeth or rocks)
And true, by Independence day,
If none, I'll giv "soft-shell" away.

Correspondence.

Loudonville, N.Y., June 14, 1885.

My Dear Miss Wixon: That was a very happy and generous thought of Mr. Macdonald that induced him to offer such a fine premium for a good, or rather the best story written within a certain time. But is not two months too short a time? It will necessarily limit the number of stories, and therefore the number of competitors.

I had commenced something for the little folks, and now I'll hurry up and send it in, not that I think I shall win the premium, but for the example, you know.

Cannot "Silly Lida" be induced to enter the field? Her story, "Going Strawberrying," was so excellent, moral and all, that I wish she would favor us with some more stories. She understands children pretty well. How easily a child is disgusted by such a display of grossness by those who ought to know better! Not only the children, but a good many adults who read that story, could well take the lesson home.

Miss Gibson contributed a good article, in which I was well pleased, even though it rebuked me. Alas! those little ings will get dropped. I had been sadly aware of my failing in that direction before reading the article in question, but it set me watching others, and it's really wonderful how many people commit the same error.

Wishing you still greater success in your work, Wineford V. Aspinwall.

[No, we do not think two months too short a time to write a short story, but if our friends generally think the time too limited it can be extended another month. The proposition has met with general favor, as letters from friends indicate, and we hope for a very general response in the story line.—Ed. C. C.]

Clearwater, Neb., June 11, 1885

Dear Miss Wixon: Although I send more poems, I do not wish to intrude. I read with delight the story of your ride to that lovely

Fall River country, that seems so poetical to me who hav only the boundless prairies, varied by the beautiful Elkhorn River.

I am always pleased to see im the Children's Corner letters and stories from Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Perry, and the letters from the children themselvs are very interesting. I am glad that Liberals hav so good and entertaining a Corner. Wishing you all success, I am

Fraternally yours for truth and humanity,

Poetry.

The Revision Considered.

Were those revisers linguists real,
Who hell in Bible changed to sheol?
At ancient cipherings "much our betters?"
"Far seen in Greek—deep men o' letters,"
In Sanscrit up, an' Hebrew schoolin',
Or were they lullin' us, or foolin'?

They who hav hell to sheol turned
A something like Gehenna,
Where erst the Aryans dead folk burned
In centuries back so many,

By bigots since moved out in space,
Yet not its name renewin',
Who needs would hav some red-hot place
For heretics to stew in.

If right these scribes, then gone is hell,
Or on its last legs dyin',
This pit where claimed lost spirits dwell
In brimstone fires a-fryin'.

In brains becrazed a dogma born,
So modern thinkers cry out;
From brains of men, no distant morn,
Dead sure, they say, to die out. L. S.

Only a Girl.

I hear a sharp ring on the frosty way,
And I catch the gleam of a cycle bright,
Just a glimpse of a form in Quaker gray,
And then, the dear boy! he is out of sight.
Ah, out and away, ere the sun is high,
While the early clouds are all rose and pearl,
And the air like a wine that is bright and dry;
And I'm—only a girl.

I think of the hollows where leaves lie dead;
Of the gaunt trees' shadows against the sky;
Of the cool clear stretch of blue overhead,
And the low, lush meadows he rattles by.
I look on the road with its dusty track,
Where the wind-gusts meet to whistle and whirl;
And—yes! I may look for his coming back,
For I'm only a girl.

I may watch and wait all day for the ring
Of his pretty plaything's glistening steel;
And, dressed in my gayest, may sit and sing
Over my work till I hear the wheel.
Then I shall see the eyes o' my lad,
And he a cheek and a drooping curl;
And—well, yes—perhaps—I'm a little glad
That I'm only a girl. —Ruth Hall, in Outing.

A Modern Brown Jug.

To the tune of Hamburg, N. Y.

The little brown jug has been oft-times praised,
And its story sung in bygone days;
But the little brown jug I tell of now
Is a different one from that, I trow.

This modern jug has a hole in the side,
Where pennies and dimes do into it glide,
And a dollar or two, I've heard them say,
Into this jug oft finds its way.

Poor little boys and maidens gay
May be seen with this jug from day to day,
Gathering up the pennies scarce,
To help furnish a church which is all a farce.

If this money was used for clothing and food,
It might do the poor a little good;
But an untaxed church, without any right,
Is ready to seize the widow's mite.

This little brown jug used in olden time,
Well filled with beer, and sometimes wine,
Was bad enough, I will allow,
But a far worse use is made of it now.

The money begged goes to provide
For a house where ignorance and pride
Can feast on myths and dogmas, too,
While lying back in a cushioned pew.

The Liberals here do not propose
To hav this jug thrust 'neath their nose,
But leave it for the Christian meek
To help the priests grow fat and sleek.

Now, my advice to young and old,
Is to keep clear of this priestly fold;
For wolves in sheeps' clothing assemble there
To lead you astray; so beware, beware!

Civilization in Africa.

A large, strong man dressed in a uniform, and armed to the teeth, knocks at the door of a hut on the coast of Africa.

"Who are you, and what do you want?" asks a voice from the inside.

"In the name of civilization open your door or I'll break it down for you, and fill you full of lead."

"But what do you want here?"

"My name is Christian Civilization. Don't talk like a fool, you black brute, what do you suppose I want here but to civilize you, and make a reasonable human being out of you if it is possible."

"What are you going to do?"

"In the first place you must dress yourself like a white man. Its a shame and a disgrace the way you go about. From now on you must wear underclothing, a pair of pants, vest, coat, plug hat, and a pair of yellow gloves. I will furnish them to you at reasonable rates."

"What shall I do with them?"

"Wear them, of course. You didn't expect to eat them, did you. The first step in civilization is in wearing proper clothes."

"But it is too hot here to wear such garments. I'm not used to them. I'll perish from the heat. Do you want to murder me?"

"Well, if you do die, you will hav the satisfaction of being a martyr to civilization."

"You are very kind."

"Don't mention it. What do you do for a living, anyhow?"

"When I am hungry, I eat a banana. I eat, drink, or sleep, just as I feel like it."

"What horrible barbarity! You must settle down to some occupation, my friend. If you don't, I'll hav to lock you up as a vagrant."

"If I've got to follow some occupation, I think I'll start a coffee house. I've got a good deal of coffee and sugar on hand."

"Oh, you hav, hav you? Why, you are not such a hopeless case as I thought you were. In the first place, you want to pay me fifty dollars."

"What for?"

"As an occupation tax, you ignorant heathen. Do you expect to get all the blessings of civilization for nothing?"

"But I havn't got any money."

"That makes no difference. I'll take it out in coffee and sugar. If you don't pay up I'll put you in jail."

"What is jail?"

"Jail is a progressiv word. You must be prepared to make some sacrifices for civilization, you know."

"What a great thing Christian civilization is!"

"You cannot possibly realize the benefits, but you will before I get through with you."

The unfortunate nativ took to the woods, and has not been seen since.—Siftings.

ALL in a LIFETIME,

A ROMANCE.

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay."

THE RISE OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

The Missing Link —IN— MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

IT would be almost amusing, if it were not rather irritating, to note the impossibility of impressing upon the ordinary disputant the fact that a man may disbelieve in hell without disbelieving in the value of all morality. He can see no difference between a denial that murderers will be tormented forever and an assertion that murder is unobjectionable. The most amiable and candid critics will inform you that to deny the supernatural character of morality is to deny its existence; and that, in denying the existence of supernatural sanctions, you are not only unconsciously removing a useful safeguard of morality, but consciously and explicitly denying that there is any difference between right and wrong.—Leslie Stephen.

THE tendency of religious doctrin to become less literal, and more mystic and poetical, is of course encouraged by the growing distaste for doctrinal discussion. The mere intellectual acceptance of doctrins as true is being left in the background, and religious services are becoming more and more emotional. Everything looks as if the more advanced church of the present day is developing into a place where the jaded mind shall revel in poetic imagery and the emotional nature be cultivated by the charms of music and the forms of worship. In fact, hav not our more fashionable city churches of nearly every denomination just about attained this ideal? We believe that those who will either deny or regret it will soon be in the minority.—North American Review, Dec. 1879.

YET hath Sir Proteus, for that's his name,
Made use and fair advantage of his days;
His years but young, but his experience old;
His head unmellowed, but his judgment ripe;
And, in a word (for far behind his worth
Come all the praises that I now bestow),
He is complete in feature, and in mind,
With all good grace to grace a gentleman.
—Shakspere's Two Gentlemen of Verona.

IT is a mistake to suppose that the rich man maintains his servants, tradesmen, tenants, and laborers. The truth is, they maintain him. It is their industry that supplies his table, furnishes his wardrobe, builds his houses, adorns his equipage, provides his amusements. It is not the estate, but the labor employed upon it, that pays the rent. All that he does is to distribute what others produce; which is the least part of the business.—Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy.

THE grand almighty builder
Who fashioned out the earth
Has set his seal of honor
On Labor from her birth.
—Pacta Ignotus.

THERE is yet another faith besides that of the religion of the present—a faith that whatever is is right; a faith that the pillars of religion and morality will stand, though the very foundation on which they hav always been supposed to rest be washed away by the flood; a faith that no change in the religious doctrins of enlightened men can occur, except such as will be better for humanity and bring man nearer to eternal truth; a faith that the throne of the moral universe, whatever and wherever it may be, will stand unshaken before all human discussion. Such a faith fears no false teaching, se's no limits on the freedom of human thought, and views with perfect calm the subversion of any and every form of doctrinal belief, confident that the ultimate result will tend to the elevation of the human soul and the unceasing progress of spiritual development. Whatever becomes of other forms of faith, we may expect this to strengthen as long as humanity shall endure. —The Religion of To-day.

LITTLE do men perceive what solitude is and how far it extendeth; for a crowd is not company and faces are but a gallery of pictures and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love.—Bacon's Essays.

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is society, where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar.
I love not man the less, but nature more,
From these our interviews, in which I steal
From all I may be or hav been before
To mingle with the universe and feel
What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal.
—Byron.

THERE is no boundary to the search after truth—till you hav found it, and to be weary in the search is base, when what is sought for is most beautiful. —Cicero.

AN almighty creator does not need our efforts; there is no work of his that we can really do, for his all-seeing providence can baffle everything we attempt. He needs not our well-doing, for he is beyond all service and all good. We are to giv him nothing but praises; we may show our virtue by benevolence; but virtue is not devoutness. "When we hav done all that is commanded of us, we must say, 'We are unprofitable servants.'" Silent adoration is all we can really giv. "Thou art necessary to me," says the Catholic mystic to his God; "I am not necessary to thee." In every way that we turn it, an absolute perfection paralyzes our reason, unmans our energies, refines away even our activ goodness into a mere ecstatic prayer. Monks and nuns are logically consistent with their creed.—Frederic Harrison.

FOR you sae doure, ye sneer at this,
Ye're nought but senseless asses, O;
The wisest man the world e'er saw,
He dearly lo'ed the lasses, O.
Green grow, etc.

Auld Nature swears the lovely dears
Her noblest work she classes, O;
Her 'prentice hand she tried on man,
And then she made the lasses, O.
Green grow, etc. —Burns.

THERE is such a recommendation by nature of one man to another, that one man ought never to appear unfriendly to another, for the simple reason that he is a man.—Cicero.

Odds and Ends.

THE reason that a woman does not make a good collector is because a woman's work is never dun.

A REPORTER overheard the following remark one gossip made to another yesterday: "I liv down by the canal. Won't you come down and drop in?"

DON'T spend your money for a motto "Save my lambs," until you hav cleaned out your back yard. Cholera don't care a Bungtown copper for mottos.

MISS CLEVELAND'S book is all right, no doubt, but when it makes the Voice of Destiny address Joan of Arc, saying; "Thou art the man," we feel bound to protest. We don't believe Destiny makes any breaks of that sort.

IT is said that the French hav more suspension bridges than any other nation in the world. That may be; but America can beat France in the matter of business suspensions and suspenders generally. —Peck's Sun.

MORE than half a century ago a good New Hampshire deacon, by the name of Day, living not far from the White Mountains, had seven children—six daughters and one son. They were known as his six week Days and one son Day.

WHEN a Chinese laundryman sends home with his customers' collars and cuffs a set of steel-plated finger-nails, warranted not to snap off when buttoning a collar or cuff to a shirt, he will receive more work and fewer curses.—Norristown Herald.

FEW experiences in this life are more trying to a church-going young man than to paste a scrap-book full of newspaper clippings, with every care to avoid mistakes, and then to find, while glancing complacently over his completed work, that he has begun at the wrong end of the book, and pasted the whole business in bottom side up.

PICKINS COUNTY, Ga., has a post-office named "Talking Rock." The origin of the name is thus stated: Some one discovered in the vicinity a large stone, upon which had been painted the words: 'Turn me over." It required considerable strength to accomplish this, and, when it was done, the command, "Now turn me back, and fool somebody else," was found painted on the under side of the stone.

THE Franklin Tidings, published in Izard county, Ark., is a complimentary sheet. A recent issue contains the following: "The Tack Hammer has been sold to Rev. W. D. Barnhouse. The Rev. Whangdoodle Rantankerous Hiner tried to buy the office, but the Wiseman boys refused to sell to the galvanized fraud. He would make about as good a newspaper man as he does a preacher, and God knows he's a hell of a preacher."

A BROOKLYN wife lay dying. Her husband and children were gathered sorrowfully about the deathbed, watching the last breath of a loved wife and mother, when she feebly whispered: "James, will you promis me not to marry again? It's my last wish." "Yes, dear wife, I promis you," replied the sobbing husband, "Oh! if I could only believe it, James; but you are such an awful liar," and with a soft, sweet, placid smile, she calmly sank to rest.

"BLESSED are the peace-makers." Bismarck gets three hundred dollars a day for keeping all Europe in a state of fighting suspense about what he is going to do next. General Komaroff gets one hundred thousand roubles for killing a few Afghans, and standing all India up on end, a good cannon costs eleven thousand dollars, and a city missionary wears out his life for six hundred dollars a year, and you can get a Bible of the Tract Society for nothing.—Brooklyn Eagle.

DR. SLOP is one of the most pious men in his section of the state. He observes Lent very closely. A few months ago he saw his colored servant with a piece of fat pork, and he asked him what he proposed to do with it. "I'se been greasin' yer boots and de harness, sah." "Greasing my boots with fat pork, and here we are in the middle of Lent! Well I'll be d——! Why, you infernal black ——, havn't you got any religious sentiments in your infernal black carcass?" And, seizing the sacrilegious darky by his trousers, he slung him against a picket fence, and broke three of his ribs.

AN editorial heart bowed down: "They are galled epochs in every man's life when he would willingly divide his patrimony with a journeyman blasphemer in exchange for one hour's solid cursing, applied according to directions. A fair instance of justifiable exasperation, and one that requires a vast amount of restraining grace to preserve the orthodoxy of our religious system—is when a $4 cow breaks in and eats up a $10 garden for us in one night. The tumult that distracts and distorts a man's soul under such trying circumstances is harder to control than the air-pump of a wheezy hand organ. Gentle reader, we hav suffered."—Henry County (Ga.) Weekly.

A MINISTER was down town the other day without his pocketbook. As he walked toward the street car he discovered that he had in his pocket only a nickel, and he discussed in his own mind whether he should walk home and save the nickel or ride home. He finally decided that he was too tired to walk, and was in the act of hailing a street car, when an old darky, bent and decrepit, accosted him. The old man explained that he had had nothing to eat since morning, and that he was so faint that he could scarcely stand, and that he was in great distress, and that a very little would help him. He told, in short, a very pitiful story, and the clergyman, always sympathetic, listened patiently. At last he told the colored man that he only had five cents in his pocket, and that if he gave that to him he would be compelled to walk home. The old darky became more earnest in his plea, told how miserable he was, and assured the clergyman that the Lord would bless him for giving to the poorest of the poor. Finally the clergyman gave the old fellow the nickel, and started to walk home. He had not gone more than two blocks when the street car passed him, and on the rear was the old darky. As he passed, he raised his hands and shouted: "May de Lawd bress you," cut a pigeon-wing, and skipped into the car.

A MAN may thoroughly believe in the faith-cure for snake-bite, says the Palestine, Tex., News, but at the same time he will take the whisky to brace up his faith on.

ACCORDING to the Rev. Dr. Wills, of San Francisco, what the Apaches need is a gospel that will get hell out of the Indians, and not a gospel that will get the Indians out of hell.

IN consequence of the withdrawal of the government grant from the five Catholic Theological faculties of Paris, Lyons, Rome, Aix, and Bordeaux, twenty-eight professors hav lost their positions.

LITTLE Annie was found one Sunday morning busily crocheting. "Annie, dear, it is Sunday," said her mamma. "Did you forget?" "Oh, no, mamma," she replied. "I knew it was Sunday, but I am playing that I am a little Jew."

JUDGE STALLO, of Cincinnati, is a man of talent, and will, no doubt, worthily represent the United States at Rome. There is so little of the sectarian in his character that he will feel just as much at home in the Vatican as he would at a Tom Paine love-feast.—Washington Critic.

THE Freeman's journal recently devoted its leading editorial to "The Apostasy of Paris." It declares that "the secularization of the Pantheon, the expulsion of the priests, and the tearing down of the cross, hav shocked the whole Christian world," and it bitterly denounces the people as apostates.

THE London Truth givs the following observations on astronomy from a sermon of a Welsh preacher: "A starr is but a lidl dot in the skyee. Saw many starrs mek one plannatt. Saw many plannats mek one constellesshon. Saw many constellesshons mek one milkee we. Six milkee wes mek one rorriborriallis."

THE French papers attribute this mot to Lamartine. Some one asked the poet whether he was not spending too much money in advertising his publications. "No," he is reported to hav answered, "advertisments are absolutely necessary. Even the Almighty needs advertising. Otherwise what is the meaning of church bells?"

THE city and province of Grodna, in western Russia, hav become the scenes of terrible anti-Semitic riots, the populace being inflamed against the Jews by reports of murderous practices in connection with their religious rites. The rioting is stimulated by organized bands of thieves, who hav no interest in the persecution except the opportunities which it affords them for pillaging the victims.

A LADY living on Madison avenue undertook to teach her little boy the Lord's Prayer. He got along very well until he came to the words, "Giv us this day our daily bread," then he paused for a while, and at last asked: "God knows everything, doesn't he, ma?" "Yes, my son." "Then it's no use trying to fool him by asking him to giv us our daily bread. He knows that the baker brings us bread every morning."

A SENSATION was caused in Atlanta, Ga., on June 26th, by the remarks of United States Senator Joseph E. Brown. The occasion was the commencement exercises of the Atlanta Girls' High School, and Senator Brown was the orator of the day. Upon the stage was the Hon. D. E. May, a prominent Hebrew, and two out of the five honor girls were daughters of Hebrews. The entire Hebrew population of the city was present. In disregard of their presence Senator Brown extolled the Christian religion as having elevated woman from slavery, and, turning to the graduates, called upon them to be ready to suffer for Christianity. All this, says the report, fell with strange effect upon Jewish ears, and they are outspoken in their denunciation of drawing the religious line in the public schools.

A CONSUMPTIV lady of Chicago, while on a street-car, and afraid that she was going to die before she could get home, opened a Bible and read a few verses from Job. This gave her sufficient strength to reach a mission chapel, where prayers were offered up for her. She suddenly arose and declared herself cured. Persons similarly afflicted would like to know what verses in Job she read, and whether the Bible was a revised edition.

THE first book published in Philadelphia was Atkins's Almanac, 1686—an unpaged pamphlet of twenty pages, only two copies of which are known. One of the first copies fell into the hands of Colonel Markham, Penn's deputy, who reported to the Provincial Council that it declared Pennsylvania to hav been begun by "Lord Penn." The Council emphatically disapproved of this euphemistic falsehood, and directed both author and printer (William Bradford) "to blott out ye words 'Lord Penn,'" which was done.

AT the beginning of the present century all Christians were rigorously excluded from the mosques except in the case of the mosque at Tunis, where a Christian workman was allowed to enter on all fours to repair the clock, "because," as the sheik said to his co religionists who objected, "in case of repairs, is it not true, O true believers, that a donkey enters this holy place carrying stones on his back; and is it not true that one who does not believe in the true religion is an ass, and the son of an ass? Therefore, O brothers, let this man go in as a donkey."

BOB TOOMBS seems to be familiar with God's intention and reason for making the negro. Bob professes belief in the religion and history of the Bible. Why don't some sinner ask the cranky old man if he accepts the Mosaic account of creation? If he answers, "Yes," then he should be asked, "How can one race be 'superior' to another when all descended from a common parent? Our notion is that from a really Christian standpoint, General Toombs's postulates that God meant this or that concerning this or that race of his human creatures is impious, blasphemous—at least would be in the mouth of a sane man.—Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times.

IT is claimed that cremation will render epidemics almost impossible. There are sentimental considerations which interfere with the general acceptance of the system of cremation in this country, which will certainly be overcome. That the living should be menaced by the dead, as the long use of cemeteries renders fact, as population increases, is sentiment, the sanitary aspect of which will dominate to the safety of the public. The exhumation of the remains of cholera patients has only too often been the sad means by which the seeds of the dreaded disease were sown. So also is it with every infectious disease. The sooner the people realize the inevitable necessity that the cremation system be accepted, the sooner will epidemics cease through impossibility, and the reign of contagion be usurped and overthrown.

The Musical Courier talks plainly to the Presbyterians: A memorial was presented to the United Presbyterian Assembly at Topeka, Kan., recently, which, among other absurd statements, says that the use of musical instruments in church is not warranted by the scriptures. Resolutions were adopted on the strength of the memorial to the effect that as some "brethren" feel that instrumental music is a corruption of worship, their qualms of conscience should be treated tenderly. However, in order to civilize the "heathen" of Egypt $36,000 was appropriated, and for those miserable wretches in India $31,000 was granted for missions. If instead of interfering with the people of Egypt and India (who, by the way, never disturb the equanimity of a Presbyterian Assembly), these Presbyterians had appropriated a sum of money to advance the education of their own people and "civilize" their children by having them instructed in the art of music, some benefit might hav resulted. The money would at least hav remained in this country to "civilize," instead of going to Africa and Asia for useless and utterly impracticable purposes.

AT the Convention of Civil Engineers at Deer Park, Md., June 24th, Professor Egleston read a paper. He said it was true that the obelisk in Central Park, New York, was undergoing decomposition. This was due to the fact that the obelisk was brought from the dry climate of Egypt to a moist climate, under the influence of which it was being rapidly decomposed. Professor Egleston said he might go into Central Park after a heavy frost and pick up from the ground as many relics of the obelisk as he pleased. He gave it as his opinion that unless the obelisk was placed under shelter in some museum it would within fifteen years be decomposed beyond repair.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Boston Globe givs the following as the correct method of applying for a drink in Maine. Of course it is a lie, because, as everybody knows, the sale of liquor in Maine is prohibited. The correspondent says: "It is all shrouded in mystery. You giv the sign of distress to any member in good standing, pound three times on the outer gate, giv two hard kicks and one soft one on the inner door, giv the password 'Rutherford B. Hayes,' turn to the left, through a dark passage, turn the thumbscrew of a mysterious gas fixture ninety degrees to the right, holding the goblet of the encampment under the gas fixture, and hunt up the nearest cemetery, so that you will not hav to be carried very far."

REPORTS hav reached New York by various private channels that another rebellion has broken out in the republic of Costa Rica. It is stated that the clericals; taking advantage of the unsettled state of political affairs, hav organized a revolution against the existing authorities in order to force recognition of their claims to a voice in the government. It is said that the archbishop of San Jose is the leader of the movement, which is believed to be of an extensiv character. In addition to the report is the statement that the clerical party of Nicaragua, which holds the balance of power there, will also rise and compel President Cardenas to support the clerical revolution in Costa Rica. If this is true it is but another proof of the pestilential character of Catholicism in every country in which the church has power.

THE Schenectady, N. Y., Star, in describing a Sunday-school celebration, tells of this incident: "The church was handsomely decorated with flowers, while numerous canaries in cages, suspended about the edifice, added their sweet music to the singing of the children. One lady, not having a canary, brought an accomplished but not genteel parrot to church. The parrot behaved quite well for a time, but finally when a little boy of his acquaintance stood on the platform and began a recitation the bird commenced to mock him, causing considerable amusement to the congregation and greatly annoying the boy. Finally the parrot screeched out, "Hey, you little devil!" which had the effect of completely breaking up the youthful declaimer, and demoralizing the congregation. The bird was led out of the church in disgrace.

IT is difficult, observes a writer in the New York Sun, to imagin how Victor Hugo wrote so much, considering the way he is said to hav labored. We are told that he always worked in the mornings; that he wrote standing with a quill pen on large-sized paper; that after slowly and carefully coming to a period he would read the sentence over, and immediately proceed to alter it and tinker at it until he had it hammered into the desired shape, after which he would commence a new sentence, which was predestined to undergo the same process. In other words, he rough-hewed his idea at first, then planed, sandpapered, and varnished it before he chopped out another one. His manuscript presented a singular appearance. It was a sort of battle-field on paper, in which the killed were well stamped out and the new recruits pushed forward in anything but good order. It has also been compared to a sheet of music, in which the blots looked like crotchets and quavers. But, one way or another, Hugo managed to get along.

"The Moral Aspects of Vivisection."—Concluded.

It will be perceived at once that the argument of this writer rests wholly upon the old doctrin of paramount right or dominion conferred by divine authority or inherent in the nature of man's relations to the brute, and under which he is neither amenable to the charge of trespass, cruelty, or wrong in sacrificing the brute, under the most excruciating and long-continued tortures, to what he deems his own welfare. Such an argument might hav been held valid, and hav passed unchallenged, in other days, but in the light of modern science, and of rational interpretation, we find ample evidence that man's pretended lordship over the brutes had its origin in his own conceit; that no absolute right or dominion is either found in nature, or conferred by any authority whatever; that the egotistic claim to such dominion by divine investure draws its only support from a mere diction of legendary origin, which, admitting its foundation in fact, has no more binding force upon us, or upon our civilization, than the special law of ancient Sparta, under which, after a careful examination, all newly-born children that were weak and sickly, or affected with any bodily infirmity, were killed.

Man's dominion over the brutes, such as it is, results entirely from the vis major. He has achieved it, as he has to a certain extent turned the forces of nature to his account, and learned the advantages of a conformity to the laws of his environment, under the operation of the principle of natural selection, or the survival of the fittest. This right, however, is nowhere absolute and complete; it is, to a certain extent at least, interchangeable. Let man, singly and without ample means of protection, but once step across the limits of his encroachment upon the wilds of nature, and invade the habitat of the tiger in his nativ jungle, or of the lion as he roams at will over the plains of southern Africa, or crouches in the reedy swamps bordering upon the Tigris and the Euphrates, he will find that other "rights are paramount," and this "dominion," conferred upon him so long ago, by divine authority, or as a "primordial law of nature," together with himself, will be speedily "extinguished." Man's right, therefore, over the brute is simply the right of might, depending mainly for its successful exercise upon the right of domain, the permanency and almost universal extent of which are secured by the gregarious situation. Even where his dominion seems fully established, instances of its summary extinguishment are not infrequent. Sometimes when the tables are turned on him, as in trichiniasis; "unseen assassins steal into his vitals upon his very breath; parasites, spores, and bacteria make his body their permanent home in life, and when death intervenes he is promptly devoured in his turn."

This conceited claim to divine interposition in man's behalf seems characteristic of the race; and it is, moreover, by no means confined within the narrow limits of his relations to the lower animals. It extends generally, under various forms of manifestation, to the right of lordship over his own kind; the step between beings universally recognized as brutes and certain orders and conditions of the genus homo having been found a short one and easily taken. The truth of this remark received an apt illustration but a few years ago in the sententious and sweeping aphorism enunciated by the highest judicial authority in this country: "The negro has no rights that the white man is bound to respect." This decision was based upon laws founded upon an ancient and barbarous code, and it drew its inspiration from the same divine authority as the law under which man claims dominion over the brute, and the right to lacerate and torture him at his pleasure or convenience.

The writer makes no reference in his article to "the field sports, hunting and fishing, because," as he says in a note, "as mere sports they seem to be a relic of barbarism, both cruel and demoralizing, and should, were it possible, be suppressed." But why suppressed? The vivisector engages in his work, as it is said, with "the pleasure of the chase;" he conducts his experiments with "much delight" and "with extreme patience." If so, the chief stimulus to its pursuit must be his own gratification. The description of Claude Bernard in another note is simply that of a monster. It reminds one of the "priest of the sacrifice" before the altar, of the rack and the thumbscrew, during the most flourishing days of the Holy Inquisition. May there not be some relic of barbarism in the "joyful excitement" attending this business?

But if this is a question of trespass, who is to decide it? Who but the owner of the brute, in whom, if in anyone, this paramount right must inhere? Who but he is to determin when his right to welfare confronts that of the brute? If his health, convenience, or enjoyment can best be promoted by limiting the life of his beast to a single week, or even to the two or three minutes of a heat over the turf, has he not a right to lash, overdrive, and torture him for that purpose? If the spectacle enhances his pleasure, or gratifies a sordid emulation, has he not a right to pit his dog against the mountain wildcat in deadly strife? These questions, it would seem, admit but one answer; and if so, whoever "hinders him commits a trespass on him, and does wrong;" and it follows that every law yet passed for the prevention of cruelty to animals has been an infringement of individual rights. It is difficult to perceive why one would not hav the same right to sacrifice his beast in any way he pleased for his immediate pleasure or profit, as to send him to the physiological laboratory to be dissected alive under the most atrocious sufferings, upon a remote contingency of benefit to his own health or that of posterity.

The question of man's relation to the lower animals is not one of ethics or casuistry, and with it conscience has nothing whatever to do. He destroys them, reduces them to his service, or devours them, as his safety, his inclinations, or his appetite may prompt him. No moral quality is believed to exist in dining upon beefsteak, or in placing the ox or the horse under the yoke or in the harness. Nor can the question of their treatment be determined by the "ought" or the "ought not," or, in other words, by the "tender conscience." By this criterion the most atrocious wickedness, the blackest crimes the world has ever seen, hav too often sought and found justification to render its claims, as a guide to human conduct, for a moment admissible. The most flagrant wrongs, the most cruel oppressions, the most savage and rapacious wars, the most bloodthirsty persecutions, hav, at one time or another in the world's history, been fully sustained under a "plea of right." The only safeguard against cruelty to animals, as well as cruelty to man, lies in a continued development and improvement of the human sentiments, the elevation of the tender emotions, till kindness becomes spontaneous, and the infliction of unnecessary pain an insufferable outrage.

That the anatomical results of vivisection, the acquirement of abstract knowledge of the parts or organs of the human system, and to a certain extent of their functions, may be considerable, is not denied; but that it has any adequate corresponding pathological or therapeutic results is, at least, an open question. As a distinguished physician lately remarked. "We may hav the most comprehensiv knowledge of the anatomy of the human body, we may take it in pieces and name all its parts, but let the minutest nerve, even, become diseased, and we know next to nothing of any means by which it can be restored to its normal condition. Any effectiv work in that direction must be performed by nature herself."

While the real causes of disease are neither acknowledged nor known by the medical faculty, and medical science is confessedly still filled with idle speculations and superstitions concerning them, how can any light be thrown either on their cause or cure by the barbarous dissection of healthy living animals? The accomplished vivisector lacerates the quivering flesh of his victim with as little thought of any direct benefit to man, as the astronomer turns his telescope toward the heavens. He is simply a "scholar," and "seized with and entirely absorbed by a scientific idea." The admitted fact that nine thousand domestic animals were destroyed by two operators in this inhuman and brutal manner, in proof and disproof of a certain theory, is a sufficient commentary on the animus and ultimate purpose of vivisection.

Most of the ills that flesh is heir to come to man and take up their abode with him by invitation. They result from his indiscretions, from the unrestrained or inordinate indulgence of his appetites and passions, or from non-observance of the plainest laws of health; and the plea that his "dominion" over the lower animals may be invoked in excuse for inflicting upon them the most atrocious tortures, for the purpose of mitigating or relieving the penalty of his own recklessness, is not only infamously wicked, it is shamefully base and brutal. Let man but implicitly, or even reasonably, observe the laws of hygiene, a science almost wholly neglected, and not only would the vivisector be driven back upon the "pleasure" he derives from his heartless practice as the only excuse for its continuance, but not many generations would elapse before the "iniquities of the fathers" would all hav been "visited upon the children," and the itinerant quack, with the mere medicin men that now swarm in all our communities, would nearly or quite disappear.

It may confidently be denied that "man's greatest need is to know," or that "knowledge is the very essence of his excellence, the chiefest end of his being." Even in the promotion of civilization and the increase of material prosperity, empiricism, enterprise, and adventure hav been the prime agencies. In nearly all the great utilitarian inventions and discoveries of modern times, the philosophy has either followed or been suggested by the fact. Scarcely one has been the mere embodiment of scientific thought on the result of a priori reasoning. The scientist is confessedly an Agnostic. He is never dogmatic. Says Professor Tyndall: "Some of the greatest discoveries hav been made under the stimulus of a non-scientific ideal." "The scientist ponders the knowledge he possesses, and tries to push it further. He guesses, and checks his guess; he conjectures, and confirms or explodes his conjecture."

It is true that man should liv, as he undoubtedly will liv in the nobler estate to which he is destined, for the "perfecting of his character." While no one should discourage scientific pursuits, or speak lightly of scholastic attainments, it should be remembered that character depends chiefly upon moral excellence; upon righteousness, virtue, kindness, charity, and whatsoever other element is comprehended in the general term goodness. Knowledge, properly speaking, does not enter into the formation of character as an essential element. It is frequently found occupying the same chamber with vice. Ignorance does not always exclude the companionship of virtue.

The moral standard—that is, the importance attached to recognized virtues—has been constantly changing from the earliest times; and this change has, on the whole, never been retrogressiv. The crowning glory of our civilization is the prominence it givs to the practice of the "amiable virtues," as they hav been called, and the recognized force with which they enter into the determination of all questions pertaining to social and individual well-being. They are not merely subjects of ideal speculation; they are realized with an intense and earnest interest among the people. To this fact are we indebted for the eleemosynary institution, the reform school, the retreat for the insane, and the thousand unnamable instrumentalities for the mitigation of suffering and the relief of want, so characteristic of our times, and which to the ancient peoples were unknown. These virtues are the polished stones in the foundation on which the great temple of social order and good citizenship rests. They should be cherished, respected, and honored. No community in which they predominate can be wicked or unsafe. Representativs of these virtues hav occasionally appeared in the most cruel and barbarous times. When eighty thousand of the first citizens of ancient Rome filled the seats of her Coliseum to witness with keen enjoyment the atrocious brutalities of her gladiatorial shows, the heathen Seneca was uttering a sentiment that has challenged the admiration of the world, and that should be written in letters of gold: "We should hav a bond of sympathy for all sentient beings, knowing that only the depraved and base take pleasure in the sight of blood and suffering." This sentiment is an honor to humanity, and will one day become universal. It will brush away all technicalities, sophistries, schemes of morals, and "schemes of nature," which advocate or excuse deliberate and consciously inflicted torture for mere experimental or speculativ purposes, as it has already done in the case of witchcraft, of chattel slavery, and as it will do at no distant day with war, with the death penalty, with corporeal punishment of every description, and every other practice in which man, upon one pretext or another, seeks the gratification of his brutal nature by the infliction of unnecessary suffering upon the innocent victims or the helpless subjects of his power. N. L. Perkins.

Nihilism.

The people of the United States hav mixed up Nihilism with so many other isms that it is hard to find two Americans who would define it alike. The Nihilists, in fact, hav shown instances from which a member of any advanced school may draw conclusions about Nihilism being more or less the same as the school he or she belongs to. The revolutionist heard of open revolts by Nihilists; the political economist and Socialist, of the most advanced plans for a new structure of political and social life drawn up by Nihilists; the Anarchists, of Anarchy preached by Nihilists; the unbeliever, of bold expressions made by Nihilists on the subject. "God is a lie," was said by a Nihilist. Nor can complain a terrorist or a dynamiter on the Nihilists; instances of terrorism were shown by Nihilists to such an extent that the tyrants of the whole world tremble still; and as to dynamite, who doesn't know that they handled it on many occasions as boldly as a human being ever could? What is Nihilism, then? is a question that naturally follows. Is it an extract from all the isms existing, or a combination thereof? Is it an outgrowth of any particular ism, or a summed-up whole?

In order to arrive at any conclusion as to what Nihilism is, we ought to trace it to its origin. The meaning of a word is certainly of no significance, since we hav radicals in politics, and radicals in mathematics. Nihilism means nothing; but to draw conclusions therefrom that it preaches nothingness, as a most popular dictionary does, is an absurdity. We, therefore, ought to trace its origin not by the meaning of it as a word by itself, but as applied to something certain. That certain was a representativ of the most educated class of the Russian nation, whose name in Turgenieff's novel, "Fathers and Children," was Bazaroff, a doctor. Arkadi tells his uncle, Kirsanoff, that the doctor is a Nihilist.

"A Nihilist!" exclaims the uncle. "That word must come from the Latin nihil, 'nothing,' and consequently it signifies a man who recognizes nothing."

"A man who looks at all things from a critical standpoint," says Arkadi.

"Doesn't it come to the same thing?"

"Not at all; a Nihilist is a man who does not bow down before any authority, and accepts nothing without examination."

In that conversation is not only Nihilism defined, but every one and all warned against the mistake people generally fall into by looking to the meaning of a word, as Uncle Kirsanoff did. "Accept nothing without examination," is the motto of the Nihilists, and according to this motto he or she is not confined to any one particular question, as a Socialist confining himself to the social question only, or as an unbeliever to the religious question only. The Nihilist, adhering upon examination to one or another school, joins it under his or her own responsibility without any consideration for the conclusions of others, be they Nihilists themselvs. "I bow down before no man," says the Nihilist.

Such are the Nihilists. They may differ in opinions as wide as an orthodox from an unbeliever. Only one thing is required, and that is reason. Without it no examination is possible.

Nothwithstanding such possibilities for differing in opinions, the Nihilists, having one weapon in common—reason—unite in almost all questions of reform. Under their weapon systems will fall to be substituted by others, and one has fallen already never to revive again. By this I mean religion. The people of Sacramento and Stockton, of this state, hav given a very rough reception to the Salvation Army, whose members were badly beaten. Such outbreaks in the vicinity I liv by made many put me questions as to what would the Nihilists hav thought of them. And I find this means the best for giving my views, which, I may assure, coincide not only with the views of the Nihilists, whose names became as high as their nitroglycerin explosions were loud, but also with those of the educated class of all Russias, who only look on.

We admire freedom of and in everything, and heartily respect the religious feelings of every one, no matter how they may differ from those of ours, and can almost assure the Salvationists of the same; but the sufferings that mankind underwent for such our respect for the feelings of others, while they used dungeons, fire, axes, cords, etc., against the true nobles, are so well known to us that, if Russia ever does become a republic, she would never suffer a Salvationist in the midst of the people. By law or not, but the people would put him, at his first appearance, to a trial, and wait till he returns and reports of how much salvation he got over there.

The dynamite bomb, that sooner or later will giv salvation to the master on earth, will also say "goodbye" to the imaginary master in heaven. Parents will tell their little ones that they had suffered from two lies—one above there, which was officially called God, and the other down here: Czar was his name.

They possibly will be taught to respect the gods that another citizen may hav of his own, but never the one that was once a potter, made this little earth, created a man, and from his rib a woman, prohibited to taste the fruit of knowledge; flooded every living being except a drunkard with his family, dogs, hogs, and other animals; ordered the Jews to murder all non-Jews on the way to the promised land; disguised himself and fooled a young Jewish girl; put a shame on her family, then ordained to kill himself, and on the third day showed a trick—alive again! And what since? Kept his seat far above, where no arrow ever reached; by trickery and smartness hid himself from the telescope, and did so many mischievous works—has sent czars and priests on the helpless ninety million Russians!

Such is the official biblical God, and the very one the Salvationists would ever preach and make much display about. No! The Nihilists would never suffer them.

If we feel a kind of an offense when we hear of men and women having been beaten for this or that religious stuff, as at Sacramento and Stockton the other day, we on the other hand look at it as a pledge that never again shall autocracy recover its reign in this country. God and czar (as an embodiment of autocracy and aristocracy) are brothers—cannot liv separately. The foundation of both was a lie. The lie about the former we call absurdity and blasphemy —disrespect for nature; that of the latter, shame and injustice—disrespect for ourselvs.

In conclusion allow me to state that if I hav not succeeded this time in giving the true definition of Nihilism, and the views of its adherents on religion, I shall face any criticism, and confess my ignorance if met by reason, and if the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER be open for the subject.

Lord Bacon a Literary Thief.

Francis Bacon stole all his best ideas from his namesake Roger Bacon, says "Holt." Quite likely. But when "Holt" adds that Bacon probably never read Shakspere, he is mistaken. In 1625 Bacon published an Essay on Gardening, containing several passages taken almost verbatim from "Winter's Tale" written in 1611. Mr. Spedding notices the resemblances and remarks that, if the Essay on Gardening had been contained in the earlier edition, some expressions would hav made him suspect that Shakspere had been reading it. But since it is certain that "Winter's Tale" was written first, it is equally certain that Bacon stole from Shakspere. Therefore we must set him down as a literary thief of the meanest kind. ANTI-BACON.

The Heavenly Inheritance.

I hav just been hearing a sermon about heaven, and the preacher gave us a few figures about its capacity for holding the souls of the saved which were to me quite interesting. These figures were derived from Revelation xxi, 16, where it is shown that the New Jerusalem is to be a cubic city, 12,000 furlongs each way. The preacher showed that to reduce these furlongs to feet we would hav the cube of 7,920,000, and that this would equal 496,793,088,000,000,000,000 cubic feet. He allowed one-half of this entire space to be occupied (according to aristocratic custom) by the throne of God and the court of heaven, and one-half of the remainder to be devoted to streets, the remaining space then to be divided up into rooms twenty feet square and fifteen feet high, one of these rooms to be assigned to each saved soul. According to this estimate, he showed that there would be room for 207,824,378,666,666,666 saved souls in the New Jerusalem. The houses in this city would be 800 stories high, but as the inhabitants are to be supplied with wings there will be no climbing of stairs.

This kind of plain talk about heaven stirs up a great many thoughts, as, for example, who may we suppose will compose the court of heaven and occupy one-half of the entire city? Of course, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost will occupy the throne, and they may hav each several large reception rooms. Then the twelve apostles will each hav extra space allotted to them and each hav a small throne fixed up to sit on. Then, the Virgin Mary may hav about a million rooms (no throne) set apart for her. Adam and Eve will likely hav a grand suite of rooms and will probably liv together as of old. Then, Enoch, and Noah, and Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will each hav commodious apartments. Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Samson, Samuel, David, Solomon, and all the prophets will hav at least one thousand rooms each. Then all the popes and cardinals, Luther, Wesley, Knox, and many smaller lights will hav extra room assigned them in the court of heaven. These fellows will constitute the aristocracy of heaven. They will be the lords, dukes, earls, knights, etc., of the city. Common folks, like myself, will hav just one room apiece. We will hav to get along as best we can with kitchen, parlor, and bedroom all in one. As everything there is to be made of gold, no carpets will be needed.

Then, another question has been troubling my mind a good deal: Will those rooms be given to us "free gratis" when we get there, or will we hav to pay for them, as we do for real estate here? Who knows but Adam or some of the older settlers there may hav either homesteaded or pre-empted or bought up the whole city at a mere nominal price long before the flood, and that each new immigrant to the city may hav to work at low wages for some of these lords or dukes for a thousand years or so before he can earn enough to buy one of those nice rooms? Of course, our Christian enthusiast will say that these rooms all belong to God, that he made them himself, that Jay Gould will not be allowed to buy them up, that they are not for sale, and that God simply givs each person who gets there a warrantee deed of one of the rooms. Still, this answer is not very satisfactory, as he made the earth and he has allowed it to be bought and sold. True, he never sold out his right to anyone, but certain people claim to hav bought it, nevertheless, and to own it, and to hav the right to sell it. If this practice is right on earth, why may it not be right in heaven? If it would be wrong in heaven, then it must be wrong on earth.

This theme opens up a tremendous field for the imagination. For example, Jay Gould is not noted for his piety, and when he crosses the river it may be decided (by the board of canvassers) that he is too good to send to hades, but not good enough to join the aristocratic circle of heaven; and it would really be pretty tough on him if he had to pitch in and work (perhaps for a major of the Salvation Army) for a thousand years to get money enough ahead to buy one of the golden rooms above referred to.

Then the question comes up whether the people will be allowed to sell their real estate in heaven or not. If so, many of them will sell out and hav no room or home any more than they hav here. Rich men will buy up millions of rooms and rent them at as high rates as possible, and then when the poor fellows cannot pay their rent they will be turned out on the golden streets.

The tariff question will also come up in the New Jerusalem. Will the saints be allowed to buy goods in the cheapest market—say hades, for instance—or will they be compelled to patronize home manufactures? Rich manufacturers may complain that wages are higher in heaven than elsewhere, and hav a law to protect them against the pauper labor of hades. These men may then put up pr ces so high that they will become millionaires in a few years. Then they will speculate in real estate, buy up millions of rooms and hold them vacant so that when a poor soul arrives from earth he may hav to go so far from where there are any neighbors before he can get a room that he will not be able to attend church more than once or twice a year.

It is said they neither marry nor are given in marriage there, as though that was one of the greatest evils we hav to contend with here. What will the Mormons do about it? No courtship! No going home with the pretty angel girls! What shall we do? Sit in our golden rooms and play on our golden jew's-harps all the day long, and night too? But I am forgetting myself—there is to be no night there, nor any change of the seasons. It will be spring all the year round. What should we do when we get tired singing "Oh, to be Nothing!" "Hold the Fort," and other revival hymns? Twelve thousand furlongs make fifteen hundred miles. Think of a city 1,500 miles square, with buildings 1,500 miles high. It makes my head dizzy to think about it. The Washington Monument is only 500 feet high. Suppose each foot in that hight to be stretched into one mile, and this whole column to be multiplied by three, and you will hav the hight of the houses in the New Jerusalem. Whew! I'm downright dizzy with the thought! J. G. MALCOLM.

Clarke's Contortions.

Inasmuch as the worst forms of intemperance hav undeniably increased under prohibition, it is rather unkind for Mr. E. Clarke to allege that the opponents of that useless and worse than useless criminal tyranny are working "in the interests of drunkard makers."

Is Mr. Clarke quite sure that there are statutes in Iowa prohibiting larceny, arson, and murder? Certainly, there are laws defining the punishment to be inflicted upon persons who commit these crimes, and that regardless of the immediate or remote causes that led to such wrong actions, whether those causes were bad ancestral conditions, alcoholic intemperance, avarice, perverted love, revenge, etc., etc. Mr. Clarke proposes to remove one of these causes by prohibiting the sale of intoxicants. Why does he single out one particular cause to the exclusion of all others? The perversion of the faculties of love and acquisitivness each leads directly to the commission of more crimes than does the perversion of the bibulous appetite. Why strike so wildly at the lesser while leaving untouched the greater causes of crimes? The Communists of the Alcander Longley school say: "Destroy private property and you take away the only incentiv the saloon-keeper has for engaging in his business, the incentiv of private gain. Besides this, you at the same time destroy the incentiv that leads to the commission of a majority of the murders and most of the thefts." If Mr. Clarke is sincere in his advocacy of prohibition, and if that partial prohibition will lessen the evil of intemperance, then he is in logic and honor bound to join with Mr. Longley in demanding the abolition of the institution of private property. Equally, and for similar reasons, must he become a state Shaker and labor for the prohibition of all manifestations of the love faculty. But these gentlemen are too acute to follow their own premises to their logical conclusions, and this explains why it is impossible to get Mr. Hill, Mr. Clarke, or any of the rest of their school, with the exception of a few like Mr. Longley, to touch, even the most remotely, upon these vital points. Mr. Hill, for instance, talks blandly of my "comical mumble," but he is precious careful not to get involved in any serious attempt to answer it.

Mr. Clarke avers that he has never heard a temperance man or woman advocate the repeal of Iowa's prohibitory law. The shrinking modesty and gentle toleration of these prohibitory gentlemen are simply marvelous. The average Christian assumes that the rejecter of his creed is a natural scoundrel, and the prohibitionist courteously insists that he who doubts the efficiency and justice of prohibition is only a sot, known or disguised. Very nice people to discuss with—very!

"The man that advocates the whisky traffic is not a temperance man, argue the question as he may," says Mr. Clarke. The gentleman well knows that we are not advocating the whisky traffic; he knows that his conclusion does not legitimately follow from his premises. Would he be advocating Catholicism, should he protest against a law prohibiting Catholics from building churches? How absurd! And yet this is the chief stock-in-trade of the prohibitionists in their attacks upon their opponents.

"THEN was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil" (Matt. iv, 1). Since, as James (i, 13) declares God cannot be tempted with evil, and since Jesus was tempted of the devil, we are bound to admit either that Jesus was not God or that the devil was not evil.—John R. Kelso.

Refining Liberalism.

Everything that becomes sectarian has a tendency to become narrow, not to say bigoted. I fear I hav discovered a tendency among Liberals toward narrow-mindedness, a disposition to carp at everything. Perhaps I hav caught just that same ungenerous spirit myself, at least manifest it in some parts of what I am about to say.

Under the head of "A Pious Fraud," I notice that you republish some observation of a very disgraceful nature regarding the Rev. Joseph Cook, "from the Chicago Express." And why is Mr. Cook assailed in this vulgar style? Simply because he thinks a silver dollar ought to be equal to a dollar's worth of silver. According to the writer, who seems to style himself a greenbacker, whatever sort of an amphibian that may be, he who believes that in buying goods with silver money one should giv the full value in silver for the goods he gets by the transaction is "A Pious Fraud," and should be called a "literary thief," "Shylock lickspittle," "capper," one offering himself "To Let" "to best paying band of robbers," one who "knew he lied," etc.

The doctrin of honest money is called "quackery," and is said to be labeled "poison," and to be "branded with death's-head and cross-bones."

It may be that such an article is fit for republication in a Liberal journal, but I, for one, don't believe it. I fail to find in it one word of argument or one fact upon which an argument could be hung that would help either the writer's notions on the subject of inflation, or his idea of courteous language.

It is a shame, a burning, disgraceful shame, that our Liberal papers are to be crowded with the disgusting language of half-educated and less than half-refined or half-cultured persons, who answer all opponents as the clergy are so wont to answer Colonel Ingersoll—with personal abuse. Because we differ with Mr. Cook about religious matters, because we think he gets into petty difficulties sometimes, because he and Mr. Bennett (who was not quite an angel in his own style, though he may be now) had some ill feeling and harsh words, for which both ought to hav been ashamed, givs us no right or occasion to go out of our various ways to cast disgrace upon ourselvs in befouling him.

When our press runs in this direction, when we continually carp at every expression, word, or action of the church-people, is it any wonder they despise us, speak of us as impure, cruel, and disgusting?

Liberalism can afford to treat its enemies with the greatest generosity. It can afford to teach and believe that its enemies are right-hearted, pure, gentle, and sweet-minded though mistaken. The majority of mankind hav always clung to the teachings of the past; the true and the false alike. Not because they loved the false for its falseness, or they loved the truth for its truthfulness, but because they are not sufficiently developed to distinguish in all cases the false from the true. The conservativ conceive many truths as well as errors. Let us giv them credit for all that they do that is in the right direction.

If a church feeds a lame child, orphaned and helpless, if the ladies of the church meet and cry and pray over him, and feed him, let us not forget when we hear them telling him of Jesus, and God, and angels, and heaven, that, however unprovable, or impossible, or crude their religious notions may be, they did nevertheless feed the lame and orphaned child, and more from sympathy than from dogmatic impulse. Some frauds about their charities? Quite likely. Some of the frauds are Freethinkers, who stay with the church because it pays not to kick up a rumpus. That is no reason why we who do not choose to stay should indulge in vulgar, coarse language. We would feed the orphan if we had the the means to do it! Oh! yes; but we havn't the means. Then let us hold our mouths, except in words of praise and commendation for those who hav both the means and the heart to do these deeds of wondrous and noble charity.

That religious charitable institutions receive moneys occasionally from the state is true enough; that the state ought to attend to its own charities is also true; but do we make the matter any worse by calling these people thieves and robbers, as seems often to be the fashion in the Liberal journals?

Sometimes—and they are frequent times—the church people say hard things of the Liberals. Do we thereupon set them a good example? Oh! no; we make it a point to get even with them; we let off some styles of linguistic skyrockets just a little fuller of brimstone than anything the church people ever dreamed of.

How will the other Liberals, or rather some of the other Liberals, treat this rebuke which I here giv them? Oh, they will turn their mud batteries on me, and I shall know by experience just how uncultured, coarse, and brutal some of the right royal Infidels can be when they really make an effort in that direction. Perhaps the Liberal editors, for their own sakes, will keep most of it off their pages. Some there will, no doubt, be who will say as they read these words: Alas! they are too true. The Liberals of the world hav much to learn of the amenities of social life. A higher, sweeter, purer tone ought to be cultivated in the journalism of Freethought. Not everything cutting, pungent, and severe is either smart or helpful to the cause. Many a good man and sweet, gentle woman has turned away from Liberalism because they could not endure the coarse manners and heartless words of fellow-Liberals.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION.

The Coaching Club held their annual parade yesterday. It was the most brilliant that has heretofore taken place in this country, something like $200,000,000 being represented.

The body of a man well advanced in years was yesterday found in a vacant lot in Harlem. A well-thumbed copy of the Bible and a few pennies were found upon the body. The physicians state that it was a case of slow starvation.

Jay Gould's yacht has now been thoroughly refitted. For elegance of design, sumptuousness, and magnificent appointments, it fairly outrivals Aladdin's dream.

At Scranton, Pa., yesterday, a riot was averted by the prompt arrival of the police, who dispersed the mob, after roughly handling a few of the ringleaders. The trouble arose from the fact that a deduction of ten per cent had been made upon the pay of railroad laborers. They had been receiving $1 per day, and refused to return at 90 cents.

Our readers will be pleased to hear that Mrs. Chowlumskey Gore Jones has resumed her charming "dejeuners," and that our young millionaire princes and princesses can again enjoy their brilliant dawdle and languid inanity, which is, however, but a pale reflex of the English article.

The courts hav been appealed to in the matter of the Yonkers strikers. If capital and monopoly cannot buy a judge or two, we should like to know what things are coming to. If judges fail to sell out, legislatures are always in the market at current prices. Let a law be passed at once making it a penal offense for a striker to approach within a mile of the factory in which he has been employed. Capital must be protected. "Are there no prisons?" said Mr. Dickens.

Parliament has recently granted a life pension of £6,000 ($30,000) to Princess Beatrice, Queen Victoria's youngest daughter.

Tenants of the County Clare, Ireland, who were a short time ago evicted, are in a deplorable state. Some hav died from absolute want, and whole families are absolutely left without food or shelter.

The Rev. De Witt Talmage recently announced himself as being perfectly happy and well satisfied that this is a world of beauty and divine beneficence. His salary is $10,000 per year.

A case of peculiar hardship has recently come to light. A Mrs. Newcamp, whose husband died about a month ago, leaving her with three small children to provide for, secured work of a Jewish firm. By working eighteen hours a day, she managed to make enough to feed herself and children until within a few days ago, when she was taken sick and confined to her bed. Being a woman of sensitiv feelings, she hesitated to beg of her neighbors, and before the truth was known they were on the verge of starvation. They were temporarily relieved by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

The Rev. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity church, will pass the summer at his elegant villa at Newport. His salary is $20,000 per year. His parishioners hav all secured boxes in Paradise.

The life of the factory hands at Cohoes, N. Y., is not an enviable one. They are practically slaves. They get up at sunrise, work for some time before breakfast, hav a half hour for dinner, and work incessantly, reaping the rich harvest of poor board, a calico gown, and a wretched existence.

The Rev. Dr. John Hall's church in this city is one of the richest in the country. His salary is said to be $15,000 per year. His palace car, "Orthodox," has been engaged exclusivly by the elite of this city. It goes direct to the heavenly kingdom, issuing no stop-over checks for purgatory.

It is said that a new church is about to be started. It will be called the Church of the Present. It will ignore the past and the future, worshiping God by loving and caring for the whole human family now, aiming to secure justice for the worker by giving him or her the fair fruits of their labor, and a fair chance to enjoy this world as well as the rich. Its cardinal principles will be that we best serve God by making the best use of the present life, and leaving the future to be unveiled by him as he will; that the priceless gift of this life should not be deprecated, and a life to come (of which we know nothing) exalted above it. "Be ye content with this—none know what is to come," will be its motto.

One Result of the Revision.

As hell is knocked out of both the Old and New Testaments by the revisers, we suppose that now the obsolete word can be used with the most powerful emphasis without the speaker being considered profane.—Sunday Gazetteer.

A Letter from Paris.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am confined to my room with rheumatism, and the interesting conundrum, "Is life worth living?" stares me in the face with all the raw-head and bloody-bones distinctness the inventor of the aforesaid puzzle could wish. I am under the impression that the parents of the author of "Is Life Worth Living?" must hav been coffin makers or Roman Catholic priests, for no class of people take more interest in, or make more money out of, life, considering the amount of labor they do for the dollars they get. If you ask either of these business fellows, "Is life worth living?" no doubt the answer will be, "Life is worth living for us when we are planting life." When I see a Roman Catholic priest I always look around for a hearse and undertaker. They hav such a grimly satisfied look—an inward pleasure, so to speak—that suggests cholera, cancer, pine boards, and varnish. To giv the devil his due, the undertaker is more the man than the priest, for he givs you boards for the money he gets; the priest boards you in the nowhere, where the sidewalks are red-hot, and the apples are ashes; and for an extra fee he will let you climb icicles after your roast. Nothing like having a corner on the things you deal in.

I saw the great crowds of people on Sunday night and Monday to do homage to Victor Hugo. I walked with and amongst the French people, from the Louvre to the Arch of Triumph, on Sunday night, by the way of the Rue Rivoli. I looked for the hungry, howling Red Terror, the Freethinker, the Socialist, and, with due respect, the Devil—all the bad of to-day—but in vain. I hav seen a London mob, and New York mobs. Now I was in a French mob. I walked two miles and back with it. Wherever I looked, I saw the best behaved, the cleanest dressed crowd of men, women, and children I ever met. This French mob was most orderly—no police, no savage Irish in uniform, to provoke and go two-thirds of the way for a fight with the people. This element of Catholic education was not there.

It was the general talk in London that there would be a riot in Paris. The Christians wanted it, apparently, as another example of the wickedness of the Freethinkers. The riot did not come off, and heaven was disappointed.

My impression is that two-thirds of the two and a half millions of inhabitants of Paris turned out to see the show. It is a great satisfaction to see the results of the shaking off of the false education of the Roman Catholic church. The mass of the people are cleaner, they are rising to the dignity of men that know their power, and know how to use it. They hav kicked the king out, they are kicking the priests in an energetic manner, but the party kicked is very fat and hard to make an impression upon. The French people, in fact all peoples, must rub out this business institution before they can keep a clean house.

Contrast the written condition of the past (of the masses) with the results of the present, and sane men must ask the question, "What hav men been about for two thousand years?" And the answer is, that men hav woven webs in which the great mass of mankind hav been strangled. The Roman Catholic church is the greatest web; the great spider is at Rome.

Paris, France, June 3, 1885.

A VERSE in the New Testament precludes all drunkards from entering the kingdom of heaven, but no such law exists against murderers. Hence it is, perhaps, that the latter almost invariably become converted, and go to the scaffold in the "great and glorious hope," etc. A notable case is that of John Lee, who was convicted in Exeter for murdering his mistress. By a series of misfortunes the criminal escaped with his life—having been three times brought to the gallows, and hearing the funeral service three times—the drop being faulty and refusing to go on. The home secretary commuted his sentence to imprisonment for life, and Lee then wrote to his sister: "Dear sister, I did not fear to walk into death with a firm foot, because I knew the Lord was with me, and if I had passed through the shadow of death I knew I should hav went to the home which the blessed Lord has promised all who believe in him. I hav had kind attention shown me, and, dear sister, I was at the brink of death three times. It was my will to die, and I hope to do so yet. I hope the next time I go to the scaffold that I shall pass from this life to the home above. It is my wish to die. I am tired of this world, and I am waiting for the time to come, and I hope it will not be long before the time does come. I hav been dead to this world three times, and I giv myself up to the Lord, and whatever the will is, 'His will be done.' I leave it all in the Lord's hands. I believe what has occurred was a miracle worked by the Lord." No fault can be found with the home secretary for granting a respit after such an ordeal, but the majority of Christians will hardly relish the idea of spending eternity with such a noted villain as John Lee, even though they profess to believe that Christ came to save all men.—Wanganui Freethought Review.

The Tent.

On Friday, June 19th, we struck our tent at Kalamazoo. Our last lecture, Thursday, June 18th, "The Bible the Enemy of Women," was received with undivided attention by the largest audience since we pitched our tent.

We hav delivered twenty lectures, carefully distributed over 350 Liberal publications, and disposed of a goodly number of our best publications. Many most influential citizens expressed to us their regret at the removal of the tent, and their conviction that great good had been accomplished; that the people of Kalamazoo had been stirred as never before, and a spirit of investigation and earnest thought aroused that could not fail to yield a harvest of true Liberals.

Some discordant elements, that we trust brief time will remove, rendered it advisable to postpone organization. While some were afraid of Mrs. Grundy, and held aloof, only with bated breath, and fearful glance over their shoulder, daring to whisper they were with us in feeling and conviction, but their business forbade them to be present at or seem to encourage our meetings. We cannot too highly commend or fully express our appreciation of the kindness and co-operation of such stanch and true Secularists as Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Gault, Mr. and Mrs. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Orrin Hicks, Levy Hicks, Mr. and Mrs. M. Tucker, H. Oppenheimer, Silas Fisher, B. Witkowski, Samuel Folz, J. D. Schell, Mr. Sweet, A.C. Everett, and our genial son of Vulcan and good friend, J. T. Goin. After our last lecture, on Thursday evening, Mr. M. Tucker, with kind words of sympathy and cheer, shook us by the hand, and left a ten-dollar bill in ours, his method of expressing appreciation of our efforts.

Mr. Shakspere, of the Gazette, in view of the fact that financially our labor at Kalamazoo had failed of adequate remuneration, generously donated four-fifths of his advertising bill. All treated us with uniform kindness and courtesy. Really we were unable to do justice to Kalamazoo. Lecturing every night necessitated our devoting the greater part of our time to study and preparation of our lectures, filling in the time painting bills and attending to absolutely necessary correspondence (those failing to receive replies will please accept this as excuse for seeming neglect). Every moment of our time was occupied. We could not visit as we should hav done, nor devote time to canvassing, and increasing interest in those who attended our lectures. We hope to do better.

We parted with our tent-master, who has returned to New York. At present we hav to "go it alone." We need an earnest, self-sacrificing, brave Liberal, a really good musician and vocalist, to sing and accompany himself on organ; one willing to do, dare, and endure from love of the cause and his fellow-creatures. We cannot afford to pay salary anything like the equivalent for the services required, but will do all the fund permits, and will guarantee payment of whatever we agree on. Immediate application requested. We are now doing double duty—acting as our own tent-master. We are hopeful as the good results of tent effort become more and more manifest, our friends will contribute so liberally to the tent fund that we shall feel justified in offering inducements to some of our able lecturers to giv us the benefit of their occasional services, but at present dare not incur the expense.

The object of the tent is to do missionary work; to carry the glad tidings of the gospel of Humanity without money and without price to fields where otherwise the truths of Secularism would not be proclaimed, and to do real propaganda work.

We are convinced that the printing press is our true savior, and look for greater results from the careful distribution of our best Liberal literature, and securing subscribers to our leading Liberal papers, than we do from our efforts on the rostrum.

We would take occasion to return thanks to Converse Close, Abbie Knapp, and all the good friends who hav sent us papers and Liberal literature for gratuitous distribution.

Under the pilotage of Mr. E. Flansburg, we hav pitched the tent at Hickory Corners, Mich., which will be our address for the next two weeks.

HICKORY CORNERS.—On Saturday, June 20th, we packed tent and belongings on two teams and started eighteen miles from Kalamazoo to Hickory Corners. Arrived at about 8 P.M. Early Sunday morning we pitched tent. Thanks to the willing hands and sturdy muscle of the friends here, we soon had everything ship-shape. We were advertised to lecture at 2 o'clock, but immediately after we had pitched tent it commenced to rain furiously, and did not abate until after four o'clock. At 7:30 P.M., it looked dark and squally. Yet there was quite a good attendance, and two parsons present. We are favorably impressed with this place, and look forward to large attendance and good interest. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Christian Progress in the South.

The meeting which commenced nearly two weeks ago closed last night. Twenty were added during the meeting, among whom were our pressman and ink-boy. The Bible tells us that devils believe and tremble, but this is the first case where we hav seen one baptized.—Texas Christian.

THE ALBANY CONVENTION.

The program of the Albany Convention will be in the main as follows: Friday morning, business meeting and opening address by J. J. McCabe, president of Albany Liberal Association. Friday afternoon, lecture by Charles Watts, of England; subject, "Secularism: Constructiv and Destructiv." Friday evening, lecture by Elizabeth Cady Stanton; subject: "The Religious Liberty of Woman." Saturday morning, lecture by Courtlandt Palmer; subject: "The Aristocracy of Freethought." Saturday afternoon, lecture by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel; subject: "The Demands of Liberalism." Saturday evening, lecture by James Parton; subject: "Victor Hugo." Sunday morning, lecture by T. B. Wakeman; subject: "The Outlook of Liberalism." Sunday afternoon, lecture by Helen H. Gardener; subject: "Historic Facts and Theologic Fictions."

The price of course ticket, admitting to all these lectures of the Convention, is one dollar. Short addresses during the sessions may be expected from Horace Seaver, editor of Boston Investigator, George N. Hill, president of Boston Ingersoll Secular Society, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, Joseph McDonough, Mrs. Iliohan, and others. Robert G. Ingersoll will lecture on Sunday evening. The price of admission will be 50 cents, reserved seats 75 cents and $1.00. The proceeds of this lecture will be for the benefit of the State Association and the National Liberal League. Let the bountiful generosity of Colonel Ingersoll arouse us to new efforts, and let each Liberal contribute of his best to the cause. The expenses of the Convention will be large, and, besides, what is made above and beyond the expenses will go into the state and national treasury of the Liberal Associations, and will be used for the carrying out of practical measures of reform. A strict account will be rendered of all receipts and expenditures. The more that is received, therefore, the more powerful will be the work done in the future; the greater will be the thought and agitation produced in the minds of the community. We should utilize the eloquence, the enthusiasm, and the renewed fellowship and nobler devotion which will be the gift of this Convention to the world. So long as anything contrary to the Nine Demands exists in our laws; so long should we earnestly strive to remove the injustice, not simply by talking, but by doing. We wish to make this Convention notable in the history of Freethought, not only for the grandeur of the ideas which it expresses, but the practical and immediate action that will result from the gathering together of such moral and intellectual forces.

I hope, therefore, that every Liberal who possibly can will be interested in this Convention; will come to it and partake of its social life, will aid by whatever pecuniary gift he can spare, so that from the Convention we can go forward with a replenished treasury to the enormous work still to be accomplished for the assertion of liberty and justice.

I am sure that all friends will be delighted with the speakers and subjects arranged for the Convention. We hav endeavored to hav the widest representation of Radical thought. The main trouble has been the wealth of material at command. We hav been compelled to make a selection. We could not hav all our best and wisest advocates; time would not allow. Nor can we tell just exactly what our funds might allow. Last year there was a lack, and we could not pay our speakers their just dues. We wish to avoid this in future, and be able to pay to each lecturer what we engage to do. Against these mistakes which hav been made in the past we must guard, and the wiser course for the present is to hav a smaller number, and be able to giv a just remuneration, and those whom we cannot hear this time will hav a better opportunity in the future. This is one of many brilliant Conventions to be held, and therefore there will be a chance for all. If any do feel disappointed that some favorit speaker is not now on the list, we hope they will consider the circumstances—that there must be limitations; and what we do not hav now will certainly be a joy to come, if, with unselfish and public-spirited effort, we all unite at this vital point, and make a success of the Convention, and so providing the way for a wider development of our resources in the coming years.

I wish to say that I am ready for work at any time and place throughout the east during the summer months. There may be places where much good can be accomplished by Sunday lectures out of doors perhaps. I will respond to any call; wherever a few friends can get together, and raise enough for traveling expenses, I will come and do my best service.

Much of my summer's work will be organizing for the winter's more aggressiv campaign. I hope that friends will understand this, and realize that I am still hard at work, although there is not quite so much of public labor to report. There is machinery to watch—and oil, perhaps—so that the practical outcome may be more fruitful.

There are several hundred dollars of the campaign fund which hav not yet been paid in, and I earnestly request all friends who hav made any pledges to fulfil them, for the treasury is empty, and we need funds to carry out our summer's work—office business, correspondence, etc.—and as the secretary devotes himself exclusivly to the affairs of the League, without which many things of public importance would fail, it is hoped that all promises will be made good, and that still further contributions will be made by those who see that the work of Liberalism must be carried on by business methods, and that some one must do this at the sacrifice of other modes of income, and therefore Liberals must see to it that he who endevors to keep the flag flying must be paid for the service like other men, who cannot liv on the spirit, but must hav food, shelter, and clothing.

The National Liberal League has a great work before it, but this cannot be done in a moment, and much of the work must be hard, silent, solitary work. The field must be thoroughly studied. Conventions and eloquent lectures are not all that is needed. There must be much previous and apparently unremunerativ labor performed in order that the way may be made clear for a more public and splendid advance. I presume Liberals will be wise enough to provide for these arduous but obscure tasks.

The following from far-off Arizona shows how widespread our movement is, and that its gospel is as wide as the world:

"Last year I found myself in the hospital, but this year I hav done some hard work and made a little money; and as the government pet, the marauding Apache, is leaving his trail of blood and rapine over this section, and as I am liable at any time to lose my scalp, I thought it better to make sure of a life-membership; so please find inclosed $15.00—fourteen to complete life-membership, and one for annual membership of James T. Lyon. Hoping that you and other officers of the League may meet and defeat orthodoxy, I remain an Agnostic.
Harshaw, Ariz. "Yours, F. A. LAMONT."

Perhaps some of our other friends can find equally solid reasons for securing a life-membership, although they are not quite so near to the wild Indian as our Western comrade. At least secure an annual membership with Ingersoll's autograph, of which every Liberal should be proud.

They want a rousing debate at Denison, Texas. We hope soon to hav one, and from the electricity of mental combat to hav a little more light for human progress.

We hav received the following from Mechanicsburg, Ill.:

"There are about fifteen Freethinkers here who would join in a Liberal organization. I am sure, after a start, that this number would be doubled. Please send the necessary information and papers and we will form a local auxiliary League at once. Fraternally yours, W. A. BECK."

Thus slowly, from point to point, the new thought of the world becomes its life. It creates fellowship and instrumentalities for human growth. So our hearts are glad, for not alone in the solitude of our individuality do we see the illumination of truth, but in the electric currents of a thousand sympathies flowing into one. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose.

From the Investigator.

By the following extract of a letter from Mrs. Rose, dated London, Eng., May 25, 1885, it will be seen that she alludes to the National Liberal League here and also to the Ingersoll Secular Society, and with her characteristic generosity donates to each the sum of $10, to constitute her a member of both. Though in feeble health, and far away, she still retains her interest in the Liberal movement:

"Your mention of the New York Convention of forty years ago brought a flood of events visibly to my mind. I lived then, now I only linger. In New York I lived and worked for years, almost alone. I am glad that there is now a National Liberal League there, and I should like to belong to it. Please to send my name and $10 to them, to make me a member. I would write myself to them, but it is very difficult for me to write, and very likely no one now in New York would know much about me.

"I am very sorry to giv you that trouble, but it would very much oblige me for you to send it in my name. Please also to giv $10 to the Ingersoll Secular Society, which meets in the Paine Memoral, and make me a member of it. I am with these societies in heart and soul, and as I cannot be with them in person, I like to hav my name among them."

Chicago League Resolutions.

WHEREAS, The Chicago Liberal League learns with profound regret the demise of ex-Secretary of the National League Theron C. Leland, through whose long official term such intimate and cordial relations with this League were continuously maintained; be it

Resolved, That we can express no keener sense of this great loss, giv no better estimate of his work and worth, than to approve and reaffirm the eloquent and timely tribute paid to the life and labors of this heroic veteran in the Liberal cause in the oration recently delivered by T. B. Wakeman, of New York, at the funeral of our esteemed, venerated friend and co-worker.

OUR Agnostic "brother" of the New York TRUTH SEEKER pays a good deal of attention to Jewish affairs, and always in a fraternal and manly way. In a recent issue our contemporary reports the substance of a speech delivered by Mr. Cohen before the Liberal Club of New York, and says "it was one of the best speeches of the evening, and in the matter of forcible expression there was nothing like it." We politely raise our hat to Mr. Cohen and congratulate him on having carried off the honors of the evening, no small honors in such an assemblage. As between Jews and Agnostics there is really a complete intellectual fellowship. "In union there is strength" against the common enemy of intolerance.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

The Cause of Planetary Motion.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mr. Giles Chase propounds a novel theory of the cause of planetary motion. He attributes it to a difference in the degree of pressure of the atmosphere, and argues a priori that the pressure is greater on the dark and cooler side of a planet than on the light and warmer side. If such is the fact, it can be easily proved with a barometer. But if the barometer registers no difference between midday and midnight, then the theory is exploded.

To me the cause of planetary motion is plain enough. Planets grow by meteoric accretion. The first meteor had its own force and direction; colliding and uniting with a second one, the necessary result was a change of direction and rotation. A third meteor being added, there was a further change; and so on until in the course of ages a planet was formed whose motion was the result of the aggregate force of the innumerable meteors that composed it.

The planets do not revolve in the same plane. The satellites of Uranus hav an orbit nearly perpendicular to the ecliptic. Jupiter, although twelve times as large as the earth, makes more than two revolutions to the earth's one. All these differences are easily accounted for on the theory of world formation by meteoric accretion. W. H. B.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The communication of Mr. Giles Chase in The Truth Seeker of June 6th being the best theory of planetary motion that I hav met with in print, I regret that it is badly marred with. incongruities—incongruities that, being unnecessary, should be avoided.

He recognizes the fundamental law of matter that as we recede from the center matter becomes more attenuated.

Then the relativ position of matter around the center is determined by its comparativ density; that which is the most dense takes position nearest to the center and forces the more attenuated matter toward the circumference.

Water, being a dense fluid, sinks to a common level around the center by the inherent force of its own density. When expanded to vapor, it becomes less dense than the lower atmosphere and is forced outward by atmospheric pressure. It could not move outward of its own volition, for all matter presses toward a common center with the full force of its density.

Then, density being a positivly known and sufficient cause for the centripetal action of matter called gravitation, why should we persistently attribute it to an imaginary cause?

Balloons being constructed on the same principle that planets are, the only difference being in the application of the principle for obvious reason, they should serve to illustrate the cause of planetary motion.

The planet, like the balloon, is a combination of dense and attenuated matter that causes it to be suspended in the matter of our solar system, called ether, the same as a balloon is suspended in our atmosphere. Therefore, a planet can no more recede beyond a given distance from the sun than a balloon can recede beyond a given distance from the earth, for the all-sufficient reason that matter in that direction is not of sufficient density to support its weight. A planet can no more approach nearer than a given distance from the sun than a balloon can approach nearer than a given distance from the earth, for the all-sufficient reason that matter in that direction is of greater density than it can penetrate or displace.

Then, density being the cause of gravitation, the planet should always present the side to the sun in which density preponderates. Expansion of atmosphere on the side to the sun givs a preponderance of density to the opposit side and makes the rotation of the planet a physical necessity.

That is precisely what the language of Mr. Chase on that point implies, though somewhat obscurely, and it has enabled him to reach correct conclusions in the middle of his letter which he could not hav done otherwise.

"The rotation of the planet is the inevitable result," for the simple reason that, density being the cause of gravitation, the planet, in obedience to the law of gravitation, must inevitably present the side to the sun in which density preponderates. In doing so, the surface of the planet's atmosphere nearest the sun becomes the center or pivot on which the dense part of the planet turns to the sun, describing a semicircle around the opposit side; the expanded side is then forced outward by the pressure of other matter of greater density.

That action being continuous, and all the conditions that attend it being always the same, the planet is compelled to roll around the sun like a ball over a roadway, and with mathematical precision.

Now, the dense atmosphere cannot be expanded instantaneously, nor can the expanded atmosphere be at once condensed; therefore, when the planet is in motion, the center of the dense atmosphere should be a few degrees in advance of a line with the sun, and the center of expanded atmosphere should be directly opposit. Moreover, when the sun is north of the equator, the center of density should be equidistant south of it, and should cause the south pole to dip toward the sun. A like action should occur at the north when the sun is south of the equator.

Bacon a Concealed Poet.

To point out and answer, ever so briefly, all the mistakes of "Holt" would take more space than he has occupied.

He passes over in silence my answer to his criticism of Bacon's "hav took." I half-erased two words at the end of a line quoted from Shakspere, hoping the printer would let it stand thus:

"Thou hist spoke too much already; get."

Anyhow, "Holt" didn't take the hint, but came again, blundering as usual. Some of his mistakes are excusable on the ground of ignorance, but his final one is simply stupid. Speaking of Bacon, he says:

"He was not a poet. In all candor let it be submitted as to those Psalms of his, had they been published last year as the work of some gifted, sky-aspiring youth out West, they would hardly elicit such admiration as they do from my critical friend."

Now, the fact is that the "critical friend" did not express a word of admiration. He only quoted Bacon's biographer, whose admiration of the ex-chancellor's poetic talent, as imperfectly shown in a hampered versification of the Psalms, was expressed before Spedding heard it claimed that Shakspere did not write the plays.

Spedding was candid enough to say that Bacon might hav taken the highest rank as a poet; and that judgment was based upon the versification of a few Psalms by the old man on a sick-bed. The early poetical works of Bacon his biographer failed to discover. But within the last few years enough evidence has been brought to light to prove Spedding's possibility an absolute fact.

Take only three of these discoveries:

1. We know that Bacon wrote sonnets to the queen and excused himself by saying, "I profess not to be a poet."

2. We know that he wrote masques anonymously before Shakspere appeared as a playwriter, and that those masques were essentially poetic compositions in the nature of plays, and sometimes contained verses in rhyme equal in merit to the average of Shakspere's.

3. We know that in 1603 Bacon wrote a private letter to the poet John Davies, begging him to speak a good word for the writer to the incoming king, and closing with these words, "So, desiring you to be good to concealed poets, I continue."

But all such evidence I suppose will hav no weight upon a mind like "Holt's." So let him continue with the misguided multitude to calumniate the greatest thinker and justest chancellor that England ever had, while he bows down to worship the mythical bard of Avon, and characterizes as "hypercritics" all such wicked fellows as Iconoclast.

A Talk with Ingersoll.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: After my rustication among the lakes of Alexandria, in company with Messrs. Trenham and Tenger, I took the midnight train for Minneapolis, and early in the morning procured our tickets for Ingersoll's lecture. We were joined by Mr. A. W. Swensen, a prominent Liberal of Alexandria, and called upon the colonel at the West Hotel, a granit-marble palace. We were shown up to his room, and were soon swimming in talk. It was an enjoyable visit. We are no mere man-worshiper, but who can help feeling gratified in meeting manhood? As Liberals, are we not justly proud of such a splendid specimen as Ingersoll? No artificial dignity about him. Instead, he is a hearty, open-mannered man. As he sat in his easy chair he was the picture of comfort. He remarked that he had no idea, when he began lecturing, that he would be paid as he has been for delivering Infidel lectures. Few bishops of the Christian church hav been paid so well. Indeed, Ingersoll reminds one of an old-fashioned English bishop, minus a bishop's lordly dignity, plus an inexhaustible fund of good nature. He is a man full of joy, warm-hearted, humane, sympathetic. Ingersoll may hav his faults, like the rest of us; but they cannot be marked or prominent. The race has dreamed of its perfect man, but he has not yet been born. Perfection, infallibility, of a human will probably never be achieved.

Once in a while he would bring out a "cuss-word" (just to show his contempt for Christian swearing) to emphasize a sentence. Even his tinge of profanity is pithy, and it did seem to me that I would rather hear him swear out of the pulpit than any clergyman I ever heard swear in it. Less venom, more good humor, than the minister exhibits in his.

It is a custom, I know, to reserve our good words for the dead, but I am not going to do it. I think Ingersoll is a nobler type of man than were any of the Roman and Grecian philosophers, and I will not wait for his funeral to say so. The over-praised orators of the ancients are not comparable with our living, breathing, nineteenth-century orator, an Infidel, and matchless. Who were they that complimented Jesus Christ by saying, "Never man spake like this man?" They were people, even though rulers, who were ignorant probably of classic Greece—who perhaps never heard of Pericles. It is exceedingly doubtful if Jesus could equal Ingersoll in oratory.

The throng of two thousand in the Grand Opera House, Minneapolis, that night seemed to be of the same opinion—that we hav the greatest orator of the ages now living with us. He is one of the great, good blessings of this nineteenth century that the Christian church does not claim. His printed words are eloquent. Grand are the lines of Shakspere. But as we never know their real depth and meaning until spoken by a Booth or a Barrett, so we miss Ingersoll's chief charm until his word is spoken by himself—the expression, the look, the tone, the attitude, that wonderfully exquisit cadence in some passages, those monotone syllables; his imagery; illustration, always apt; anecdote, which serves as lightning to reveal the blackness of the cloud of Christian theology—back of all is the sunshine of his ever-present good will to man. His mirth bubbles and sparkles throughout his entire discourse, and brightens everybody's face—except now and then a countenance molded in the despair of Christian rigidity.

Ingersoll, in private conversation and public speech, is teaching the world, and especially the Christian part of it, the value of the gospel of good nature—and he practices what he preaches.

It may be that I notice these traits in him with quicker eye because I hav labored so hard for a quarter of a century with clergymen, with whom I hav had a hundred oral battles, to exercise more kindliness toward man and less piety godward.

The colonel conducted me into an adjoining room and introduced me to his daughter, Maude, who is a pleasant, intelligent-appearing young lady.

"The Pest of Laws."

A strange delusion possesses the minds of most people that, because our government is popular and good, we cannot hav too much of it. They forget that government itself is a necessary evil, like doctoring. People are flattered that they are law-abiding until they hug their chains and hear their clanking as some noble music. The lower, more degraded, less self-restrained a people are, the more absolute must be their government. As they emerge from this inferior condition, they require less external control; that is, they govern themselvs more. Many of the most important affairs of vast communities are conducted on business principles—each man does his part and thus all is done exactly and well.

Our government was the best in the world because it was plain, cheap, and simple. There is danger of our becoming ruined by what Tacitus calls the "Pest of Laws." The growth of the evil may be seen in the increasing cost of it. The real cost of government is seen under the head of "Miscellaneous" in the treasurer's report. This excludes all but the bare cost of running the thing. It has no relation to the army, navy, pension, public debt, interest, or anything else. Annually the treasurer publishes the receipts and expenditures from 1790. We see by this that it cost us but about five million dollars when we had one-third our present population. Now it costs us some seventy or eighty millions.

Calhoun said that it could be demonstrated that if the necessary cost of any government like ours must double faster than the population doubles, it must end in the overthrow of the government. But ours is increasing some eight times faster than the population. It will create such poverty and discontent as must cause explosion. We shall need military force to hold these self-rulers—the people—in order. A despot republic is what we are coming to. Every session of Congress and state legislatures sees several thousand new laws (cure alls) proposed. Instead of eternal vigilance we hav eternal stupidity and sleep. Any good business man could run the whole government, were it put in commission as was once suggested about the British government, for ten million dollars, and hav a large sum over and above. Were all laws repealed save the criminal acts to punish mala in se, we would then hav something like self-government. The states, countries, and cities could manage their own affairs. Is it not plain that this vast monster which is rising up, called general government, is a disease that grows by what it feeds on, and that the more it feeds the more it must consume? Just think how people would hav laughed at any one who in 1845 would hav predicted the size of our civil list in 1876.

A great city daily has just published an article on the growing spirit of Anarchy in France. The signs were never worse before the old French Revolution. Yet the writer is amazed. Here is France, a republic, free, government of the people, for the people, by the people, and millions under some oppression ready to rend society in pieces. What wickedness!

The writer feels uncomfortable lest such wicked people may be found here.

We may be sure that a comfortable, busy people never rebelled. When they rise up something is wrong somewhere. Every idle person is living at the expense, finally, of common labor. Every tax is shuffled off on to the lowest, most defenseless class. "Hence these tears," this distress, and spirit of Anarchy. Dissatisfaction spreads over and is lost on our cheap lands. Therefore our present safety. But these lands are being occupied. What becomes of the discontented then? What if the self-government must keep armies to restrain the self-governed? For hide and strain as we may, we cannot lose sight of this fact, that this government was made for the happiness of these discontented, toiling masses.

May it not be that we are deceived by names and forms? Is not government the same in effect, no matter by what name we call it? Do we get rid of aristocracy by simply banishing the titles of honor, parchments, and ribbons, if we reserve all that gave to aristocracy its power? If the offices are numberless and powerful, does it matter whether we fill them by election or they are filled by persons previously designated by law? Having displaced "one master who is responsible and taken over us a multitude of irresponsible ones," as Jefferson once hinted, will our condition be easier?

Is it not a little alarming when we review our past and see how rapidly we hav hurried on from the plain; cheap, simple government originally founded, and hear the excuses for it by ignorance and shallowness in high place? Is it not frightful to see such blindness leading the blind? HOLT.

Canadian Notes.

The Toronto Secular Society are organizing a series of Sunday excursions by steamboat to various points on Lake Ontario. Some of their summer course of lectures will be delivered in groves on the lake shore at various romantic spots.

Mr. Arthur Tilney was the recipient of a complimentary testimonial benefit on Wednesday night last, the occasion being his departure for New York to join the Lingard Star Combination. The event came off at the Grand Opera House Concert Hall. Now that the funniest man in Canada is about to leave us we must look about us for the next aspirant for honors as chief priest of Momus.

The next annual Convention of Freethinkers from all parts of Canada, to take place during the great fair early in September, will be the greatest and most important that has ever taken place yet.

The fundamental doctrin of evolution is that the universe and all that it contains did not come into existence in the condition that we now know it, nor in anything like that condition. It implies that the heavens as they appear above, the earth as it exists beneath us, the hosts of living creatures that occupy it, and humanity as we know it are merely the final terms in an immense series of changes which hav been brought about in the course of immeasurable time. It affirms vast changes in vast periods, that these changes hav been according to a method, and that this method has been of the nature of an unfolding. The essential changes of evolution hav been comprehensivly formulated as from the simple to the complex, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, from the general so the special. It is a scientific induction, that is, an idea formed after the facts are known, and based upon them.

That the solar system was gradually formed in the way the nebular hypothesis implies, and that its facts can be explained by that hypothesis and no other, is now the general belief of astronomers. Consisting of 150 bodies, revolving and circulating according to one grand method, it has been pointed out that there are no less than 370 facts concerning the distribution, form, and motion of the sun and planets, which are the simple consequences of the nebular hypothesis, and can be accounted for in no other way. Geology has given us a vast mass of facts and inductions which establish with certainty one proposition, viz., that our planet is not what it was millions of years ago, but has undergone a series of developing changes, resulting in the present order of things. The law of specialization, the general being before the special, is the law of development. The egg is at first a simple unit, and gradually part after part of the new structure is evolved, that which is most fundamental appearing earliest, until the being is complete in all its outer and minor details.

The principle is exhibited in the physical history of the globe, which was first a featureless globe of fire, then had its oceans and dry land, in course of time received mountains and rivers, and finally all those diversities of surface which now characterize it. The climates began with universal tropics, culminating at last in the diversities of the present day.

We may remark in passing that the science of geology was thrust back for 200 years by the enslavement of the human mind to the superstition of theology and Christianity.

The study of the course of organic life upon the earth shows that it conforms to the same great plan. The life of the globe a few milllions of years ago was a very different thing from what it is now. Different races of plants and animals hav appeared and disappeared in slow succession, and their remains are found entombed in successiv rock formations.

The facts are a part of geology, and hav been arrived at by the same processes of observation and induction that hav revealed the order and history of the stratified systems. The course of life upon the globe has been conformed to a method, and that method is universally described as a progress and a development. It shows an advance from the simple to the complex, from the general to the special, from the lower to the higher. In short, it is an evolution in the strictest sense of the word. There was first a period of no life—the azoic age. Then appeared the lower forms of life—vegetable and animal. Then higher and higher kinds until man, the highest of all, appeared last. The progress evinces continuity, harmony, and gradation. The beginning of an age has always been in the middle of preceding age, and the marks of the future coming out to view are prophetic of that future. The age of mammals was foreshadowed by the appearance of mammals long before in the course of the reptilian age, and the age of reptils was prophesied in types that lived in the early carboniferous age. Coming events cast their shadows before. The lower forms that perish do not reappear. No group or species hav ever come into existence twice. But every species has come into existence coincident, both in space and time, with a pre-existing closely allied species. That the great advancing movement of organic life has been a divergence, an opening out, or an evolution, is incontestable, and is admitted by the highest biological authorities. It is proved by the fact that if we go back a million of years or so, there is an obvious converging of types, or the different kinds of animals are nearer together in character, and as we recede still further into the past the approximation becomes still closer.

Humanity is not now what it was in ages long past. During some scores of thousands of years of man's presence upon earth an immense series of changes hav taken place in the history of the race. Only a few thousand years ago Europe was barbarous, and its inhabitants warred and worked with implements of stone; society was rude, low, homogeneous, and undeveloped. Its movement has been a slow unfolding into diversitv and specialty. There has been an increase of human capabilities; a rise in intelligence; an advance of morals; a growing capacity for social co-operation; a multiplication of arts and industries; augmented power over nature; an emergence of institutions, in short, evolution of civilization. This is a broad deduction from the facts of history—from the facts of prehistoric archeology—and it is fast taking the place of the teachings of theology that the course of humanity has been a degeneracy, which was firmly believed until science reversed the method of studying the subject as taught by the Bible. They Mean Business.

To those Liberals who feel that when they hav taken the first step in Liberalism, and freed themselvs from the thraldom of superstition, they hav nothing more to do, I earnestly recommend reading the following extract from an address by T. P. Stevenson, delivered before the convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, at St. Louis, Mo., last year. Stevenson is corresponding secretary of the National Reform Association, which organization hopes to bring about in this land a complete union of church and state, reviving the horrors of the Inquisition, and spreading once more over Infidelity the pall of the Dark Ages. He says:

"Finally, I salute you because yours is a Christian Union. By the very logic of your name you are pledged in advance to the whole reform which we are striving to accomplish. The identity of your work with ours is not merely superficial or apparent, but of the deepest and most essential character. You are laboring for the reform of government at a single point, in accordance with the laws of the Christian religion. We are seeking to apply the same laws to our whole national life. You are asking the government to adopt a policy which can only be justified on the ground that nations hav moral responsibilities, and are amenable to moral law. We are asking the nation to declare, authoritativly and decisivly, its acknowledgment of the supreme authority of God, of Jesus Christ, and of the moral law set forth in his word. The suppression of the drink traffic, on moral grounds, will logically involve the better enforcement, on the same grounds, of our laws against blasphemy and Sabbath desecration, the reform of our corrupt divorce legislation, the extirpation of polygamy, and the wise, kind, and firm employment of all the powers and resources of government for the restraint of moral evils. The education of the children of the republic in temperance principles in the public schools logically involves the maintenance in those schools of the Bible as the great text-book in morals. Valuable and convincing as is the scientific argument, you would not be willing to rest your whole case to-day, in this convention, on the platform, before the nation, on the scientific argument alone. As a Christian Union you cannot rest satisfied while the word of God is excluded from the public schools of this city, of Chicago, of San Francisco, and many other cities and towns, while adulterous divorce laws defile our statute books, or while polygamy is welcomed, in the person of its representativ to the halls of Congress. The Infidel looks on our national Constitution, and says: 'I am satisfied. There is no mention there of God, in whom I do not believe, or of religion, which I repudiate.' Our fathers, we must confess, left a blank in that great instrument. That blank is widely interpreted to mean Atheism. We are striving to fill the blank with the name which is above every name, and we are sure the Woman's Christian Temperance Union applauds and will join our efforts."

Yes, my dear sir, the Constitution that was good enough for Washington, Jefferson, and Paine is good enough for us Infidels of to-day, and if it is not good enough for you Christians, you can emigrate. The government of Russia would no doubt harmonize better with your ideas of the legitimate sphere of the church, and by emigrating you would, no doubt, save yourself much useless friction and repining, for I tell you in confidence that the Infidels of to-day mean business also; and sooner than see this government draggled in the mire of ecclesiastical corruption, our free institutions throttled in their promising infancy, and man once more the martyr of the gods, they will once more shoulder the musket and strike for "our altars and our fires." Let those who hav one iota of love of country, of home, and of humanity in their hearts stand firm for the truth and be alert. The enemies of our free institutions and free government lie in wait behind every Christian organization ready to stab in the dark whenever they feel safe in so doing. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

EVA BARNES.

Ezra H. Heywood Should Be Indemnified.

It is not very consistent for us to put up statues of "Liberty Enlightening the World," and send money to Rome to erect a monument to Bruno where he was burnt two hundred and eighty-five years ago, if we let our own living martyrs for liberty suffer without indemnity. Such was the thought that occurred to me while I read this letter from our old liberty-loving Nestor:

MEDFORD, Feb. 17, 1885.

MY DEAR MR. HEYWOOD: You are quite right in opining that I do not indorse some of the theories for ventilating which you hav been so insanely persecuted. But as a citizen of a republic which has bound itself before all mankind to maintain the perfect liberty of the press, and the perfect liberty of every individual who regards the rights and liberty of others, I feel that the republic is bound to indemnify you for the wrong it has done you by a foolish and unconstitutional law hypocritically administered. I could not respect myself if I wholly refused to do my share of such a manifest duty. It would be a very mean argument to the contrary to say, "You might hav avoided the persecutions you hav suffered by suppressing your pinions." I honor the bravery which spurns such prudence.

Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

E. H. Heywood is the one living man in Massachusetts who has fought the fight for liberty in our day and generation against church tyranny and has won. The consequences for good are now very great, and must increase from year to year. He has stood in the gap and suffered as few are called to do. He has, like a hero, refused to avoid prosecutions by suppressing his opinions and allowing the church to ride rough-shod over the remains of American liberty.

What has been the result?

His hotel and book business by which he was getting a living has been largely broken up, and he is in danger of losing his home.

If Americans allow this to be the result of his heroism, it will be a victory for Comstockism after all.

The only way to prevent it is to indemnify Mr. Heywood for his loss, and it ought to be done abundantly. Consult him as to the ways and means, or better, send him some money or patronage at once. His address is Princeton, Mass.

But you say, "I do not approve of Mr. Heywood's opinions, methods, and expressions." Neither do I. But because we do not, it is all the more necessary to liberty that he should hav the legal right to express them, and, above all, that such right should not be taken away by amateur, irresponsible organizations outside of regular secular government.

Liberty is the one incalculable blessing, and it is measured by the freedom to do either right or wrong, until direct injury results to another from which he must be protected. I hav yet to learn that Mr. Heywood has ever injured man, woman, or child. Yet he has been cruelly imprisoned, tried again and again, his business ruined, and his health and life endangered.

He has fought this fight single-handed, but he should not singly bear the loss. The friends of Liberty should certainly indemnify in this life those who are suffering for her sake. T. B. WAKEMAN.

The Truth Seeker Essayist Corroborated.

Tacitus did not write about Nero's persecution of Christians. Robert Taylor in 1829 proved that passage in the "Annals" to be spurious; and in 1878 another English scholar proved that the whole of the "Annals of Tacitus" was forged in the 15th century by a papal secretary. A summary of the evidence internal and external was given in THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 21, 1884, by ANTICHRIST, A.M.

Independence Day.

This issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER dates upon the anniversary of a memorable event—the signing of the Declaration of Independence. It is a good day to observe in a thoughtful manner, to study anew the Constitution of our country, which recognizes no king here or hereafter, and to ask ourselvs how far this government has been true to its fundamental principles.

This is the day our forefathers retired the ghosts from politics, and the Secularists are the only persons who can conscientiously celebrate that event. Those who expect to become subjects of a king in heaven deny their faith when they celebrate the establishment of a republic on earth. He who prays, "Thy kingdom come," invites a monarchy. Only those termed Infidels recognize and contend for the full meaning of the Declaration of American Independence. Others may celebrate it more demonstrativly; none so consistently with the principles which they profess.

Signs of the Times in Europe.

A religious paper of this city has summarized the movement now going on over nearly all Europe for the separation of church and state. The outlook is hopeful for the Secularists. In Scandinavia the movement is not only being pushed from without the church, but is receiving aid from within the fold itself. Various denominations hav sent their missionaries there to establish churches independent of and in opposition to the Established Church, and what is called a Free Church party has recently transferred its activity to politics and to the Parliament. In Sweden the Secularist movement, noted by us some time ago, is receiving the aid of one of the most prominent Christians of the country.

In Germany, the attack on the state church is made by all shades of politicians—orthodox, conservativ, and liberal. In Saxony the free Lutheran churches are opposing the state church, accusing it of apostasy—an old charge for one branch of Christians to make against another.

Before the overthrow of the Liberal party in England, Gladstone refused to bring up in Parliament the question of the disestablishment of the Episcopal church, but notwithstanding this there is no question that the Secularists are increasing fast in England. When the Soudan, Afghan, Irish coercion, and beer tax questions are out of the way, it may be that the government will turn their attention to separation of church and state. It seems an anomaly in a country supposed to be free that the opponents of Christianity should be systematically taxed by the state for its support.

But nowhere, we are told, are the ties that bind church and state so loose as in France. Only a few months ago the Parliament withdrew all state aid from the Catholic theological faculties. So powerful has the tendency toward Secularism become that Archbishop Guibert, of Bordeaux, in a recent pastoral letter, has issued a strong appeal for the relation now existing on the basis of the Concordat of 1802. After stating that he would hav no fears of the welfare of the church if the proposed separation would bring with it the independence enjoyed in America, he adds:

"But will the church really be free? Will she be free to receive the gifts and presents of the faithful? Will she be free to keep her temples, to celebrate her festivals, and hav her asylums for the protection of the priests? Would the church be free to choose her bishops and other servants? Would she be free in the management of her affairs and the fulfilment of her mission? We doubt it very much."

Probaby the archbishop would hav less ground for fear had his church in the past not been such a dangerous force in France, working unceasingly for the overthrow of the republican form of government and the restoration of the monarchy. The need for the suppression of the Jesuits was urgent because of their intrigues against the country and for their own aggrandizement. The freedom that Archbishop Guibert would like is the freedom for his church to be practically a traitor, and it may be doubtful if the government would care to allow this repetition of former experiences with Catholicism.

Secularism means perfect independence in religious affairs, and those of the faithful who wish to present their worldly wealth to the church ought to be allowed the blessed privilege. But it cannot in reason be asked that the thousands of churches, asylums, monasteries, and nunneries shall be so exempt from taxation as to allow of a dangerous accumulation of riches, as has been repeatedly done in the past, and as we see over the Canadian border in Montreal to-day. The church in France has so long controled the state, and is possessed of so much power, that it will be the part of broad statesmanship to erect legal barriers to prevent her regaining the ascendancy. Republican France is becoming anti-Catholic France, and the evidences are that it is fast becoming secular France. When once out of Catholicism the people accept no half-way religion, and Protestantism, therefore, has but a very slight foothold in the third republic.

Women May Vote in New York.

Dr. Clemence S. Lozier, chairman of the New York state Committee of the Woman Suffrage Party, has forwarded us a circular to the effect that a very curious discovery has been made, which concerns the rights of over a million people—of every woman in New York state. A legal work has lately been published, entitled, "Cases of the Legislature's Power over Suffrage," by Hamilton Willcox, M.S., LL.B. The author has laboriously examined the legislation and history of New York for the two hundred and fifty years of its existence (as colony, province, and state), as well as the state constitution, and common law for many centuries, and has thrown light on the constitutional law of this disputed point by the information he has dug out and arranged. It has of late years been taken for granted that the legislature has no power over suffrage, and that the constitution settles who shall and shall not vote, as that of Massachusetts does; but this work points out that in New York such is not the case, and adduces many instances wherein the legislature has not only extended suffrage but curtailed it. The constitution, it is shown, secures suffrage to the persons whom it names; it is the legislature which has forbidden others to vote.

The curious discovery referred to is this: In the researches made by the author of the "Cases," he claims to hav found that the portion of the General Election law, passed in 1842, which prevented women from voting, has been repealed, and that there is now no law left to prevent a woman from voting who takes the oath required of a challenged person, or who can truthfully take it; nor any law to punish her or the inspectors of election. The sole statutory provision which could be thought to warrant punishing her is that which imposes a penalty for "knowingly voting without being qualified according to the laws," and the laws now do not prescribe sex as a qualification, but this provision, it is pointed out, applies only to persons who vote in districts where they do not liv, or who are not American citizens, or are under the required age; and who by fraud, or by collusion with corrupt inspectors, vote without being challenged and thus escape the penalties for false swearing. The qualifications required by the law for voting are specified only in the oath which a challenged person must take; and masculinity is not one of these. The right of women, recognized for ages by the common law, and guarded by the state constitution, to vote on the same terms with their brothers, the author holds, has thus now no legal obstruction to its exercise. The inspectors of election throughout the state are advised to take the votes of women who hav the qualifications mentioned in the oath; and every woman in the state who has these qualifications is asked to offer her vote at the next election, and take the oath if necessary. Mr. Willcox offers to furnish all needful information and instructions to any woman or election officer.

The right to vote is a privilege often altogether barren of benefits to the voter, but if woman desires to exercise it, she should certainly be allowed to do so. There is no reason in equity why she should not; and if it has been shown that there is none in law, and if the woman suffragists hav the courage of their convictions, which doubtless they hav, we may expect some interesting developments at the next election in New York.

Is a Divorce Wanted?

The last issue of the Banner of Light has this:

"It is time Spiritualism obtained a full and absolute divorce from what is miscalled Liberalism, says the Spiritual Offering—and we hav about come to the same conclusion. Spiritualists offered them the right hand of fellowship in opposing bigotry and superstition, but they hav of late ignored it by traducing our mediums in public, in private, and in the columns of their newspapers, and calling us all delusionists! This is a quality of Liberalism we do not understand. No wonder the Offering wants the two divorced."

We are sorry to see this in our Boston contemporary, but we presume it will not make much difference in the state of the two philosophies. Orthodox Spiritualists will continue to abuse the Materialists, and Liberal Spiritualists will continue to work for the enlightenment of the people. Liberalism is not particularly Materialistic any more than it is Spiritualistic. As to traducing mediums, people hav the right to say what they think of the performances of the public characters who pose in the place of priests as a means of communication between this world and the next. There is nothing in the calling of a medium that places him beyond criticism. And, besides, were the space compared that Liberal papers hav given to the discussion of Spiritualism, we think the columns in favor of it would equal at least those opposed.

A Pressing Need.

In most of our large cities there are public institutions known as dog-pounds. Here vagrant, unlicensed, or unmuzzled dogs are collected, through the efforts of officials called dog-catchers, and, unless claimed and redeemed by their owners, they are placed in a cage and sunk in the river. Great benefit has inured to the people in this way, and the death rate from hydrophobia has largely decreased.

In view of the salutary working of the dog-pound and dog-catching institution, it is rather singular that no one has suggested to our officials the passing of a city ordinance having in view the gathering in of the many vagrom, unlicensed, and unmuzzled preachers who infest our street-corners, parks, and wharves, to the great detriment of the populace. These preachers appear under various guises, to wit, revivalists, Salvation Army soldiers, boy preachers, Texas wonders, messengers of the covenant, etcetera. It is well known that wherever they appear, mental hydrophobia, in the form of religious insanity, crops out with startling and often disastrous results. Mr. Chris Dongel, an inoffensiv but unbelieving German, of Ohio, it will be remembered, but a short time ago came under the influence of one of these vagrom preachers. Mr. Dongel immediately exhibited symptoms of rabies in such unmeaning expressions as "Praise God," "Glory to Jesus," etc., and shortly thereafter struck the minister a violent blow on the head with a large club. For this absurd conduct he was placed in an asylum. It is plain to be seen that if the preacher, when found at large unmuzzled, had been captured and caged in a pound for such purpose made and by law provided, Mr. Dongel might not hav fallen from the desirable position of an unbeliever.

The people of Boston must feel the need of such an institution as we hav suggested. In order to preserve the sanctity of the Sabbath, the constable of that berg was called upon to arrest, collar, run in, and otherwise deter several vagrom preachers from occupying the public common for the purpose of inoculating the Bostonian with their special virus.

In Nashville, Tenn., just now, sanitary measures similar to this are becoming an absolute necessity. An unlicensed and unmuzzled revivalist named Sam Jones is loose in its streets; lunatics, suicides, and illegitimacy are prevalent, believed to be caused thereby, and there is not a pound for preachers in the state. Something should be done at once.

Here in New York the proper meat for the crank catcher is the Salvation Army soldier. On a recent evening, as the audience were leaving the Bijou Opera House, they were confronted by this sort of warrior in the person of James Neil, who carried a banner bearing these startling words:

"What are you living for?
Is it the wages of sin!!!
Or death in the Lake of Fire!!!
Or the glory of the God Eternal!!!"

The crank-catcher who should omit to impound Mr. Neil might well be disciplined for neglecting his duty.

Of course it is not necessary that vagrom, unmuzzled, and unlicensed preachers should be drowned, though such a course could hav but one result, and that a beneficial one. Until claimed and redeemed by responsible persons, they might be set at inflating balloons, working the wind-pumps on canal-boats, or at any other calling where their great blowing powers could be utilized.

We commend this suggestion to all aldermen for immediate action. The heated term is upon us, and the regular pastors being out of town, the vagrom preacher claims unusual attention. Shall he be lassoed and rendered innocuous? The industry thus created would furnish employment for large numbers of activ laborers who now eat the bread of idleness.

The Modern Balaam.

Quite a number hav written for prices in quantities of the picture published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. We hav therefore had a large number printed on calendered paper, as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we will send, postage free, at the following rates: one dozen, 30 cents; one hundred, $1 50; one thousand, $10. We hope a large number will be ordered, and posted up everywhere, as those who hav written about it say the cut speaks volumes.

Editorial Notes.

THE Altruist says that the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL "is a prize to all who get it." The Altruist seems to know good books.

THE Anaheim weekly Gazette remarks that the substitution of sheol for the more familiar designation of the under-world is a sheol of a change.

FROM the Melbourne Liberator, we learn that George Chainey contemplates a visit to Australia, and Mr. Terry, of that city, is soliciting subscriptions to guarantee him against loss.

THE Aurora, a Catholic journal, published in Antigonish, N. S., has been obliged to suspend because out of twenty-four hundred subscribers, fifteen hundred were in arrears "for one, two or three years," and some since 1881, the date when the paper was established.

WRITING of the Hugo obsequies, a correspondent of the Evening Post reports that Freemasons of France, who hav made themselvs famous by removing "God" from their ritual, made a gigantic demonstration, while "as for the Freethinkers, there were so many societies that one could not dream of counting them."

THE general indecency of Christians in their references to Freethinkers, says Mrs. Besant, in the National Reformer, is very marked in connection with Victor Hugo's funeral. The Church Times heads a letter, "The Exit of Victor Hugo," and in a leading article speaks of the "mob of Atheistic roughs" who did not make "the apprehended riot" at his funeral. Never was there a worse-mannered religion than the religion of the Christian Church.

"THE doctrin of evolution," said Mr. Beecher last Sunday, "at first sight seems to destroy the fact of intelligent design in creation; for a long time it seemed to be shaken from its basis. It is being restored in a larger and grander way. Evolution only places it upon a wider plane, and makes the outcome more wonderful." That sounds very fine, but it is only a striving after wind. There is no plane so wide and wonderful that upon its surface two and two make five.

A CLERGYMAN of the church of England, at a recent meeting presided over by the bishop of Durham, said that "there is more Infidelity and skepticism among the upper than among the lower classes." Quoting this, the Sun of this city says: "It is true that modern Infidelity prevails rather among people of education than among the simple and unlettered. It is an intellectual skepticism, and takes hold most strongly of studious and critical minds—exists in colleges and theological seminaries rather than in workshops and on farms." This is what THE TRUTH SEEKER has said all along. Ignorant people are the very ones among whom Christianity—or indeed any supernatural religion—most largely obtains. And it seems also to be equally true that the more "orthodox" a community is, the denser is the ignorance of the people.

THE ministers in the vicinity of Central Park are running opposition to the band that plays there Sunday afternoons. One dominie advertises as follows:

VISITORS TO CENTRAL PARK WILL FIND REST and welcome at the Baptist Church of the Epiphany, 64th st. and Madison ave., Sunday from 5 to 6 P. M. Grand organ music. Lively song service. Short sermon. Free seats. No collection.

Something should hav been inserted in the above advertisment to show whether the performance is a "sacred" or a secular one. It is probable that few people will care to patronize the church of the Epiphany when they can get in the park all that the church offers without the disadvantage of being wearied even by a "short sermon."

PHOTIUS FISK has presented the Paine Memorial Corporation with a collection of rare paintings and engravings, natural curiosities, and works of art. "The intrinsic value of this collection is very great," says the Investigator, "but what renders it of special worth to the Liberal public is its association with the life of one we hav all learned to venerate for his boundless philanthropy." Mr. Fisk not long ago gave $1,000 to the same corporation to be applied to carrying on Liberal meetings.

WE hav received a new and expanded edition of Seward Mitchell's "Important Truths, Preparing the Way for Coming Generations." It is, he explains in a private letter, more crazy than the former edition. The "Important Truths" are made up of a statement of Mr. Mitchell's own principles, which he practically carries out in his every-day life, and clippings from other people's principles. Mr. Mitchell is anti-everything but spirits, and makes it plainly apparent in his little paper, which, on the whole, is bright reading. He has expanded the price to ten cents, and his address is Newport, Maine.

The Catholic Universe says that Virginia, down to the time of the Revolution, "crowded her statute book with penal laws whose depths of infamy can be imagined when we find that, in the Old Dominion, no Catholic could be a witness in any case, civil or criminal, so that a murder or other atrocious crime might be committed with impunity in the presence of a hundred Catholics, as not one of them could enter the witness-box to testify against the guilty!" The Universe is righteously indignant at this bigotry on the part of the early settlers, but we hav looked in vain through its columns for a condemnation of the laws on several of our state statute books which rule Atheists out of court.

CONCERNING the Revised Version, Moncure Conway remarks: "The recent translators hav not ventured to handle some errors of the old translation, but others they hav preserved simply because the age has not generally attained the religious elevation required for their elimination. Thus the revisers hav continued the confusion of the names translated God and Lord—Elohim, Eloah, Jahve (Jehovah)—as if they all represented one deity or one conception. Really, it is as if a writer on Greek and Roman religion should lump together Zeus, Jupiter, Herakles, Apollo, and the rest, as 'God.' Under those several names in the Bible different deities are hid, and they represent an evolution through many ages."

THE more enlightened of the ministers of the country are falling into line behind Beecher. The Rev. H. W. Thomas, of Chicago, has written a letter in which, among other things, he says: "It seems evident that if religious belief is to be vital—is to be anything more than an indifferent assent to what neither the reason nor the heart can believe—there must be some restatement of the hitherto dark problems of the government of God, and the destiny of the race. Nor does it seem possible for thoughtful minds to any longer accept the old views of the verbal or equal and plenary inspiration of all parts of the Bible. And there seems to be a duty laid upon this age—the duty of making lighter the burdens of belief and making plain and more rational the way of faith."

A REMARKABLE instance of prayer-answering, which the religious papers are not making so much capital out of as they might, has recently occurred in Kentucky. Sam. F. Spencer, a poor lawyer of Greensburg, Ky.—so poor a lawyer, indeed, that he could not make his living by his profession—but a good Christian, on April 4th last purchased a ticket in a Louisiana state lottery, and prayed specially, particularly, and fervently that it might draw a prize. When the drawing came off, Mr. Spencer found that he had won $75,000. He regards it as a direct providence of God, and has written the lottery dealers to that effect, and they publish his letter under the head of "Prayer Answered," as an advertisment of their business. God is, therefore, in partnership with gamblers. This, it seems to us, is carrying enterprise farther than is consistent with good morals.

THE New York World has raised nearly $90,000 by popular subscription to go toward providing a pedestal for the statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," presented to this country by the people of France. The object is a commendable one, and the World's enterprise in working for it is equally deserving of praise. But the World has done better. It has provided a playground at Shady Side, near the New Jersey shore of the Hudson, to which boys can go on Sunday or any other day and play ball without fear of molestation by the police. The fare for the excursion by steamer is but ten cents. It is amusing to see some of the religious papers commending the World's enterprise in "raising the money for the completion of the pedestal," and at the same time denouncing its "enterprise" in giving the boys a playground. Everybody knows, or ought to know, that boys hav the same right to play on Sunday that the trees hav to grow on that day. These religious editors do not seem to realize the full significance of a statue of Liberty.

IN Dr. Buckley's reminiscences of the late La Roy Sunderland, recently copied into this paper, it will be remembered that he referred Mr. Sunderland's Freethinking tendencies, which led him from Methodism to "Infidelity," mainly to his association with Wendell Phillips and other antislavery advocates. Dr. Johnson now comes forward to repel what he calls the "false charge" that these men were not Christians. On the contrary, they were, he says, not only Christians, but led others to that faith! It will probably be news to the Hon. Elizur Wright and Parker Pillsbury, especially mentioned by Dr. Johnson, to learn that they are orthodox Christians and worshipers in a Christian church. We leave it to Dr. Buckley to substantiate his own statement, which he has promised to do. We agree with Dr. Johnson in one thing. This is when he says: "It may be all right to call Mr. Sunderland a blasphemer; but the verses which the writer in the Christian Advocate quotes in support of the charge are not more irreverent toward God, nor more shocking to the moral sense, than the words of Bishop Hedding: 'The right to hold a slave is founded on the rule: "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets."' Remember, this was said of the right to hold a slave under the system of American slavery, which Wesley declared to be 'the vilest that ever saw the sun.' In respect of profanity the bishop bears away the palm."

THE Christian Advocate fell in line with the meanest of our American press, and two weeks ago published against the town of Liberal, Mo., the slanders which originated with the Rev. Clark Braden. There was some excuse for the other papers publishing these slanders, but with the Advocate there could be none. It had already been apprised through THE TRUTH SEEKER that they were false. Certain pressure having been brought to bear upon the editor of the Advocate, he now makes this statement:

"In our Religious Department appeared a quotation concerning the terrible condition of the town of Liberal, in Missouri, a place founded by Infidels, and for the most part occupied by them. The sub-editor did not admit it until it had appeared, in one form or another, in most of the leading papers of the country. The people of the town are greatly excited by the charges made. They hav also published a long list of letters, one signed by a woman, who declares herself to be a member of the Methodist church; another by a farmer, who livs a mile from there, who claims to be a member of a church; another by an alleged minister of the Free-Will Baptist Church; another from the treasurer of the county; another by the circuit clerk, deputy sheriff, sheriff, and recorder of deeds. These all testify, 'that, taking out their Infidelity, they are as worthy of respect for morality and virtue as any other class of people.' We hav not time to go out there to examin the matter, and, having published the quotation in the Religious Department, we giv the above summary of the defense put forth by the people of Liberal."

In view of the fact that the editor had the same data before him when he published the slanders that he had when he retracted them, it is difficult to understand why he should hav printed them at all. Perhaps with some Methodists a lie is as good as a truth, without the usual proviso that it shall be well stuck to.

Lectures and Meetings.

OF Helen H. Gardener's recent lecture in Philadelphia, Prof. Wm. Seymour, president of the Pennsylvania State League, writes: "Dear Sir: Permit me a small space in the columns of your valuable paper to offer a few words in favor of Miss Helen Gardener, who lectured before the Friendship Liberal League in this city on Sunday, May 30th. I looked over the columns of several of our dailies on June 1st in hopes of finding (if only short) a somewhat truthful report of the circumstances attending the lecture, as well as the lecture itself, but in vain I search for such a favor to our noble cause. Yesterday my attention was called to the fact that in the Times of this city, on the aforesaid date, a brief, sarcastic, and contemptible report was made, in which the reporter's description of personalities shows an attempt at wit, coupled with ignorance and falsehood. The lecture was well received by an audience who know how to appreciate intelligence and merit. Miss Gardener is a pleasant speaker, and has a fascinating style of delivery. Her matter is full of sound sense, and I hav no hesitation in recommending to every intelligent body of Liberals who feel the need of culture, reason, and truthfulness combined in a speaker, Miss Helen Gardener."

THE Albany Evening Journal gave the Liberals of that place the following good notice of their recent picnic and meeting: "The annual picnic of the Albany Liberal Association and the Troy Secular Society took place upon the farm of Mr. J. McCabe, situated about two miles beyond West Albany, yesterday. Seventy-five members attended from Albany and forty from Troy. In the evening Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the National Liberal League, lectured on 'The Demands of Humanity,' at the Liberal Association Hall, 69 North Pearl street. He said humanity is the word now, whereas all our duties used to be summed up in the word God. We hav thrown aside the supernatural and believe in nature, the grandest form of which is humanity. The lecturer said: 'I wish to see less worship and more recognition of duties to our neighbors. I claim the right to decide what is right and what is wrong without reference to an infallible book freighted with barbarities and manipulated by an infallible church. I find Christians more eager to be saved by their faith than their generosity, which conduct contrasts strongly with the teaching "Sell all and giv to the poor." The church property being exempt from taxation, is a symbol of injustice. Secularists believe in a progressiv morality and being as good on week days as on Sundays.' The lecturer closed his remarks with the recitation of his Agnostic poem entitled, 'Why Don't He Lend a Hand?' It was announced that the convention to be held in this city in September would be attended by delegates from the branches of the National Liberal League and that the committee would do everything to guarantee that it should be the most notable Liberal convention on record."

A Tardy Admission.

Withal, Thomas Paine, by his pamphlets signed "Common Sense," and his treatis on the "Rights of Man," was of great service to this country.—Christian Advocate.

Comstock Still at It.

As advertised, Anthony Comstock delivered a temperance lecture at the First church, in this place, Sunday evening. It was certainly not a temperate lecture, for, after discussing his main theme, Mr. Comstock branched off into a tirade against Infidels and blasphemers, forgetful of the fact that in India, Japan, and many other countries, he would be esteemed as much of a blasphemer and Infidel as he esteems those here who do not believe as he does. In classing Liberal people as the friends of impurity and intemperance, he went too far, and only betrayed the same indiscretion of utterance which has marked his speech and actions elsewhere.—Northampton (Mass.) Journal.

Letters from Friends.

FRUITS OF THEOLOGY.

ATLANTA, GA.

MR. EDITOR: At a recent exhibition of the "Georgia Wonder," Miss Lulu Hurst, in De Gives's Opera House in this city, the following scene occurred, showing the perversity and depravity of the human intellect from the study of and belief in the "inspired word."

After her introduction to the audience, a number of gentlemen responded to an invitation by the manager, Mr. Paul Atkinson, to come upon the stage and test Miss Lulu's powers, amongst whom was a rather uncouth gentleman in appearance, attired in blue flannel shirt, with pantaloons in boots, etc., a horse-trainer from Kentucky named W. N. Webster. As he ascended the stage voices from the gallery called out, "Boots! boots! boots!" Turning toward the audience with a courteous bow and wave of the hand, he took his seat amid exciting cheers and laughter. After various tests of Miss Hurst's wonderful power and skill by gentlemen on the stage, "Boots" was called for. The curious Kentuckian arose with an air of dignity and gentlemanly bearing, showing that he was not a stranger to the situation, while an acute and observing intellect revealed itself from beneath his homespun garb. The chair which had just frisked so glibly about with his stalwart predecessor he held for a moment with a firm grasp. Presently a gentle move, a jerk to one side, a violent bobbing up and down, caused him to rise to his feet, and turning toward the audience said: "Gentlemen and ladies—or, ladies and gentlemen, as I should hav said [applause]—I came up here for your merriment. I profess to know something about this power, and I tell you there's not a man on earth who can hold that chair," and took his seat amid great applause.

Dr. Catching and Officer Reed next tried the test, with the fate common to all.

Then followed the exciting scene referred to. Suddenly a young lady in the audience arose, and in an excited manner exclaimed, "Woman shall not rule the world; that is man's province, and woman shall not rule the world." All eyes were at once turned toward the lady who had given utterance to such strange words, who was Miss Zella Graves, a sister of Rev. Z. B. Graves, of this city. For a time she was completely unbalanced, and thoroughly incensed at Miss Hurst for overpowering a half-dozen strong and powerful men. She repeated, "Woman shall not rule the world; let me go to her," attempting at the same time to gain the middle aisle leading to the stage. "Sit down, my sister; O my sister, sit down and be quiet!" said a gentleman by her side. "I will not sit down," said she; "I will go to Lulu Hurst. A woman shall not prevail."

By this time she had succeeded in getting into the aisle, and pulling away from her friend, went hurriedly in the direction of the stage. The wildest excitement prevailed. Upon reaching the foot of the stage an attempt was made to enter the door leading from the parquette to the rear of the stage, but the door was closed and she was prevented from so doing. Tearing away from those around her, she raised herself upon a chair, and made an effort to climb over the footlights on to the stage.

Just at this juncture a voice cried out, "Lulu Hurst has been taken away." This had a quieting effect, and with patient coaxing she was led from the hall, placed in a carriage, and driven to her home at the corner of Chamberlain and Younge streets. It was feared by many that if she had gained the stage before Miss Hurst was taken off, she would hav suffered violence at her hands.

Thus we hav another example of the baneful effects of a "well grounded faith" in divine (?) revelation. The idea that poor, insignificant woman should rule or control man, so obnoxious to the sacred belief of Miss Graves in God's holy word, was preposterous, and such an outrage upon divinity couldn't be tolerated. So thoroughly rooted and grounded was she in gospel belief that woman should be in subjection to man, and should not teach or usurp authority, that she believed this blasphemous act of Miss Lulu's too bold and defiant to go unrebuked, and that punishment should be meted out to her now as well as in the hereafter. Poor, deluded, demented woman, otherwise smart and intellectual, like crazy Guiteau, Freeman & Co., she felt in duty bound to prove her faith by her works, even at the cost of respectability to herself, and violence to Miss Hurst.

The great frequency of such demonstrations of religious frenzy forces us to the inevitable conclusion that they are simply the legitimate fruits of an earnest, honest study of the Bible. Will Christians, as a whole, ever come to see and realize this fact?

J. S. LYON.

WEST UNION, IOWA, June 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find five dollars to apply as directed. I am pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav past the sixty-seventh year on the journey of life. More than fifty years of that time I hav been paying to the church from one dollar to more than one hundred dollars a year. January 23, 1883, I closed my account with the church. I inclose canceled check as evidence. I was taught from my youth to lay up my treasures where moth and rust would not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal. Ye gods! what a mistake in the place of deposit! When I began looking after my treasures I found to my sorrow they had gone to fatten an itinerant priesthood. I am reminded by the brethren that hell will be hot for me. Well, according to the new version, sheol will be an improvement on the old hell; and judging from the company the priests send there I am satisfied I will like the place. I hav not for years taken stock in the three gods in one nor one in three. I am satisfied that if Joseph was not Christ's father some priest had been near Joseph's ranch. I hav lived here in this town more than thirty years, and here I expect to remain while I liv. We hav nine Christian organizations; seven churches with seating capacity for more than 3,500 people, while we hav less than 2,000 population. We are well supplied with salvation machinery, yet two-thirds of the business men are Freethinkers. The church is almost entirely sustained by the women. I wish some Freethought lecturer would come here. This is a place worth working up.

J. N. BREWER.

WORCESTER COUNTY, MASS., June 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hardly understand why the New England Society should wish to perpetuate the memory of the Mayflower on Manhattan Island by erecting the mark of the beast in Central Park in the shape of the statue of Mr. Ward's "Pilgrim." As a work of art, it seems unnecessary; you will find its counterpart in every New England cornfield, for frightening crows, the province of which is to serve as a roosting-place for this bird to watch the sprouting of that esculent previous to gobbling it. You are sure to find him perched on the highest pinnacle of the image the moment the farmer's back is turned. Though he may fear the farmer, he knows the effigy is as harmless as the statue at Central Park.

This statue brings to our mind a historical fact, that the Mayflower was chartered for Manhattan Island, but the good old Dutchmen, with pleadings, money, and schnapps, bribed the captain of the Mayflower to land at Cape Cod, in the following words, "Now, if you blease, vere ish you going to take dem Roundheads, mine goot capten?" "To Manhattan Island, North America," was the reply. "Mine Got! dis ish as bad as never was. Come to mine house; I make you one bresend dis night." In the evening, over the schnapps, he beguiled the honest mariner to steer his bark clear of Manhattan, saying, "I planted the colony on Manhattan; it is peaceful and happy. Wherever these Puritans go, they quarrel." This settled the destiny of the Mayflower. They were landed on the shores of Cape Cod, and called it God's Providence. Soon they verified the words of the burgomaster. What Quakers and Baptists didn't run away they hung, and when nothing was left to quarrel about they fell to hanging each other for being witches.

As the Indian fled before the Puritan in New England, so is the Puritan fleeing before the French Canadian. As the Knickerbockers of New York are becoming numerically small, so are the Italians and Chinamen becoming numerically large; and the pedestal will hav the same relation to Americans in the practical future as the block of stone imported from the shores of the Mediterranean. Socrates, Burns, and Goldsmith needed no monument—they lived for humanity. I versify:

'Twas morn, the winds were blowing high,
The forest trees were rocking,
The birds flew frightened from the sky—
It hailed and snowed most shocking.

'Twas then a ship from Albion came,
With godly folks well freighted,
And each one had a scripture name,
As history hath related.

Ay, there was many a holy man
From land of Tam O'Shanter,
Both fighting Whig and Puritan
And crop-eared Covenanter.

They sang "Old Hundred" on the sea,
The fishes heard the racket,
And wondered what the noise could be,
And who was in the packet.

They sang "Old Hundred;" on the wave
Their nasal tones resounded,
Because the Lord their bark did save,
And none of them got drownded.

They landed close to Bunker Hill;
No monument was there seen,
Nor navy yard, nor shop, nor mill,
Nor Medford rum, nor pea-bean.

They landed all their goods and trunks,
Their corn, their beef, and taters,
And pork all salted down in junks,
To prop their carnal natur's.

They landed shingles, boards, and nails,
And leather for shoemakers,
And pots and pans and tubs and pails,
And ropes for hanging Quakers.

They landed powder, ball, and gun;
This was the sine qua non
With which they made the heathen run,
As Joshua did in Canaan.

They felled of trees a countless host,
With saws they did divide them;
They reared a church and whipping-post,
And gallows close beside them.

Sons of Confucius, Ham, or Jew,
Had you been on Cape Cod, sir,
When this apostate, canting crew
Lit on that barren soil, sir,

You had been greatly horrified,
The way they'd clipped your queue, sir,
That heaven might be glorified
Through Beelzebub and you, sir.

FREETHINKERS DON'T PLAY CHECKERS.

GRAFTON ST., HALIFAX, N. S., June 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Last October I proposed in THE TRUTH SEEKER to play a match at checkers by correspondence with any of its numerous readers.

To this I received only one response, and that was from a young girl in Michigan. We hav just finished a match of ten games, during which we had some very pleasant chats and friendly interchange of opinions, etc. I hav to record a defeat in this match, the young lady winning three, I winning two, and five drawn. Thus two of THE TRUTH SEEKER's large congregation, though 1,500 miles apart, became closer friends than had they simply remained readers of that fearless advocate of universal mental liberty. This encounter goes to prove that if a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind, two cement the kindness into friendship. In conclusion, let me say I will be most happy to hear from other truth-seeking checkerists, if there be any amongst the many readers of our grand journal.

Yours for recreation as well as study,

WILLIAM FORSYTH.

ONEIDA, N. Y., June 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosure, for which please send to my address one dozen copies of "Modern Balaam." I want them to send to some orthodox friends. It is the most appropriate illustration I hav seen. I would like to be able to scatter thousands of them around the country. One of my neighbors, an artist, is going to paint one for me 22x36. It will be a good size to frame and hang up in the parlor. Mr. Canfield, a friend of mine, a machinist, saw the "Modern Balaam." He said it was the best illustration that he ever saw. He thinks of having one painted. Mr. Canfield has invented a new plan for doing his praying. He said he wrote his prayer on a piece of paper and tacked it on the head of his bed, and when he is about to retire he calls God's attention to it, and informs the old gentleman that it is his (Canfield's) sentiments, and then asks him to read it at his leisure. Mr. Canfield likes his plan very much. He considers it quite a saving of time, and a good thing to be adopted by all Christians.

G. BEEBEE.

NEWARK, N. J., June 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Since my former communication on the relative claims of Atheism and Agnosticism, I hav listened with interest and delight to two lectures here on evolution by Mr. Wakeman, which enlightened me upon the advancement in physical science, and modified my views upon modern Atheistical Agnosticism, which Mr. Wakeman represents; but the conviction remains that within the entire compass of religious controversary nothing is defensible but absolute Atheism, which, after careful examination into every subject relating to primary causes in nature, sweeps away every shred and fragment of belief in the supernatural, and leaves nature supreme and eternal. It is presumption in me, perhaps, to thus criticise Mr. Wakeman's Agnostic opinions, but it seems to me he has a weakness for the worship of the unknown. In his inquiries into the occult causes in nature, he pursues his investigations through facts in science, and by induction traces cause and effect through the whole course of known phenomena in nature to the very verge of the unknowable, without the necessity of once referring to any supernatural cause, and when this point is reached he pauses, and, in pious devotion, intimates, like Herbert Spencer, that beyond the circumference of present knowledge is God, and imitates the savage by raising an altar to worship the unknown cause of all causes, himself uncaused. This is precisely where all religions hav started. Where philosophy ends, religion, or the belief and worship of the supernatural, begins. This idea has been well expressed by Pope in his Pantheistic "Essay on Man," thus:

"Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind."

Again, to the reflectiv mind there can be no more interesting study than the philosophical search into the origin of animated existence, and the reproduction of our race. Science, with the aid of art, has been able to follow the intricate and wonderful process to an almost infinitesimal speck, the protoplasm, which, "small as it is," says Sir John Lubbock, "contains, latent, the characteristics and destiny of the future being, whether it be that of a jelly-fish or a man."

Even in nature, whose marvels abound everywhere, there is nothing that excites our surprise and admiration more than the knowledge that from this tiny germ, by the simple process of nature, the simple yet perfect organization of the human anatomy is in due time and under proper conditions developed, having the highest known function of matter, thought, or intellect, giving man pre-eminence above all other of nature's productions.

Still, man, good as he is in capacity and attainments, is but the creature of this incomprehensible whole called nature, puny and feeble compared to some of her other works, yet, like them, at death dissolves into the original elements which composed his body, and is no more. In nature all is continual change, and in nothing does she seem to be more persistent and activ than in reproduction, yet is destitute of the least sentiment, and destroys her most skilled productions without pity or remorse. Creation, conservation, and dissolution proceed from necessity in uninterrupted succession. "Nought may endure but mutability."

Having a great dislike to religious worship, I think it not wise of Mr. Wakeman to abjure the worship of divinity, and set up that of humanity. Let us be sensible, and cast away all our idols, whether of gods, heroes, or men.

The highest morals men can attain to is to be just to one another. When justice pervades society, instead of narrow selfishness, the millennium will hav come; but so long as human nature is what it is, that will never be. Nor hav I any sympathy with Mr. Wakeman's ego, or the philosophical speculation and pantheistical vagaries of such deep and subtle thinkers as Bruno, Descartes, Spinoza, and the German school of philosophy. Maybe I am of too gross nature to appreciate the abstract reasoning of this class, who, like Bishop Berkeley, often reasoned away the material world, and propounded the "system of absolute idealism" in its place. If acceptable, I may say something on Theism and Pantheism again.

NEWARK.

ADRIAN, MICH., June 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading Lossing's life of General Garfield, and in it I find the following articles of faith as professed by the sect to which Garfield belonged—the Campbellite or Christian—and it is really a marvel to me how a man possessed of so much brain power as General Garfield undoubtedly had could for a single moment entertain such nonsensical ideas in regard to religious belief:

"1. We call ourselvs Christians or Disciples. 2. We believe in God the Father. 3. We believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of the living God, and our only savior; we regard the divinity of Christ as the fundamental truth in the Christian system. 4. We believe in the Holy Spirit, both as to its agency in conversion and as an indweller in the heart of the Christian. 5. We accept both the Old and the New Testament scriptures as the inspired word of God. 6. We believe in the future punishment of the wicked and the future reward of the righteous. 7. We believe that deity is a prayer hearing and prayer answering God. 8 We observe the institution of the Lord's Supper on every Lord's day—to this table it is our practice neither to invite nor debar. We say it is the Lord's Supper for all the Lord's children. 9. We plead for the Union of all God's people on the Bible and the Bible alone. 10. The Bible is our only creed. 11. We maintain that all the ordinances of the Gospel should be observed as they were in the days of the Apostles."

Such is the creed as professed and believed by a man who has occupied the high and honored position of chief magistrate of this free and enlightened republic, and that in the last quarter of the nineteenth century of Christianity. When such as he can subscribe to a creed like this, can we wonder that so many millions of the human race are blinded and deluded? But it is asserted on pretty good authority that General Garfield, during the last few years of his life, had almost entirely outgrown the superstitions of his early days. At all events, here is the creed laid down by his own biographer, and one which we hav every reason to know he once professed to believe and teach. Yours truly, P. B. REASONER.

TRENTON, TEXAS, June 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The eternal clock is pulsing The sea is moving with life; each comes to the surface, casts its worth, and goes back to pay its lovely debt. Animal life is so sweetly subservient and submissiv, imitating its great parent. Brain has not nor cannot invent what is already in full operation within man's own custis vera. Look along the telegraph poles, and see the world's nervous system. The universe is an organism and each planet is a sub. Each individual life is a product, and "like begets like." Thought is the result of this miniature organism, and reason is her congress of bioplasts. No thought, mind, spirit, ghost, or soul, all one, can exist without a food supply. Orthodoxy is a chain of ideas, beginning with primitiv man, always had and always will hav a food supply, and our nineteenth century link will be in the middle. That food supply is every little tributary of scientific research becoming popularized, and taking its place in the Milky Way.

In this orthodox command comes to us the history of the principles of right and wrong, sub-named Good and Bad, God and Devil, Virtue and Vice, Love and Hatred, Truth and Falsehood—all from the fact that things affected man pleasantly or unpleasantly, all essentially the same, and all look inward. The sinner made the sin; the righteous made the right; both made their joys and sorrows. The ancients were honest when they supposed they had a mind, and that the snake in the garden, whose poison fangs could produce the phenomena of disease (sin) and death, was inhabited by an evil deity (mind), perhaps the first glimpse ever caught of cause and effect. But later the seed of the woman should exchange bruise for bite; later a man should come to destroy the cause death; later its failure necessitated such falsehoods as the divinity of Christ, resurrection, judgment, miracles, the church, the conglomerate religious foolishness, and a thousand bushels of "cheat in the tailing."

Of Sin—Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for fear of this snake deity, or whatever may hav been its first meaning—man is constantly lashed with new meanings to make new means of sinning, while the original sin diminishes inversely as the square of its distance.

Our legislature is now inviting crime by exempting property from debt by legislating for self. Licensing improper uses makes honor and dishonor; sectionizing land made landsharks; lock and safe makers make lock and safe breakers, as fence makes fence breakers. Coining money has made gamblers, and an easy task for one man to walk off with another's house hid in a pocket ready prepared. Money makes an easy soil for growing Vanderbilts, Rothschilds, and railroads, and changed a herding into a mercantil government.

Man is morally carnivorous, in imitation of his parent, that is, every life is sustained by robbery, in one sense. All that man has done has fanned the flame that brought him from his ancient "dug-out," but he is no better. All is right, and wrong is a relativ thought; but alas! my looked-for improvement through Freethought force is a mirage as yet.

ANONYMOUS.

QUITMAN, GA., June 23, 1885.

"Can a man by searching find out God?"—Job.

MR. EDITOR: A gentleman, whose name it is unnecessary to mention, promised me to pay the expense of publication (not to exceed a V), if I would submit, or subject—as he himself expressed it—my views in regard to the so-called "Divine Existence" to public criticism, which I proceed to do without further ceremony—sans ceremonie—provided the sapient and urbane editor of the Quitman Free Press will consent to yield me space in the columns of his valuable and widely circulating journal so to do.

Now, it is quite evident to me, at least, that the onus probandi rest upon the Theist, who assumes what he ought to prove—that this world is an effect, and if an effect (that "if" is well put in), it must necessarily—ex necessitate rei—hav a cause, which is the quod erat demonstrandum—the very thing to be proved.

Of course, if the thing designed require a designer, much more will the designer himself require to be designed, as Colonel Ingersoll and others of that school hav time and time again said and so often demonstrated to the entire satisfaction of every unbiased inquirer after truth. Thus an infinit series of gods (and goddesses as well—if not, why not?) would be the necessary result—the logical and inevitable outcome—and like that "long-famed dove of old," we would hav to return at last to the spot from whence we started, "having toiled all night," so to speak, "and caught nothing" ("fisherman's luck, as usual," methinks I hear you exclaim)," in order to rest the spread-eagle pinions of our wild-goose imagination, now "wearied, wrung, and riven" by a too long, tedious, and fruitless soaring, voyage, or peregrination through the far-off, undiscovered realms of boundless space—the illimitable expanse of ether—"regions unknown to song," etc., or words to that effect.

Thus much premised, I next proceed
To giv you what I feel my creed;
And in what follows to portray
Some errors of the present day.

Job's question above is eminently suggestiv, not to say, equivalent to an outright negation, or a positiv denial of the "Divine Existence" in toto—tantamount to a prima facie acknowledgment of a non-sequitur, non-est-inventus, et cetera—provocativ of a derisiv smile (risus sardonicus) at the palpable folly of attempting to accomplish an impossibility—declarativ, in short, of the egregiousness of a feat or solution at once so preposterously absurd, so pre-eminently utopian, and so transcendently or extraordinarily superhuman withal. Selah.

But let us hav done with panoramic words and phantasmagorian sentences—with utopian ideas and hyperbolical hallucinations—mere "tinkling alliterations and resounding antitheses" (brutum fulmen et preterea nihil), and come down at once to hard-pan—to "bottom facts," so to speak—to the very bedrock of philosophic truth and scientific research and investigation.

Revenous a nous moutons. We repeat, Job's question above is eminently suggestiv, like many other passages of so-called "scripture;" as, for instance, in Ecclesiastes, where 'tis said, "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward [the then current belief of the common people, as it is to-day among that class throughout the civilized world] or the spirit of the brute that goeth downward to the earth?" or that other question propounded in the book of Job, "If a man die, shall he liv again?" (as was also currently believed by the riff-raff hoi polloi; ignobile, vulgus, rag-tag and bobtails, etc.)—questions evidently not requiring affirmativ answers, as no living man could then, or can now, be found competent to giv satisfactory replies thereto. And so, too, of the question under consideration—the implication being that it would be a work of supererogation to attempt even to "find out" what no man could ever hav known, or will ever be able to "find out," to wit: the existence of a Great First, or First Great Cause—the unverifiable reality of Herbert Spencer's "Great Unknowable," whose "footprints on the sands of time," if they were ever visible in any age or country, hav long since faded from the view of man—been obliterated from the face of the earth—forever disappeared from human observation, under the electric light and noonday glare of the nineteenth century—thanks to the illuminating rays of the glowing sun of science! It was an aphoristic saying of universal reception among philosophers ages ago, and will be just as true ages hence, as it is to-day (among our sapient savans),

"Whence we came and whither we go,
Is more than mortal man can know."

But we do know that all the lesser ghosts hav forever fled from human sight and ken—"faded from the view of man"—and that Great Big Ghost, which we are pleased to designate, dignify, or dubb with the soubriquet, title, or appellation of deity, must shortly follow, and will soon be numbered with the false and forgotten things of the never-returning past—relegated to the limbo of "non est inventus."

Yes, the gods and the ghosts hav fled, but, as Colonel Ingersoll says, "man is here," and he has come to stay (and "don't you forget it"), if so be that "the earth abideth forever," as recorded on the pages of so-called "holy writ."

Fearing least we might trespass upon your valuable space, Mr. Editor, we will conclude our remarks, for the nonce, in regard to the existence of deity, by appending the following pertinent lines of George E. Macdonald, culled from the columns of that sterling Freethought expositor, the New York TRUTH SEEKER:

We stand by the graves of the old-time gods,
Who sleep with their prophets and seer,
Whose crowns, and kingdoms, and scepters, and rods
Hav passed with the vanishing years;
And we know they are gone, and that even so,
Shall ours and the gods of our children go.

Yet man shall abide though the gods may be dead,
And he bury them one by one;
He shall witness the last of the Triple-Head,
The Father, and Spirit, and Son;
And shall cry, as his deities disappear:
"The gods hav departed, but I am here!"

We stand in the valley, or on the hill,
Or move by the rolling stream,
And we query, "All these, are they older still
Than the God of the prophet's dream?"
Vale, river, and mountain, as one, reply:
"Before Jehovah was am I."

Yes, "let the ghosts go," as Colonel Ingersoll ("our Bob") says, "we will worship them no more. Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands, and fade forever from the imaginations of men." A. J. OLIVER.

P.S.—Our paper here, the Free Press, is afraid to publish. What a misnomer—Free Press! forsooth! I therefore send my communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER. A. J. O.

TROY, N. Y., June 23, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The age of ignorance commenced with the reign of Christianity, and Christianity commenced with the age of ignorance. These two terms are synonymous; if we strike either of the two, both will fall. Thus, united they stand, united they fall. Liberal education is the ponderous trip-hammer that is crushing them to atoms. The Christians say their religion preserves a man, both body and soul, from hell-fire. But before they make this assertion, they should analyze this superlativ nonsense. They hav not the faintest idea of what the soul is, or of its properties, neither can they giv their hell any possible location on this whole earth. Thus it must exist in their imagination. I know nothing about soul, unless it is life; but they cannot burn life, which is a principle pervading all nature; life is something they cannot grasp. Of what use is the body anyway after life leaves it? Succession is the immutable law of nature, new forms or none is her motto. Can they produce again the body of their dear missionaries who hav been eaten by cannibals, and returned to earth to enrich it, and blossom forth again in the fragrant rose? How will they save the body of Roger Williams when, through the process of time and decay, the roots of trees had entirely absorbed him, and gave him again to earth in the shape of luscious apples? How will they produce the bodies of people who hav laid in earth for centuries, and hav entirely disappeared in grasses, rocks, and flowers, while they in their turn will appear in various forms of gases, liquids, coal, etc.? Oh, the study of nature is wonderful; there is no such thing as immortality; there is nothing added and nothing lost. Nature is continually producing the raw material, and men are continually devouring men. Not physical men, but men absorbed and compounded by old nature, through the force of centuries, into grasses, grains, fruit, trees, and also iron, coal, silver, gold, rocks, water, gases; from solid into liquid, and liquid in gaseous, then back again into solid; from mind (the result of brain) into matter, then back again into mind. Not for one second can all the clergy in the wide world stay the course of nature. S. D. JEFFERS.

CHILLICOTHE, O., June 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am much pleased to learn that there are several at least among the truth seekers who are decided Prohibitionists. In discussions with religious friends I hav frequently been confronted with the statement that all temperance work is being done by the church, and all outside the church are opposed to it. Although I did not believe this, I lacked proof to the contrary. I wish there were some way of finding out how many Liberals voted the Prohibition ticket last fall. It is often true that reformers confine themselvs exclusivly to one branch of reform, and perhaps Liberals hav, so far, found it needful to giv all their attention to theological matters, but now they are certainly far enough advanced to define their position on a subject so important as that of the temperance movement. I hav been a total abstainer for eight years, and hav certainly not been injured thereby. It has been a source of great satisfaction to me when discussing the subject with moderate-drinking church members (I am a Spiritualist) to be able to say that my religion forbids bad habits, or lending my example to help others in forming them. As the eyes of many uncharitable people are on us, I consider it a duty we owe to the cause we love to avoid every appearance of evil. EIDDA.

COLUMBUS, KAN., June 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I had just been mourning for my dear departed friend, La Roy Sunderland, and now I hav just opened THE TRUTH SEEKER to be shocked and pained at my loss and humanity's loss in the death of one of nature's best specimens of human worth and manhood, T. C. Leland. "How blessings brighten as they take their flight!"

I hav known Mr. Leland forty years by correspondence and through published articles, reports, and appeals in behalf of truth and humanity. I saw him in 1849 in New York when I was teaching phrenology and he phonography, and again in 1854. I, too (being two years older than he), lived in a cabin in New York, suffered hardship and deprivations, thrown upon the world at ten, and, like him, struggled, read everything, was my own teacher, became a Fourierite in 1840, read all the Fourierite literature, and lectured upon it, became a phonographer in 1846, in which I corresponded with my lamented friend. He once gave me a private sketch of his life, in many respects so much like my own. I wrote to a mutual friend a year ago that our dear brother ought to stop brain work and go into the country. He seldom wrote or said anything to which I did not respond, and through the mental telegraph I was ever in sympathy and rapport with his spirit, purposes, and aspirations.

Brow and face of love, wisdom, truth, science, hope, philanthropy, justice, goodness and humanity, hail and farewell.

J. H. COOK.

ELGIN, ILL., June 15, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Elgin is crowned at last. The Salvation Army arrived here yesterday, as per hand-bill inclosed. What cheek! to insult the intelligent citizens of Elgin or any other city with such stuff.

I attended their pow-wow in the afterneon. Five creatures in men's apparel were there, and two in the garb of women.

One old, bald-headed male, phrenologically a thief and liar, generally called a hard citizen, and a medium-sized male (I don't want to call any of them men), did most of the shouting. This poor fellow is a maniac; eyes deeply sunken; don't look long for this world. Another fellow looks as if he was hired to tell what a wicked sinner he was until the Salvation Army took him in. I believe that part of his story, but I should not like to trust him with much money yet. The opposit sex appear very God-forsaken, and don't look as if they knew enough to be very wicked. They did some praying and singing. One of the bipeds had a small tambourine, with bells on it, that he rung and beat with his hand, and tried to keep time to the music. If God was pleased with the performance, he is easily suited. In the evening they held forth in a hall. The first part of the performance was typical of Christianity. They passed round the box for a collection. After singing and praying came confessions. How terribly wicked they were! which no one doubted. They told us they had come to Elgin to stay. If God has any care for Elgin he will pass them along, I drew the attention of a good Methodist who was in the crowd to the hand-bill, and told him if I was a Christian I would certainly be ashamed of such a sheet as that He said perhaps it was a "little too thick." I thought it too thin. Uncle Sam would not enlist any of this crowd to fight his battle, and if God expects to win many to glory, he must get better soldiers in his army. J. W. ARCHIBALD.

June on the Prairies.

A rose bloomed at my window to-day,
A very queen, and her sweet, wild way
Was a mute appeal, a captiv strain
Mourning the lark's song sung in the rain,
Where roses awoke, mornings and noons,
The prairie fires of the early Junes.

Down in the grass with a yellow cup
A cactus lifting her strange leaves up
Broader, I'm sure, than your own white hand,
A pioneer on this border-land,
Bearing so proud in each thorny shield
The spears of a southern battle-field.

A low wild cherry—a western Mars—
Lights the golden flax-beli's silken stars;
Modest, yet brave, this volunteer
Plants the outpost of its new-born peer
'Neath wild peas, jack-o'-the-lantern wings,
And a thousand sweet and nameless things.

A dairy-maid's winding path is laid
Where the purple flowering milkweeds made
Their world of sweets, now floating afar
Through cool ravines where the bluebells are,
Where the sheep and cows are coming home,
And soon shall the bold coyotes* roam.

What an under-world of waving green,
And the prairie chickens in between;
Though the curling grass brief whiles ago
Made camping-ground for the buffalo,†
Leading the deer and her pretty fawn
And brown-eyed antelope farther on.

Some Children at Onset.

There are a number of children living in this summer resting-place by the sea, and perhaps you would like to hear, this afternoon, about the children in our neighborhood that we hav become acquainted with. There is Willie W——, who is, we think, the oldest of the children around this boulevard, and he is eleven. He is not very strong, but he is a good boy. He cannot swim, he says, but he can "dog-paddle" some, and he can play "jigs" on the piano-forte, two accomplishments that some boys do not possess.

Then there are Willie, Eliza, and Bertie Alexander, two brothers and one sister. Eliza is perhaps seven years old, Wille is older and Bertie younger than herself—"two outside and one inside," as Eliza expresses it, "and I'm the insider," said she. The two older ones go to the school that is in session here, and they are good scholars, too. Eliza tells that she is at the head of her class a good deal of the time, and has a mark for good conduct every day, and last Friday she received from her teacher a beautiful merit card, with a butterfly and roses on it. She brought it in and showed it to us with a great deal of pride. Eliza's mother makes beautiful tea-cakes, Yankee doughnuts, Parker house rolls, etc., and after school hours Eliza and Willie sell them to the neighbors, who are not so smart at cooking as Mrs. A. About five o'clock may be heard the patter of Eliza's little feet on the piazza, and her clear, musical voice rings out,

"Any cakes, bread, or rolls wanted for supper to-night."

One evening the sky was dark with heavy clouds that had wet in them, and there was a low rumble of thunder. "Aren't you afraid of the rain that is coming?" we asked.

"Nonsense, no. If it rains on me I'll get clean," said she.

We thought she was faultlessly clean already.

"But the tempest is coming."

"Who's afraid of thunder?" said she, laughing. "I hear it rumbling and rolling. I guess it will be a smasher—but I must get rid of these cakes and things. Good by," and away she ran to the next house, and every night, after she has disposed of her cakes, she plays with the other children.

Willie goes in one direction with his cakes and Eliza in another. Bertie sometimes goes with one of them. Eliza is very original, and a very sensible little lady. Some children might object to selling cakes, but Eliza views the matter in a very matter-of-fact light.

"What matter?" she says. "One must earn a living some way, and it is wise to be honest, and sell good cakes."

Flossie and Oscar Cassell are our nearest neighbors among the children. Flossie is seven years old or thereabouts, and Oscar is five. When he laughs he squints his eyes and they laugh also. He speaks pieces and sings, and so does Flossie. She sings the "Pretty Red Rose" very nicely, and she can play parts of tunes and the scale on the piano very well indeed.

Flossie has two kittens, a black-and-white, and a maltese-and-white. One she has given away, but her kitty, whose name is Pansy, she dresses up like a little girl and comes visiting with it sometimes. The kitty is quite young, but old enough to spit at Bonnie, who, dog-like, wishes to scrape acquaintance. Flossie's mother has a pretty boat that looks like a canoe. She takes the children rowing nearly every day. She can row nicely, and appears very handsome in her boating suit, with the oars over her shoulder, on her way to the shore with the children, herself seeming almost like a child. She knows where the water-lilies grow, and the wild strawberries and huckleberries, and is well acquainted with all the country round about.

Dora B. has lately come in the neighborhood, and is not intending to stay long this time, but may come again.

One day she waded in the water, but was very much afraid the tide would run up and catch her shoes and stockings and carry them to sea.

Dora says she does not mean to learn much about working, because her grandmother killed herself with hard work, and when she dies she wants to die a natural death!

On the shore there is a monster of a rock, and, as it resembles an elephant lying down, or we think it does, it has been christened Jumbo. The children climb to the very top of this rock, and hav grand times playing there. They take solid comfort, barefooted and bareheaded, running in the water and out again, and, at the same time, they are getting a stock of good health that will last them a lifetime. With a hook and line they can catch small blue fish and little eels, while sitting on the rock, which is close to the water's edge, and along shore they can dig clams, quahaugs, and frequently pick up oysters; besides, it is always fun to watch the fiddlers dive into their holes and up again. Wild flowers grow under the bluff, too, and the bushes are full of—what do you think?—wood-ticks! And should one get on you, it sticks. One day Oscar went to the barber's to hav his hair cut, and there was a little tick burrowing in his head! The barber picked it out and Oscar will be careful how he nestles his little head among the bushes after this.

These children know nothing of care or sorrow, but are as happy as happy can be all day long. May it be long ere sorrow or sadness will visit them, and may their days be as bright and joyous as the sunshine of this summer afternoon.

Sometime we will talk more of these and other children at Onset. S. H. W.

Egyptian Superstition.

There is no department of THE TRUTH SEEKER I take so much delight in reading or recommending to my young friends as the Children's Corner. It makes me feel that I am a child again, and on the arrival of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I always, first of all, turn to the Corner, and partake, in company with the little ones, of the intellectual feasts Miss Wixon so kindly favors us with. Having never seen anything of the kind in the children's department, or, indeed, in the whole paper, I thought perhaps the following superstition of the Egyptians, culled here and there from the study of Oriental history, and reading after historians treating on those far-away Eastern lands, would be of some interest to the young readers. And as the majority of our young friends are no doubt familiar with the wars of extermination practiced by the Christians and Mohammedans of the middle ages, these odds and ends of information about the latter people will not, I presume, be out of place.

To begin with, the Egyptians are, or were, a peculiar people, and fully believed the most absurd things imaginable. They believed the hyena to be the handiwork of an angry god, from the fact that he subsists chiefly on dead bodies when in his nativ state, and for this reason miraculous powers are attributed to the skin, flesh, teeth, and hair of that animal. According to the Koran, the Mohammedan Bible, the flesh of the hyena when killed (which is not often done) is to be sold as food at a high market value. Doubtless the children will think that a hyena steak would not be pleasant eating, and I'm inclined to believe with them, especially when there's no accounting for Egyptian taste, that such would undoubtedly be the case.

The pope, or head of the religion in Egypt, called the ulema, is extremely fond of the flesh of the hyena; the haunch, legs, shoulders, and ribs, which the Franks (as Europeans are called) term unclean, are held to be as sweet and savory as a spring chicken. The universal idea is that hyena flesh imparts vitality and strength to the masculin anatomy, and when a man has a pain in his back or other parts of the body, he forthwith diets exclusivly on hyena steak, believing, and that firmly, his pains will vanish. Terrible things though they are to look upon, hyena fangs and teeth are esteemed very much, and are disposed of at a high figure. They are used to a great extent as amulets and bracelets for old and young, male and female alike, while the tufts of hair from the mane are also highly prized, and are accepted and fondly believed to be promotors of love and faithfulness on the part of either sweetheart, wife, or husband.

One writer, Dr. R. S. Mackenzie, tells us that he many years ago dined with a friend in London, and he (his friend) greatly praised the flavor of some stewed chickens. "It reminded him," the doctor goes on, "of a favorit dish of which he had often partaken in Hindostan. This consisted of small pieces of serpents nicely stewed, and served up in boiled rice. Whether the serpents were poisonous did not matter to him, my friend said, so long as their heads were cut off immediately after death, and the skin slipped from their bodies, just as eels are skinned in this country and in Europe. I hav no doubt that my friend told the truth, though the fact was unusual."

Foxes also occupy a high position, and, according to Egyptian folk-lore, Master Reynard figures very extensivly as a kadi, or local judge. Of the legends and fables illustrating the cunning and craftiness of these animals there are many in Egypt, but I shall only relate one, which is sufficient for all purposes.

A man was once carrying some fowls to the market-place, and a fox who was hungry lay down on the road and feigned death. The man was astonished on seeing what he naturally supposed was a dead fox in the public highway, but passed on without stopping. A little further on he found another, which, like the first, appeared cold in death, and still further on a third.

"That is strange," the man thought, "and I believe I will go back and see what it all means; besides, three fox-skins are worth taking with me to sell in the market."

So he set his basket of fowls down, and retraced his steps to pick up the foxes. Of course, he found none, and he came back more perplexed than ever to where he had left his basket, but his fowls had all mysteriously disappeared! No doubt, as conjectured by the young reader, there was only one fox, and he had slipped forward by paths unknown and unseen by the man, and he alone it was who had purloined the pullets.

If the foregoing proves of sufficient interest to our young friends, I shall, with Miss Wixon's kind permission, resume the study of Egyptian superstition (for this is not half, I can assure those who hav read the above), in future articles until completed.

Lexington, Ky. DAVID B. COZINE.

[We thank our friend for his kindness, and shall read his articles on Egyptian superstition with interest, only asking that they be brief, and condensed as much as possible, as our space is limited.—ED. C. C.]

My 1, 2, 3 is an important organ of all animals;
My 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 is a planet;
My 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 pertains to that planet;
My 2, 3, 4 is the solemn form of a common verb;
My 4, 5, 6 is an adjectiv;
My 4, 5, 6, 7 is an adverb;
My 5, 6 is a pronoun;
My 5, 6, 7 is a fowl;

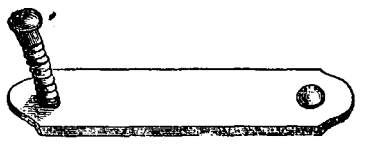
My 8, 9, 10, 11 is in every dwelling;
My 9, 10, 11 is another form for my 4th.
What am I?

3.—NUMERICAL PUZZLE.

The distance from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh is 353 1-10 miles by the Pennsylvania Railroad. A passenger train leaves Philadelphia at 5:29 P.M., and runs westward at the rate of 49 1-10 miles per hour, except in two instances when it slacks its speed for a quarter of a mile each and runs at the rate of 33 miles the hour. Another train leaves Pittsburgh at 7:59 P.M., and runs eastward at the rate of 44 1-2 miles per hour, except in one instance of a quarter of a mile, when it slacks its speed and runs at the rate of 33 miles the hour. At what time do these trains meet each other, and at what distance from Philadelphia and Pittsburgh do they meet?

For the first three correct answers sent to my address, I will send each person a stereoscopic view of the place where these trains meet each other. WILLIAM J. BURNS.

Altoona, Pa.



4.—RIDDLE.

DEAR CHILDREN: I send you a riddle I read in an almanac when I was quite young; perhaps some of you can find out the answer:

"No mortal can my power withstand,
I conquer all by sea and land;
The fair are smitten by my charms,
And yielding, fall into my arms.
Proud Cato I likewise ensnared,
No age or sex I ever spared;
Grim death himself can't frighten me,
I've conquered thousands more than he."

Barre, Mass. ELLA E. GIBSON.

5.—CONUNDRUM.

One screw is loose, the other fast:
Why is the first just like the last?

6.—CONUNDRUM.

Why is the ruined column like the canopy over the king's head?

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER JUNE 20, 1885.

1.—6=VI., 50=L., 51=LI.; VILLI. 2.—One has a little bruin (brewing), the other has a little brood (brewed). 3.—Candy, nuts and oranges.

ANSWER OF PRIZE RIDDLE.

I hav received six answers to the prize riddle, two of which are correct. One called it "Love;" one "Water;" one "Air;" one "Disease and Death." Two persons named it correctly by calling it Alcohol. The best answer given by one of these was by Mr. E. B. Jones, and to him I hav awarded the prize—one copy of the "Story Hour."

ANSWER TO PRIZE RIDDLE OF MAY 30TH.

The name of your riddle
I am sure I can tell;
For the prize is worth having
If I answer it well.

And now the strange thing
That you speak of so plain
Is extracted from fruit,
And also from grain.

It is found in all lands,
Of intense cold or heat;
In poor and rich homes,
And the bread that we eat.

It has caused many crimes,
Made the humble to fall;
And when it's unmasked
It is called Alcohol.

CONUNDRUMS.

1. What two letters will be of great value to you in old age?

2. Where does every emigrant first go on coming to this country?

3. Why is a bass viol in perfect condition for playing like an air played by a violinist?

THE real true blue orthodoxy seems to get hold of some of the little folks with a fascinating sort of a grip. Heaven and the "other place" are realities to them. Said Johnnie the other day as he picked up his sister's doll and looked at it earnestly, "I'll kill you and then you'll go to ——" "Johnnie! Johnnie!" said his mother, "that's very wicked. You shouldn't send the dolly to the bad place." "She's chuck full o' cotton and she'd burn, anyhow."—Hartford Post.

Poetry.

The Tramp's Soliloquy.

Oh, I am nothing, nothing,
And at the rumseller's feet,
A broken and emptied vessel,
I lie, for his use made meet.
Emptied that he may fill me,
As in from his service I come
Dead broke; he takes my pennies,
And fills me up with rum.

Oh, I am nothing, nothing,
Only as led by his hand;
A messenger from his doorway,
I wander abroad through the land;
I am, like a beer keg, ready
To be kicked about at his will,
Giving him every penny
I can beg to obtain a fill.

Oh, I am nothing, nothing;
Painful the humbling will be
If the horrors ever catch me,
And the snakes I happen to see.
But rather that, and nothing,
Than existence without a spree,
Rum is a fountain of blessing.
No prohibition for me. EIDDA.

A Crack wi' Rab's Ghaist.

Ae night I had been reading Burns,
Wi' gay or mournfu' thought, by turns;
Whiles I would greet, and whiles wi' girns
I'd turn the page;
I could but wish, wi' heartfelt yearns,
He'd seen this age.

Through wi't, I hugged the ingle-cheek
And glowered at the eldritch smeek,
When, wow! out from the spewing reek
Stepped Rab himsel';
He sonsie smiled to see me keek,
And leuked fu' well.

"Weel, Rab, I hae just read your beuk
Frae outer edge to benmost neuk;
Wi' girning chaps or glowering leuk,
I'se read it a';
Weel pleased am I the pains ye teuk
On me to ca'.

Just sit ye doun beside the ingle
(Gin spirits' toes wi' cauld e'er tingle),
And, while the rain beats on the shingle,
We'll hae a crack.
Though howling blasts the winnocks jingle,
And lifts be black."

Quo' Rab: "I hae had mony a chiel
Ride owre me roughshod as the diel—
Suppose ye criticise me weel;
I'd like to hear it.
My fauts, I ken, ye would reveal,
And rouse my merit."

"Hoot, mon! I dinna like to do it,
And aiblins if I did ye'd rue it,
But, Robin, gin ye put me to it,
I'se crack awa';
I'll gie ye sic a hearty flewit,
'Twill drap your jaw.

"Ye did yoursel' a waefu' wrang,
To make ilk ode a pot-house sang;
Ye ken yoursel' sic doings dang
Virtue tapsalteerie;
Awa' wi' purity she'll gang,
Looking unco' eerie.

"Och! mony a lad has ruin made,
And mony a lass has been betrayed,
Because of things ye sang or said
That favored sin;
Bright humor's grace owre vice ye spread,
Wi' drucken grin.

"Na man can doubt ye had ingine,
The mickle powers o' your mind
Are brawly ken'd by a' mankind,
Baith large and sma';
Nae obstacle your Muse should bind,
Or drive awa'.

"'Twas tipenny that wrought ye ill,
And usquebae gie ye the diel,
And obscene thoughts the nappy swill
Put i' your pow;
The reaming swats and whisky gill,
They bro't ye low."

I stopped a wee some fuel to add
(The winds were skirling round like mad,
And mickle fire maun be had
To warm the room).
Puir Rab sat looking unco' sad,
A' wrapped in gloom.

Sae I teuk up the ither side
(I had nae heart owre lang to chide,
For Vice's doors are unco' wide
Whiles a' gang in;
And e'en the kirk, Christ's sonsie bride,
S' been ken'd to sin).

"But leese me on ye Rab," quo' I,
"When ye roose the blink o' Freedom's eye;
Syne 'tis ye are the bonny boy,
The noble bard;
Ye gar the tyrant diels to fly,
And smite them hard!

"For Freethought, too, ye did fu' well;
Ye turned cauld water into hell.
And gar'd auld Calvin fairly yell
Wi' rage and spite,
When down his stony towers fell
Afore the right.

"But when ye sang ilk bird and beastie,
Syne 'twas ye showed your kindly breastie;
I ken na better way to test ye
Than 'Twa Dogs' read;
A better poem than that at least ye
Hae never made."

Syne Burns he gie a sprightly loup;
"Ye are a right gley-spoken pup;
But dish o' truth ye'se gar't me sup,
I ken it well;
Sae gude-bye, till some time you're up
Where spirits dwell."

I started up to bid him stay—
Trowth, sirs! the light o' coming day
Showed me that I had snoozed away
Upon twa chairs;
The dawn was breaking cauld and gray—
I ganged up-stairs. J. WM. LLOYD.

Book Review.

THE OLD TESTAMENT. Anonymous. Translated Out of the Original Tongues: Being the Version Set Forth A.D. 1611 Compared with the most Ancient Authorities and Revised. Published by the Henry Bill Publishing Co., Norwich, Conn.

This latest aspirant for literary honors comes at us with a volume of one thousand and thirty-five large pages, bound in Persian morocco, and with gilt edges to the leaves. As indicated by the stamp on the back of the book, as also by the title page, the work has recently been revised. A glance at the contents leads us to remark that it ought to be revised again. Reasons for this will appear later.

The exact nature of this production it would perhaps be difficult to define off-hand. The author has divided his work into thirty-nine essays, called books, largely made up of laudatory matter concerning an individual variously termed God, Jehovah, Jah, and the Lord; a single division called "Esther," the history of a remarkable woman of no morals, being an exception to the rule, and containing no reference to the hero of the others.

Our author breaks ground with "The First Book of Moses, Commonly Called Genesis." Moses apparently had no last name unless we accept that of Schaumberg, ascribed to him by Texas Siftings, a religious journal published in the South. We may here say that five of these books are written by this man Moses, the last containing an account of his funeral, which we must regard as a remarkable literary achievement on the part of Moses. As to the book of Genesis, it may be said that in it the author displays a woful ignorance of scientific facts, and no regard whatsoever for accuracy. Instances of this are too frequent to be enumerated here.

In the next book, called "Exodus," we find a preposterous tale about the career of a foundling. The writer must hav had an idea that his readers would swallow anything. It cannot be crammed down the throat of this writer.

"Leviticus," following, is a most disgusting performance, evidently written by a cannibal. We pass it with a feeling of relief that lasts only until we reach the succeeding book," "Numbers," which describes a census-taking. The method of enumerating the population consisted of killing those who were not agil enough to get away, and counting the slain. This saved the expense of taking their names.

"Deuteronomy" is a series of directions to the inhabitants as to their conduct toward one another. A people barbarous enough to need these statutes would not be worth praying for. "Deuteronomy" was promulgated beyond Jordan. The locality of "beyond Jordon," it will be readily conceded, would depend mainly upon which side of that river the speaker was situated.

"Joshua," the sixth book, givs the history of a red-handed robber and murderer who should hav died young. The statement therein contained that this individual caused the sun and moon to stand still relieves the story of all probable truth. Munchausen was a talented liar, but it was his misfortune to come after the writer of "Joshua," compared with whom for promiscuous mendacity he was a truthful man.

"Judges" is the story of a strong man named Samson, who married the daughter of a Philistine. "And it came to pass," we read, that after a while Samson presented "his wife with a kid." In the due course of nature it might be expected that she would hav reciprocated, but there is no record that she did so. Samson's decease was effected by a Buddensiek tenement falling on him.

The book of "Ruth" bears internal evidence of having been interpolated in the present century be Emile Zola, author of the sister-work, "Nana."

The book of "Samuel" we pass; it is incoherent.

"Kings" might be dismissed for the same reason; and as there is no reason at all for noticing it, it will hav to slide.

"Chronicles" is just as bad. It is not of the slightest interest to know that "Josiah gave to the children of the people, of the flock, lambs and kids to the number of thirty thousand, and three thousand bullocks," etc. If he had given each a ticket for a bath, good might hav resulted.

"Ezra" contains no central idea around which any remarks can be clustered. Ezra's chief feat was to induce the men of his congregation to put away their wives and children, and take other wives.

Nehemiah was the son of Hacaliah, and has a book named after him in this collection. The book is a wail.

Esther, after whom the next book is named, is a Madam Pompadour without any redeeming qualities to speak of. She topped off an evening's entertainment by causing a man named Haman to be hanged on a gallows three hundred feet high.

The hero of the book of "Job," smitten with boils, was very miserable. Having scraped himself with a piece of a broken pot, and rolled himself in ashes, which doubtless greatly aggravated his uneasiness, he indulges in deep thought. He is something of a student of nature, and is greatly impressed with the behemoth—which is to say, the hippopotamus. This animal, he declares, eateth grass like an ox, moveth his tail like a cedar, and lieth under a lotus. "Behold," goes on Job, "if a river overflow, he trembleth not; he is confident though Jordan swell to his mouth." If Job had known that the hippopotamus could swim, the confidence of that animal in the presence of a freshet would not hav so surprised him. Job recovered and enjoyed thereafter one hundred and forty years.

The "Psalms" number one hundred and forty-nine. They are not without usefulness, as illustrating what a man will say when reduced to delirium by debauchery and dissipation.

"Proverbs" are solid chunks of wisdom. They are the only part of the work that asks for justice to the working woman. Of her it says, "Giv her the fruit of her hands." Christian employers who pay their female employees twenty-four cents a day, and then hint to them that they must "dress a little more respectably," should make a note of this.

"Ecclesiastes" is not without merit, and we are therefore somewhat surprised to find it in the collection now under consideration. Of a future life this preacher says, "Who knoweth the spirit of man whether it goeth upward, or of the beast whether it goeth downward to the earth?" Questions like this indicate modesty, if nothing more. We see here, also, the crepuscular glimmerings of Agnosticism.

"The Song of Songs" represents a bad case of two hearts that beat as one and are not used to it. They are wholly unable to keep their condition to themselvs. The work is not adapted to general and indiscriminate perusal. A compositor, unless indurated, could not put it in type without blushing.

"Isaiah" is an exhortation.

"Jeremiah" is a wail.

"Lamentations" is Jeremiah continued.

"Ezekiel" was not half revised. It should hav been edited with a paint-brush, and declined with a reprimand. In printed form it is about the only excuse for the existence of Anthony Comstock.

"Daniel" tells of a man so objectionable personally that the lions would not eat him.

"Hosea" is unfit for publication.

"Amos" informs us that "the day shall come that the plowman shall overtake the reaper." It will then behoove the plowman to turn to and bind, and help the reaper along.

"Obadiah" comprises a vision, and is an exception to the rule that brevity is the soul of wit. It is the farthest from being funny of anything we ever saw. Obadiah greatly overrated his ability as a humorist.

According to "Jonah," a prophet whose prophecy was not fulfilled, a fish obligingly swallowed a man and took him ashore after a three days' cruise. The tale might be diverting to a marine.

"Micah" calls upon the Lord to feed his people with a rod. We can merely remark that it would take a people a long time to get fat on that diet.

"Nahum" is a nightmare.

"Habakkuk" furnishes a song "for the chief musicians, on stringed instruments." Lovers of mnemonics can find some diversion in spelling Habakkuk with an h and an a, and a b and an a, and a k and a k, and a u and a k.

"Zephaniah" was chosen of the Lord. It was bad taste. We should never hav picked him out.

"Zechariah" adumbrates a period when "every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be holy unto the Lord of hosts." The pot will then doubtless cease to reflect upon the complexion of the kettle.

"Malachi" is an arsenal of expletivs in all varieties of upholstery. It has the merit of closing the volume, and therefore should hav come earlier.

Thus we hav passed briefly and casually over this peculiar volume. The review may be somewhat disappointing, but so is the subject of it. We were misled by the binding and gilt edges into a belief that the book possessed merit which a perusal of it has failed to develop. It is a whited sepulcher. If it sells only according to its merits, the proceeds can scarcely indemnify the publisher. The volume is on our shelf. We should be glad to let any one hav it who would reimburse us for the advertisment of the "Holy Bible" which has recently several times appeared in these columns.

MODERN SPIRITUALISM
By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.
This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. ELEMENTS

UNIVERSAL HISTORY
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.
By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.
Freethinkers will find this, for an outline, history the best for their use, as Professor Cottinger is a Freethinker, and in his reports of the church's actions has stated facts with a truthful freedom not found in ordinary histories. He dates his work from the beginning of historical certainty and not from the mythical Eden, as do most "universal" historians, and brings it down to 1883, with a brief mention of subsequent important inventions and discoveries.

ALL in a LIFETIME.
A ROMANCE.
BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.
"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay."

THE RISE OF INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

CONSULTING ROOMS,

Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

WHAT New Mexico needs is more rain and less holy water—more sense and less religion.—Ingersoll.

THEN let us learn to help each other,
Hoping unto the end;
Who sees in every man a brother,
Shall find in each a friend.
—Hymns of the Ages.

FROM the ripened harvest of the last half-century there hav been garnered many priceless sheaves for women—the right to be heard in their own defense; the right to higher education; the right to the medical profession; the right to the pulpit; the right to the bar; and the right to the wide fields of industrial activity. Odious and unjust discriminations against women hav also been blotted from the statute-book, and wrested from the common law. In many of the states the old sin and shame which gave to any father, whether he was of age or not, the right to "will" or "deed" his unborn child, without the knowledge or consent of its mother and against her wish, has disappeared and she may now be guardian of her own children. A wife is not now legally deprived of personal property by marriage. She can own what she earns outside of her family, etc. These rights hav all been won peacefully by argument and by appeal to the conscience and good sense of the people.—Lucy Stone.

WHAT if the grandeur and magnificence of the churches are only another branch of the ostentatious extravagance which is sapping the simplicity and honesty of modern life? What if these costly structures are erected, not for the glory of God, but for the glorification of their builders! What if they are the outcome—not of giving at all, either from humility or pride, but of borrowing, what is given being about enough to build a plain, substantial church and the extra amount . . a great borrowing speculation to draw a crowd and to be cleared off sometime!—Brooke Herford.

WE can know nothing that we do not understand, and they alone are philosophers who educate themselvs into avoidance of the unknowable as well as into the acquisition of tha which can be known. There is a "quiet ignorance" to which the wisest men must resign themselvs, just as there is a quiet ignorance "with which none but fools will be content." The old-world Sophists, whether pre-Socratic or post-Aristotelian, who professed to know everything, strayed as far from the paths of wisdom as the mindless sensualists whose whole theory of life was expressed in the motto, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."—Locke Concerning Human Understanding.

FOR five centuries at least the struggle has been going on, in Europe, between science and religion, and, in every conflict, theology has lost some ground. Over the whole field of physical science the reign of law has been steadily and forever established. The heavens no longer declare the glory of God; they declare the glory of Kepler, Galileo, Newton, etc Neither Jove nor Jehovah now manifests his anger in the thunder, nor rides upon the wings of the wind. The electric force now binds two continents together, and the law of storms is yielding up to us the secrets of the gods of heaven. The famins, the diseases, and the revolutions which afflict mankind are no longer the judgments of God. They are the inevitable sequences of known and preventable conditions.—Frederic Harrison.

Is there a daring thought thou hast not crushed?
Is there a generous faith thou hast not cursed?
Is there a whisper, however low and hushed,
Breathed for the future, but thou wast the first
To silence with thy tortures, thou the worst
Of Antichrists, and cunningest of foes
That ever against God and man's great progress rose? —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

WHILE the church has perpetuated from generation to generation the doctrin of woman's subordinate position, has endeavored to circumscribe woman's sphere of action and usefulness, to shut her out from the places of honor and trust, and to close every avenue of employment by which she could acquire a competency in life, Materialists hav, consistently with their views, labored to overcome the influence of the church respecting woman, and to emancipate her from the trammels which centuries of ignorance and superstition hav imposed upon her.—Underwood's Christianity and Materialism.

WE look on the sea as calm when not the least breath of air disturbs its waves; and, in like manner, the placid and quiet state of the mind is discovered when unmoved by any perturbation. Now, if there be any one who holds the power of fortune, and everything human, everything that can possibly befal any man, as supportable, so as to be out of the reach of fear or anxiety; and if such a man covets nothing, and is lifted up by no vain joy of the mind, what can prevent his being happy? And if these are the effects of virtue, why cannot virtue itself make men happy?—Cicero.

ONE cannot but respect the temper of the Norseman who was willing to be baptized, but when the missionary represented the alternativ as everlasting damnation, and, in answer to his question, assured him that all his ancestors, not having heard of the gospel, were in that predicament, withdrew his foot from the water, preferring rather to be damned with his fathers than to be savd without them. If the missionary had but known it, there was more of Christianity and more of salvation in that reply than in all the dogmas of his creed and all the sacraments of his church.—Fred. H. Hodge.

ST AUGUSTINE says to the devotee: "Fly to the desert. Though your wife put her arms about your neck, tear her hands away. She is a temptation of the devil. Though your father and mother throw their bodies athwart your threshold, step over them; though your children pursue with weeping eyes, beseeching you to return, listen not; it is a temptation of the evil one; fly to the desert and save your soul." Think of such a soul being worth saving! While I liv I purpose to stand by my "folks."—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

THE silent watches of the night: Those not wound up.

LITTLE Lily: "Don't you think, doctor, that I look just like my mamma?" Mother: "Hush, child, don't be vain."

"THE man who robs a clothesline," remarks Puck, "is not necessarily a laundryman, but he generally takes in washing"

A NORTHERN paper praises the Indian Hair Restorer. He is a fraud. No Indian was ever known to restore any hair.

A MONUMENT is to be erected in Paris to the inventor of soda water. It will bear a representation of the inventor's phiz.

"WHAT is profanity?" asks a newspaper writer. It is what a church-member says when he tries on roller-skates for the first time.

YOUNG housewife: "What miserable little eggs again! You really must tell them, Jane, to let the hens sit on them a little longer."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "In what book of the Bible is it mentioned that Nebuchadnezzar ate grass like an ox?" Little girl (doubtfully): "Timothy?"

IF buzzard dollars grew on trees,
And religion 'neath the sod,
Oh, what a climing there would be
To get nearer to their god.

"THE tendency to do wrong increases toward night," says a well-known clergyman. I think this is very likely to be true, for when Adam ate the forbidden fruit it was near Eve.

"OUT of every one hundred and nine female school-teachers," says an exchange, "seven marry every year." How many times do the remaining 102 marry? Giv us all the facts.

A FAMOUS robber recently rode all the way from Pittsburgh to Chicago alone in a sleeping-car with the porter. By superhuman efforts the robber managed to escape without losing anything but his time.

A PREACHER who was not well acquainted with the elocutionary art placed the inflection on the wrong word, following the literal italic in 1 Kings xiii, 27, and read: "And he spoke unto his sons, saying, saddle me the ass. And they saddled him."

POOR fellow. He lay in a stupor. The physician had said that he could not recover. The minister came, and, bending over the bed, solemnly remarked, "You must prepare for the worst." The poor fellow, whose wife had been doing the cooking, opened his eyes and said, "Why, is dinner ready?"

THE minister was making an evening call, and the oppressiv heat was being discussed. "By the way," he said to the head of the family, "did you notice just how hot it was this afternoon, Mr. Hendricks?" "No," Mr. Hendricks replied, "I did not," "Yes, you did, pa," interposed Bobby. "You're mistaken, my boy." "No, I'm not," insisted Bobby. "I heard you say it was damned hot."

VISITOR (at a dime museum): "I see nothing remarkable about that man. Is he on exhibition?" Showman: "He is. Stand up, please, Colonel. I next introduce to you, ladies and gents, a Kentucky colonel, born and brought up in the Bluegrass region, who never drank a drop of whisky in his life. Keep moving, please, so that each and every one may hav a chance to view the wonderful curiosity."

"PRAY tell me the difference, dear,"
Said Edward to his lass,
"There is between a store cashier,
And the teacher of a class?"
The damsel, smiling, said: "I will;
This difference you will find:
The store cashier he minds the till,
The teacher tills the mind."

"Yo' wan' ter know what fust started me fer to preach de gospil, sah?" repeated an old darky minister. "Yes, Uncle Jake." "I will tole you 'zactly all 'bout it, sah. One day I war workin' out in de co'nfield, an, de sun war berry hot, an' de groun' war stony, an' it's mighty pow'ful work, hoein' co'n in de hot sun on stony groun', boss, an' I war berry tired, an' I leaned back on de hoe an' got ter thinkin', an' all ob a sudden, like, I feel dat de good Lord called 'pon me fer ter preach de gospil, sah."

TWO PICTURES.

Last night I saw her at the ball
"In beauty's circle proudly gay."
A stately figure, fair and tall,
She was the belle, I heard them say,

I see her as to-day she stands—
The fresh breeze blowing from the south—
A pillow case is in her hands,
And several clothespins in her mouth.

And she's as fair to me to-day,
As winsome, beautiful, and bright,
As when, among the dancers gay,
I saw her at the ball last night.

"No, my son," he replied, as he put on his hat, "you can't go to the circus." "But why, father?" "Well, in the first place, I can't fool away my money on such things." "Yes, but I hav enough of my own." "And in the next place it is a rough crowd, the sentiment is unhealthy, and no respectable person can countenance such things." "But, fath——" "That's enough, sir. You can't go. I want you to enjoy yourself, but you must seek some more respectable amusement." An hour later a curious thing happened in the circus tent. A boy climbed to the top flight of seats and sat down beside a man who had just finished a glass of lemonade and was lighting a cigar. He had his plug hat on back the of his head and seemed to be enjoying himself hugely. It was father and son. The father had gone straight to the grounds from dinner, and the boy had run away. They looked at each other for half a minute, and then the boy got in the first blow by whispering, "Say, dad, if you won't lick me I won't tell ma you was here." The father nodded his head to the agreement, and the great spectacular parade in the ring began.

A PRESS dispatch says that the Catholic bishops of Austria hav issued a manifesto to the faithful, warning them against the increasing skepticism, secret societies, and the influence of the anti-religious press, which are undermining the church. The bishops followed the manifesto with a memorial, asking the government to legislate with a view of protecting the church from adverse influences.

THESE hops are a curious vine, by the way. I always supposed that a hop-vine and a baby knew how to creep without being taught. The baby may, but the hop vine does not. It can't shin a pole any more than a codfish, unless it takes lessons. It is like a kitten, it don't get its eyes open for sometime. It comes up out of the hill and lies sprawling on the ground till it is taken by the nape of the neck, so to speak, and wound around the pole a few times, and then tied there. After that it will seem to catch on, and learn why it was put into the world, and will then shin up the pole like a little man. It is not half as intelligent as a bean.—Belfast (Me.) Journal.

PROFANE words having been occasionally spoken within the hallowed precincts of the Court House at Palatka, Fla., the county officers agreed to inflict a tax of ten cents on each repetition. A man from the country paid forty cents for the pleasure of a five minutes' conversation.

THE Detroit Free Press says that a St. Louis judge has decided that "a wife has the same legal and moral right to chew, smoke, play cards, and sit on a cracker-box in a grocery as her husband." THE French Socialists hav issued their platform of principles for the coming electoral campaign. It demands: 1. The abolition of the presidency. 2. The abolition of the senate. 3. Bestowal upon the Assembly of the power to dismiss ministers of state. 4. Settlement of all questions of war and constitutional revision by popular vote. 5. Reduction of the number of public officers and of official salaries. 6. The confiscation of church property. 7. The separation of church and state. 8. The legal equality of legitimate and illegitimate children. 9. The gradual abolition of standing armies. 10. The free education of children at the public expense, and the free feeding of children at the public expense in all cases where they are not otherwise properly provided for. 11. Political amnesty. 12. The abolition of the octroi duties. 13. The establishment of a progressiv income tax. 14. The abolition of collateral inheritance. 15. The gradual abolition of the public debt. 16. Reduction in the hours of labor. 17. Prohibition of the employment of children under fourteen years of age. 18. A reorganization of the Bank of France. 19. Prison reform. 20. The maintenance of disabled workmen at the public expense.

No man ought to be elected to either branch of the twentieth legislature who will not pledge himself to vote for a bill declaring "poverty" to be a sin and a crime, and further declaring that no man in this state shall be permitted to enter into the holy bonds of matrimony who has less than $5,000 in cash, and who shall not first hav secured a home and one year's provisions. A law like this would in a short time rid the state of poor people, and such things as poor widows and orphans would be heard of no more in the land. Prohibition is the watchword.—Paris (Texas) Free Tongue.

WM. WASHBURN, who writes for John Swinton's Paper, has evidently lived in Boston. He says: "In New England, if a man is a bigoted Calvinist, the women love him for his religious zeal. If he is a Freethinker, they love him because he is no hypocrit. If he is passionate, they love him for his warm heart. If he is formal, they love him for his high intellect. If he washes his face, they admire him for his beauty. If he does not wash his face, they admire his complexion for having about it some thing of the 'manly' that awed us in Daniel Webster. Where men are as scarce as in Boston, one must be a shrewd rascal if the women can't find something good in him—bless their gentle hearts!"

THE Charleston, S. C., News tells the following story of religious delusion: A young ward physician of this city was called, during the present week, to treat a case somewhat out of the usual line. A family in his district failed to elicit any response to the bell which was for the cook to send in dinner. After repeated ineffectual ringings the master of the house went out to ascertain the reason. He found the kitchen untenanted, and no preparations made for the most interesting part of the day's proceedings, the midday meal. Upon making his way to the cook's room he found the looking glass covered as for a funeral, the pictures turned with their faces to the wall, and the little bureau shrouded in crape. On the bed, full alive and awake, lay her majesty the cook, clad in the habiliments of the tomb, and wait ing, as she said, for the Lord to take her, as he had told her he was going to do. She refused to come back again to the ways of this world, until, the physician being called, she was threatened with amputation or some other remedial agent. Even then she insisted upon compromise, and would not consent to liv until she had given the matter a night's consideration.

THE London Times prints the following legend as to the origin of the Russians found by Colonel Prjevalsky to be current among the Mongol inhabitants of Zaidan, and published in the Russki Invalide: "In former times there lived in a cave, far away from all people, a good hermit lama, or priest, who passed his life in praying. A pair of nomads, consisting of an aged mother and her daughter, happened to go that way, and the daughter while tending cattle came upon the cave of the holy lama, who was at that time ill. The compassionate maiden offered him some sour milk, but he did not like to taste it. At last he gave way to her entreaties and took the sour milk every day until he got well. Eventually, out of gratitude for the cure, the lama married the maiden. As soon as the czar of that country heard of this he sent his troops to kill the priest who had so flagrantly broken his vows and committed the sin of marriage. When the troops approached, the lama gathered a bunch of reeds and stuck them in the ground round his tent, and then by force of prayer caused them to be all turned into soldiers, who defeated the troops of the czar. The latter sent a second and a third army, but both were beaten, as the lama continued to pray and turn into more fighting men the reeds broken off by his first-created defenders, so that the holy lama soon had a great number of troops. After the defeat of his third army the czar left the lama alone in peace, but the latter did not wish to liv any longer on this earth. The lama left his wife to rule the people created from the reeds, and from those arose the Russians. They hav white bodies and their hair is often fair, because the stems of the reeds were of a yellowish color and the tops somewhat darker."

The Rise of Christianity the Decline of Civilization.

It is often affirmed that we are indebted to Christianity for everything in the line of civilization and progress here, as well as everything that is to be hoped for hereafter. History, however, does not sustain this view of the matter.

John Lawrence Von Mosheim, D.D., in his "Ecclesiastical History," translated by James Murdock, D.D., and which "is adopted as a text book in nearly every Protestant theological seminary on this side the Atlantic," tells us, page 23, that "at the time when God became incarnate, a great part of the world was subject to the Romans;" and "that the Roman government, if we regard only its form and laws, was sufficiently mild and equitable." Again, page 24, it is said: "Still this widely extended dominion of one people, or rather of one man, was attended with several advantages. First, it brought into union a multitude of nations differing in customs and language. Secondly, it gave free access to the remotest nations. Thirdly, it gradually civilized the barbarous nations by introducing among them the Roman laws and customs. Fourthly, it spread literature, the arts, and philosophy in countries where they were not before cultivated." Again, page 25, "Each nation, without concern, allowed its neighbors to enjoy their own views of religion, and to worship their own gods in their own way." And on page 65 we are told: "Among the Romans of this age (the first century), every branch of learning and science was cultivated." And of the second century, page 97, it is said: "Most of the emperors of this century were of a mild and equitable character." And "hence the Christian community increased, and became vastly numerous in this century" (page 98).

Thus, under the "mild and equitable character" of the Roman government, each nation being allowed "to worship its own gods in its own way," civilization prevailed throughout the empire. Literature and the arts, and every branch of learning and science, were cultivated, and the Christians increased "and became vastly numerous in this (the second) century." But strange as it may seem to some, we are told, page 161, in the history of the third century, that "literature, which had suffered much in the preceding century, lost in this nearly all its glory." The Christians increased, and became vastly numerous in the second century, and in the third century literature lost "nearly all its glory." And we are further told, in the history of the fourth century, page 231, that "it appears from explicit testimony that very many of both the bishops and presbyters were entirely destitute of science and learning." And in the history of the fifth century it is said by the historian, page 321: "In the close of this century, therefore, learning was almost extinct, and only a faint shadow of it remained."

Of the seventh century, the historian says, page 435, "The profound ignorance and barbarism of this century will hardly appear credible to those who hav not personally examined its literary productions. . . . Kings and noblemen were attentiv to everything rather than the cause of learning. The rude and unlearned bishops suffered the schools which had been committed to their care to languish and become extinct. It was very rare to find among them persons able to compose their own discourses."

Thus it is clear that as Christianity advanced "literature and the arts and every branch of learning and science" disappeared, the dark ages were inaugurated and ignorance and darkness and superstition settled down upon Christendom for a thousand years. Intolerance, bigotry, and persecution seemed to hav been introduced into the Roman empire as part of the Christian system, for even in the second century the Christians "held it lawful to persecute heretics with fire and sword," and the first Christian emperor proclaimed war against the ancient religions, destroyed their temples, and excluded the adherents from all public offices; and the Christians then commenced the work of exterminating heresy and heretics among themselvs; fire and sword and banishment were the means employed, and the church reigned triumphant for a thousand years. The duty of suppressing heresy by the death penalty is clearly taught in the Bible (see Deut. xiii, 6). The Christians early embraced the doctrin, and the Roman empire seems to hav been converted to it during the first three centuries, and as soon as the Christians came into power other religions were suppressed, and even Christian sects who were in a minority were extirpated by banishment, imprisonment, and death. This doctrin of the right to persecute for opinion's sake is one of the most pernicious doctrins ever held by any sect or people. It annihilates at once the doctrin of human rights, and consigns the minority, whether large or small, to the tender mercies of an ignorant and infuriated rabble, led on to deeds of cruelty and slaughter by an ignorant and blood-thirsty priesthood. It hinders progress, closes up the avenues to knowledge, and leaves the people dependent upon the priests, who dole out to them, whether true or false, what they hav learned at the seminary, or whatever is calculated, in their estimation, to increase their influence and power. And thus, when the Roman empire was converted to Christianity, Christendom was converted into an ecclesiastical despotism, civilization blotted out, and the result has been ignorance and barbarism, war and bloodshed, ever since. And even after the light of the sixteenth century had dawned upon the world, and the right of private judgment had been nobly battled for and partially sustained, the Protestants burnt Servetus, hanged witches, and suppressed heresy, heretics, and Freethought by fire and sword. And even to this day, and now, misrepresentation, falsehood, and slander are resorted to, and every conceivable effort made to destroy the reputation of those who differ from them and exercise the right of Freethought and free speech; and both Catholics and Protestants are ready, in many places at least, to fasten upon each other's throats like famished tigers, and exterminate each other if they only had the power, or it were safe to do so. To be sure, there has been some advance in civilization since the Christian forces became divided in the sixteenth century. After the slaughter of millions, the forces became so equalized that they hav been able to do but little for a century or more but watch each other and raise recruits, preparing for future contests.

In the mean time there has been some progress. The doctrin of inalienable rights has been taught—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, the right of private judgment, freedom of speech, freedom of the press—and that governments are instituted to protect the people in their rights. These principles embodied in our Declaration of Independence and Constitution hav secured to the people of the United States many of their rights, and protected them from some of the grosser forms of persecution. Some, however, who enjoy all these privileges, or rights, and the right to worship according to the dictates of conscience, are not satisfied while others enjoy the same right, but hav organized a National Reform Association, hold conventions from year to year, and hav their emissaries prowling about the country, trying to persuade the people that the Constitution of the United States ought to be amended so as to "acknowledge God as the source of all authority in civil government, his son as the ruler among the nations, and his word as the supreme law, and authorizing legislation giving effect to the amendment." Now suppose this amendment should be adopted, what legislation would be necessary to giv it effect, or carry it out? If the son of God is acknowledged as the ruler among the nations, and his word (the Bible) as the supreme law, and these dogmas made a part of the Constitution, of course the legislation necessary would be such as would enforce the supreme law, the Bible. And although there might be terrible contests about the meaning or proper interpretation of the Bible, yet, judging from the past, there would be no doubt as to the supreme law authorizing or requiring the extinction of heretics. No matter what sect or party might succeed in obtaining control, the authority and duty of destroying the enemies of God—the heretics—could be clearly established from the Bible—the supreme law—and then the work of prosecution, of banishment, imprisonment, and death by fire and sword, would commence, and every vestige of freedom, of the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, will disappear. Any religious dogma whatever, inserted in the Constitution, will at once change the government from a government of equal rights, for the protection of all, into a government of tyranny and persecution, and deliver the people over to the tender mercy of a religious hierarchy. This is the meaning of the amendment, and is supported by many who know not what they do, for there is nothing equal to religious zeal and bigotry to blind the mind, harden the heart, and stupefy men to all sense of justice and regard for the rights of man. This will fully appear from the following extract from a religious newspaper:

"No other religion in the world, much less irreligion, can claim equal favor and advantage in this country with the Christian religion. It is time to assert the plain truth on this subject. Freedom of worship is right. If men choose to be pagans, let them be pagans. If they will be Infidels, let them be Infidels. But if they make such a choice they must do it without expecting to retain all the rights and privileges of Christians."

Thus ignoring the principles of equal rights, and manifesting the very spirit of persecution which has heretofore deluged Christendom in blood, and then, with an impudence peculiar to religious zealots and bigots, the people of this country are asked to change the government, and to allow the principles of equality and protection for all to be given up. In other words, to giv up the Constitution of the United States with all its glorious guarantees of freedom and equal rights; with the privilege of worshiping according to the dictates of conscience, and, instead thereof, substitute the Bible as the supreme law; the Bible under which the various hosts of Christians hav marshalled their forces, and found authority for exterminating and destroying one another; the Bible which contains authority for the various systems of government and misrule which hav prevailed in the old world, by which unnumbered millions hav been robbed and plundered; the Bible which authorized the Christians of this country to rob and plunder colored Americans and others as heathens round about who had no rights whatever; the Bible which has been authority for priests, and despots, and tyrants, in all their piracies upon the rights of man in Christendom for the last fifteen hundred years. And this is what we are asked to adopt as the supreme law in place of the Constitution of the United States.

But let the Bible become the supreme law, and under it, as heretofore, the priests will marshal their forces, and renew the contest between ecclesiastical tyranny and freedom, claiming the right to enforce their interpretation of the supreme law by banishment, imprisonment, and death, and the battle for freedom and human rights, and civil and religious liberty, will hav to be fought over again under circumstances in which nothing can be achieved but by revolution and blood. With the same Bible, the same dogmas, the same heaven and hell, the same human nature and scheme of redemption, history will repeat itself.

Buried Alive.

The frequency with which the above headline is seen is startling, and were every case known where people are buried alive, it would be still more so. It is estimated that one person in every five thousand is buried alive, and I see no reason to doubt it. It is but a few months since a young lady in Black River Falls, Wis., was prepared for burial, and while the funeral ceremony was in progress came to life. "Men turned pale with horror and women fainted." She said that while in a trance-like condition she realized with unspeakable agony that she was being prepared for the grave, but could not speak or make any motion whatever. Last November, in San Francisco, a man opened his eyes fifteen minutes after he was pronounced dead and his heart had ceased to beat, and said: "No, I don't die this time. They are not ready just yet for me in heaven, but you may as well prepare everything, for I will soon leave you." After he had been laid out by the undertaker, the corpse arose almost upright and then sank back to move no more. Up to the time of his burial his cheeks retained a natural and rosy color, but in less than two days they put him under the sod. I believe he was buried alive. February 12th, this year, a young lady of Okonoko Level, Virginia, dreamed that a lady associate of hers who was buried three days before was alive, and to satisfy her the grave was opened, and unmistakable signs found that she was alive when buried and became conscious afterward. March 21st, in Freeport, Ohio, a young man of sixteen years apparently died, and was prepared for the grave. He presented such a lifelike appearance that the coffin was opened at the grave to satisfy his mother. A slight moisture was observed, and the body was removed to a house, where after several hours' labor the boy was restored to consciousness. From Mount Clemens, Mich., comes this report: Mrs. Charles Bollensen, aged seventy years, suddenly expired of heart disease, as was supposed. The funeral took place and the body was buried. It presented so lifelike an appearance that it caused much comment, and after being in the grave two days was taken up. It was placed in a room with a uniform temperature of 75°, and not the slightest traces of decomposition could be observed. What was eventually demonstrated I hav not learned. Last year a case of suspended animation puzzled the doctors of Leadville, Colorado. A boy eight years old, whom a doctor was called to see, was found lying in bed wearing all the appearance of death. There was no sensible respiration, no pulse, no motion of the heart, no feeling, but a convulsiv motion of the right eyelid indicated that life was not extinct. He was pricked with needles, and a galvanic battery applied to his most sensitiv parts, but without creating the least impression. After being in that condition twenty-four hours he revived and came out of it.

Now, here are facts enough to show that too much caution cannot be manifested in disposing of the dead, for of all the conceivable horrors, what is worse than being buried alive? As a Spiritualist, I am much puzzled to know why such burials are permitted, for mediums are numerous enough to enable spirits to communicate with the friends of the supposed dead, and by so doing such horrid suffering might be prevented. I am a firm believer in spirit existence and power, but I must confess that all the good spirits hav ever done, outside of settling the question of a future existence, is mighty little. How they can be so heartless, unless powerless, as to see a human being consigned to the grave before life is extinct passes my comprehension. They talk about their desire to do good and benefit humanity, but it all ends in talk; and much needless suffering they might prevent is not hindered in the least. In view of these facts, as well as for sanitary reasons, I am in favor of cremation. Between suffocation in a burial case six feet under ground, and almost instant separation of the body and spirit in a cremation furnace, there can be but one choice; and to prevent these awful cases referred to, if for no other reason, cremation should become general everywhere.

"Thou Shalt Not Steal."

To steal, according to Webster, means, "To take and carry away feloniously, as the personal goods of another; to take without right or leave;" accordingly we may say that to steal means the taking of anything for one's exclusiv use to which he has no exclusiv claim.

It is plain, therefore, that to discuss the question of stealing intelligently, we must first decide what constitutes an exclusiv claim to anything. It is evident that there are things to which we all hav a claim, but to which no person can establish an exclusiv claim. Air, the oceans and great lakes, and sunlight, are among the things to which no one person lays any exclusiv claim, and consequently no person is charged with stealing for taking what he wants of these things. If wealthy men could buy up exclusiv claims to these things it would reduce the poor man to a much more lamentable condition than he occupies at present. Where, then, shall we draw the line of distinction between things owned exclusivly by individuals and things to which we all hav equal claims? Different nations hav drawn this line differently. The North American Indians admitted that the person who killed the deer had the exclusiv right to him; the person who built a wigmam had the exclusiv right to it; but they did not acknowledge anyone's exclusiv right to the land any more than we do anyone's exclusiv right to the air. In Japan, also, the oldest nation in the world, no person claims the exclusiv right to land. With us there are two methods of obtaining exclusiv rights to things. The first is the claim of having produced it, and this means, in the case of wild animals, the catching or the killing of them; in the case of wild fruits, the gathering of them; in the case of minerals, the finding of them, and taking of them from the earth. In short, this claim means that the owner is entitled to the exclusiv claim, because the thing was secured by his labor. Our claim to things of this kind has been so long and so universally acknowledged that we do not need deeds of any kind to confirm it. But with regard to land it is different. No man can claim the exclusiv use of land on the ground of having made it. When we ask the man who forbids us to trespass on a certain piece of land why he does so, he does not say he made the land, but he shows us a deed of the land from the government, giving to him and his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns the exclusiv use of that piece of land forever. The claim is that the government either gave or sold the land to him. Until this deed from the government is given for the land it is called government or public land. We therefore find that there are two kinds of property in the world; the one is from its very nature and origin private property; it belongs to the person who produced, made, or secured it; the other from its nature and origin is public property, because it is not produced, made, or secured by anyone. The one class of things we call products of labor, because they hav been procured by labor; the other we call natural things because they were produced without labor. To the first class of things we acknowledge that the laborer has the exclusiv right of possession. But we all agree that all other things originally belong to the public, that is, they belong as much to one person as to another. The next question to consider is whether the government has a right to sell this public property, and make it private property.

Suppose three men lived upon an island from which none of them could escape, would it be right of any two of them to vote to put the island up for sale, and then buy it in, depriving the third man of all right to liv on the island, and either driving him into the ocean or else compelling him to labor as their slave? Hav a majority of the people a right to deprive a minority of their natural rights? But suppose the three men should all agree to divide the island equally among the three, and then suppose some other unfortunate man should be cast on shore, what would they do with him—make another division of the island, drive him back into the sea, or make him a slave? Hav the three men who landed first on the island any better right to it than the one who landed there last? Similarly, hav the men now living on this continent any better right to it than the child to be born on it to-morrow? Has the government any right to make public property private property? Has any person any moral right to take the exclusiv possession of public property? It is admitted that no person has the right to take possession of private property without the consent of its owner, and it is called stealing so to do. Has any person any right to take possession of public property without the consent of all the owners? And has any government or people the moral right to sell the property of any part of the people and deprive them and unborn generations of men of all right to that which was originally their inheritance? These are questions that should be fairly met and honestly answered.

It is fair to consider the governments as the trustees of the public welfare. It is their duty to see that no person is wronged in either person or estate. It is their duty to see that the weak, whether physically or mentally, are not injured by the strong. It is their duty to see that no person is deprived of his natural rights. Life, for example, is acknowledged to be a natural right, and it is admitted that it is the duty of the government to see that no person is deprived of that right. But, since access to land is necessary to life, it should be the duty of government to see that no person is denied access to land, and that all persons should hav equal ease of access to land.

We do not acknowledge any degrees in our right to life. We hold that one person has as good a right to life as another. But our chances of living are in proportion to our chances of access to the means of livelihood. Now, since all our means of livelihood come from land, we may say that our chances of living are in proportion to our ease of access to land, or in proportion to the size or value of land which we hav access to. When the United States government gave 15,000 acres of land to some of the soldiers of the Revolution and only 100 acres to others, they gave the one man one hundred and fifty times as good a chance to liv as another; and now we find some citizens hav the exclusiv use of more than 4,000,000 acres of land, and about 4,000,000 who are deprived of all right to it. It is absurd to speak of such people as having equal rights to life. Indeed, it is absurd to speak of people as having any right to liv who hav no right of access to land, and, consequently, no access to the means of subsistence.

But some will say that people would not improve land unless they could own it. People improve land who labor on it, and no person can improve it who does not labor. In this country there are about fifteen people who do not own land for every one who does. Those who own land do not, on the average, labor any harder than those who do not. In Great Britain only one person in three thousand owns land, and of those who own land very few labor at all.

In this country there are about 4,000,000 farms, and of these 1,500,000 are cultivated by tenants, and the number of tenant farmers to landlord farmers is constantly increasing. It is therefore not true that people will not labor on land unless they own it; for land now is much oftener improved by tenants and hired help then by the owners. We find by experience that people will labor on land and improve it with no better title to it then an annual lease of it. Indeed, we find that those who lease land are very much more certain to improve it than those who buy it; for the latter often let it lie for years without improving it at all, but the former do not.

Now, if we bear in mind that thieves are those who hav taken possession of property that they hav no valid claim to, and that people who hav been robbed are those who hav been deprived of that which justly belonged to them, what shall we say of the present state of society? Our greatest robbers are not those locked up in our prisons, nor those outlaws who are hunted down by the police like wild beasts, but they are our landlords who are living like princes on the labor of others. They hold the exclusiv right to use property that does not justly belong to them, and it is property that has been taken unjustly from the great mass of the people. It has been done legally, but when a man gets property that he has no right to hav, the manner of his getting it does not lessen the moral evil, and when a man is robbed of what justly belongs to him, it matters not to him how it is done. Landlords and landless people must forever stand to each other in the relation of robbers and robbed. J. G. MALCOLM,

Remarks on Spirits, Including a Challenge.

I presume it cannot be disputed that man came naked into the world, and naked must he depart. Peradventure a shroud may envelop his form, and so far as finite can know, when dead it ends all and ends the individuality of the person. The elements of which the body is composed separate and are eliminated into other forms and things, and are absorbed into and become a part of the fountain head. I presume this view will not or cannot be denied successfully, and is the sum and substance of all we know or hav the proof, belief to the contrary notwithstanding. Of what use is it to talk, argue, fight, and persecute for ideas born of things that surround us desired and hoped for? No one in all the ages past or present was ever known to know anything about it. A person dying happy in believing, or a person dying unhappy, proves nothing.

Man knows nothing about it, imagination proves nothing, and he is as blind as before. It is an assumptiv absurdity for either so-called Christian or Spiritualist to talk about another world existing beyond death, where spirits (made from desire, hope, or belief) reside, when either or both do not know, will never know, unless there is a general revelation. All such wild and nonsensical ravings rest on a foundation made of desire and hope to not lose himself or herself in nature, and only end in a vain belief or desire to perpetuate forever one's identity. Every person has the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, but no creeds, Christian or Spiritual, hav a moral right to impose upon the minds of innocence or ignorance.

Materialists ask for proof. Do they giv it? No. Hav they ever proved it? No. Are you not a production of nature? Yes. Were you born in and on this planet? Yes. Then, what is there of you that is immortal and will liv forever? Answer: My soul. How do you know you hav a soul? I don't know for a very fact, but I believe I hav one. Has soul belief ever been proven? No. So is ever reason set aside and asseveration and assumption admitted and believed, and both are possessed of spirit superstition. Christians believe in their fetich, the Bible. A Spiritualist says spirits exist, and can return under conditions, materialize, take on the semblance of the dead, and reveal themselvs to their friends, walk and talk, and the like. All this I flatly deny, and ask the proof. Spiritualism is an outgrowth of creeds. Materializing, slate-writing, are false, and made up of chicanery and tricks. All mediums must hav conditions. Condition means a trick or a chance to play the trick or jugglery. Anyone who wants conditions, mark them down as a fraud. If there are any spirits floating around, and ready to let their friends know of it, they can manifest themselvs as well in daylight as in darkened rooms, and can materialize as well. If mediums say it is impossible, put it down as a cheat.

I challenge any medium, Christian, conjurer, or necromancer on earth to materialize my parents now dead—to be done in daylight with blinds up in a room I shall select—and will put up two thousand dollars. I will giv any person five hundred dollars who will cause a weight of twenty-five pounds to be raised six inches from the floor, the mediun sitting ten feet from the weight, and one hundred dollars to anyone who will cause a pebble the size of a marble to rise from the open palm of my hand. Now is the chance for any medium to fill his purse. (I am honest and hav the funds.) They may as well bring along his or her friendly spirits who manifest. To say darkness is essential I do not believe. That is where deceit comes in, and where the tricks are played on the simpleton. Mediums and the like are very cunning, and say spirits cannot manifest except under certain conditions—lights turned down, sitting behind screens and blankets, and other ways. I am a Materialist; when the breath departs, my belief is that my individuality is ended. People may talk science and metaphysics, and sit and listen to learned disquisitions on life and spirits, and you may be in your opinion more learned than a Solomon, or, like the blusterer Joe Cook, place the germs of life and string them along the nerves here and there like villages along the line of a railroad; but, to sum it up, you are utterly ignorant of what you are talking about. You know nothing about it. Materialism is all we know to be a fact. Death ends all as far as we know, and so far as mortal can know; all else is assumption, a guess, and has no foundation in fact. It is a vain delusion, and, so far as we know, a lie, and will remain so until proven. All we are is nature, all we can be before and after death, so far as proven by facts, ends in nature. Nothing, through all ages, has ever produced a something, and something cannot be made out of nothing. Such ideas is insanity. J. BURGESS.

Canadian Note.

Last Sunday evening, while the congregation of the Presbyterian church at Gananoque, Ont., were assembled to worship the almighty "Gawd," said "Gawd" got mad at something the preacher said, and struck the sacred edifice with lightning. There was some tall praying for a few minutes, but when they found that only a few panes of glass had been broken, and the door slightly damaged, they went on with their show. Had any of our hotels been struck, it would hav been taken by the "unco guid" as evidence that their "Gawd" was down on the liquor traffic, or had any of the residences of our Freethinkers been struck, it would hav been a dispensation of providence, a just judgment for their Infidelity.

A young man, a son of one of the elders of the church, was laid out by the flash. Had one of our Agnostics fallen, it would hav been a punishment for doubting the inspired word (revised edition) of the great Almighty. That is the way Christians reason, and oh! how they growl at having the tables turned. Of course, no sensible person believes that lightning has any more affinity for Christians than it has for Agnostics, but it makes all the difference in the world "whose ox is gored." It is to be hoped that this will be a lesson in charity to the bigots.

"Though I hav all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and hav not charity, I am nothing."

"Charity suffereth long and is kind. Charity vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; is not easily provoked; thinketh no evil."

"Charity never faileth. If I hav not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

A New Picture.

Not wishing to crowd out all our correspondents, we hav this week given up the editorial pages to a vivid pictorial contrast of Science and Theology, showing how the church has fought the former all through her long career. After Luther—who builded infinitly better than he knew—had nailed his document of insubordination to the church door at Wittenberg, Catholicism had power sufficient to commit the body of Giordano Bruno to the flames. When Morse and Stephenson made their inventions which revolutionized the civilization of the world, the ex-president of Cornell College relates that sermons such as our artist has indicated were preached from Protestant pulpits. In connection with these inventions it may not be amiss to recall the fact that the first steamship which crossed the ocean carried to Liverpool an elaborate argument, in pamphlet form, by an eminent churchman against the possibility of steam propelling a ship to England. Denunciatory sermons were the extent of the church's power to harm in those days. To-day the last argument against Freethought is the one Talmage wished to employ against Colonel Ingersoll—a warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The difference between Science and Theology is nowhere seen plainer than in contrasting the leaders in the modern scientific philosophy with what is perhaps the most activ missionary body in the Protestant church—the Salvation Army.

Our artist has done his work well. The likenesses are all good, and better characterizations of the brutal churchmen who almost ruined this world will be hard to find. Even the cavernous orifice across the face of Brooklyn's pulpit clown is delineated with fidelity. As a group of likenesses the picture is abundantly worth preserving. As a short and easy lesson in history for Christians the picture is worth a whole library.

Anticipating a great demand for this work of art, we hav printed extra copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and shall also print the picture separately. Single copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER are 7 cents; in quantities of five and over, 5 cents each. On heavy tinted paper, in the style of "The Modern Balaam," we can send the picture post-paid in rolls secure from breakage in the mails, at prices as follows: Six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; and one hundred for $3. We hope to hav large orders.

Were the Abolitionists Infidels?

We noted last week that Oliver Johnson had contradicted the assertion of the editor of the Christian Advocate that Wm. Lloyd Garrison partly rejected Christianity, and that Elizur Wright and Parker Pillsbury did so wholly, and noted also that Dr. Buckley (who, let us say parenthetically, is the most interesting contemporary Christian we know of) had agreed to substantiate his charge. This he has done in the Advocate of July 2d.

As this is a question of historical importance, it may not be amiss to transfer the testimony of this Christian, with such other as we may hav, to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The leading men in the antislavery struggle—when it was unpopular, and its advocacy rewarded with more rotten eggs than good words—were Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Henry C. Wright, Parker Pillsbury, Stephen S. Foster, Elizur Wright, Wendell Phillips, Henry Ward Beecher, Ezra H. Heywood, Orson S. Murray, and others. The theology of Phillips and Beecher is well enough known. Heywood to-day has more heresies than any other man in America. Orson S. Murray died last month, "a noted Infidel." Elizur Wright, as the editor of the Advocate truly says, "has been for many years an open opponent of Christianity." He needs no introduction to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The dispute between Dr. Johnson and Dr. Buckley is warmest over Wm. Lloyd Garrison. The orthodoxy of Mr. Garrison has ever been one of Dr. Johnson's hobbies. To assert that Garrison was an Infidel acts upon the ex-editor of the Independent as a red flag upon the male bovine. Last year Mr. Johnson, in the Christian Union, denied that the Garrisonian Abolitionists were carried away into Infidelity, or abandoned the Bible, or lost faith in Christianity. "The vast majority of them," he said, "believed in Christianity and the Bible under definitions which satisfied their own judgment and conscience." Possibly this may hav been true, but if so, it must hav been in the sense in which N. P. Rogers accepted the Bible. "I do not believe the Bible upholds slavery," said Mr. Rogers, "but if it does, then the Bible must go."

That in his early years Garrison was orthodox no one denies. Yet Dr. Johnson himself admits that from 1838 to 1845 his opinions underwent great change. In his article denying Garrison's Infidelity, Dr. Johnson says:

> "That Mr. Garrison's religious opinions underwent a great change between 1838 and 1845, or thereabouts, I do not deny; but that change was the result of a close study of the New Testament, especially of the gospels."

This change found expression in the resolutions offered by him in the Convention Against Churches held in Boston, October 26th, 1841, as follows:

> "'Resolved, That the true church is independent of all human organizations, creeds, or compacts.' 'Resolved, That it is not within the province of any man or body of men to admit or to exclude from that church any one who is created in the divine image.' In speaking to that he said: 'The Lord's freemen are independent of all organizations.' In another convention he said: 'For myself, I hav no reverence for wood and mortar. The only sanctuary I need is Christ. The Sabbath is not necessary for man or beast. Who says it is but the overworker of himself and beast?'"

Dr. Buckley might hav supplemented this by a quotation from Dr. Johnson himself, in a letter written in reply to La Roy Sunderland, published in the Boston Index of September 11, 1884. Mr. Johnson says:

> "Mr. La Roy Sunderland thinks Mr. Garrison had no faith in the Bible as a 'supernal' or 'supernatural' revelation. Who says he had? Certainly, I hav made no such affirmation. Again, Mr. Sunderland says Mr. Garrison 'was not at the close of his life a Christian.' According to orthodox creeds, he certainly was not; but, according to a better and truer definition, he was one of the grandest Christians that ever lived. So that he was able to say, with profound sincerity, in 1851, years after he had discarded the doctrin of the infallible inspiration of the Bible: 'I am a Christian: Why do you represent me as an Infidel? I am a lover of Christian institutions: why do you accuse me of seeking their overthrow?'"

It seems to us that this is conceding all that Dr. Buckley claimed—that Garrison partly rejected Christianity. But there is in print a later utterance of Mr. Garrison, which shows that if in 1851 he had discarded the doctrin of the infallible inspiration of the Bible, in 1865 he had reverted to "primitiv Christianity," a belief widely divergent from the Christianity of to-day or of his day. The last number of Garrison's Liberator was printed December 29, 1865. In his valedictory, Garrison said, in recounting the various positions the paper had taken:

> "No journal has vindicated primitiv Christianity in its spirit and purpose—"the higher law"—in its supremacy over nations and governments, as well as individual conscience—the Golden Rule, in its binding obligation upon all classes—the Declaration of Independence, . . . and none has gone beyond it in asserting the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

There is nothing in this that can be distorted into an acceptance of any of the various phases of modern Christianity. A "primitiv Christian" is now generally regarded as a crank. The Golden Rule is not Christian—it is Buddhistic. The belief in the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man is certainly not exclusivly Christian. William Ellery Channing said of the Abolitionists that they were as strongly disposed to accept Christian precepts as any body of people he knew. So far as Christian precepts follow the Golden Rule, doubtless this is true. But that Garrison, in his later years, accepted Christian tenets and creeds, there is no evidence, while there is evidence, direct and circumstantial, that he did not. When Garrison and Pillsbury were working in the Abolition cause in New Hamphire, they had theological controversies with the Rev. Rufus A. Putnam, father of Samuel P. Putnam, now secretary of the National Liberal League. Rufus A. Putnam preached at Epsom, N. H., and was a rigidly strict Calvinist, though an Abolitionist. We hav the testimony of his son that both Garrison and Pillsbury were regarded by him and his fellow-Christians as entirely outside the pale of Christianity. Further evidence is had in Mr. Garrison's conduct of the Liberator. During the latter part of 1864 and first of 1865, Leicester A. Sawyer, who conducted the "First Catholic Congregational church," of Boston, wrote in the Liberator a series of articles on "Rationalism." Mr. Sawyer was really a full-fledged Infidel, and was violently attacked by the New York Observer. Mr. Sawyer must hav had the sympathy of Mr. Garrison, who was very quick to repudiate anything he disliked that crept into his paper in his absence, or through inadvertence, and, of course, would not hav addmitted Mr. Sawyer so continuously had he not agreed with him in the main. We find also a correspondent—"C. K. W." (Cyrus K. Wright)—whose communications were always leaded like the editorial, and generally placed alongside it. "C. K. W." was very radical for those times. In the Liberator of March 10, 1865 he unreservedly commends a sermon by A. B. Bradford against the God-in-the-Constitution memorial which was then being circulated among the people of Pennsylvania. Mr. Bradford is well-known as an outspoken Infidel.

The Liberator was, in fact, conducted on a basis too broad for the supposition that its editor could hav been a modern Christian. It was a tolerably good Freethought journal—with Theistic leanings—but certainly as advanced as the Index. We do not see how this could hav been without Mr. Garrison's approval, and his approval could not hav been had, had he not agreed with the views of his heretical contributors. That Mr. Garrison was an Atheist no one can claim. He was firm in his faith in God and immortality, and there is some evidence that he was a Spiritualist. One article, at least, in an issue of the Liberator during 1863, would giv color to that claim. Probably Luther Colby can giv some information on this point.

The truth of the matter is that while Garrison began the antislavery struggle an orthodox Christian, he emerged from it with his faith terribly shaken. As he tells us in the Liberator of January 6, 1865, he entered into the struggle confidently looking, "in our simplicity and truthfulness, to the leading men in church and state—especially in the church and among the clergy, whom we had been taught to reverence—to go forward, assume its responsibilities, meet its issues, and receive the laudation. But it did not take us long to be undeceived in the matter. No matter how tender the appeals in behalf of the oppressed; no matter how undeniable their claims to sympathy and relief; no matter how fundamental and time-honored the principles enunciated in opposition to such a barbarous institution; no matter how exemplary their conduct, or humane and Christian the sentiments avowed by the antislavery men and women of the day; these were all met with bitter denunciation, coarse ridicule, religious anathema, fiery persecution, mobocratic violence, and universal proscription." Such treatment, one would think, would be enough to force him to renounce a religion whose leaders so universally reviled him and the cause he was advocating.

About Parker Pillsbury's orthodoxy there can be no dispute, and it impeaches Dr. Johnson's accuracy upon the other points to say "he is a worshiper in a Christian church." For years, Mr. Pillsbury worked with the Freethinkers, and ceased to take activ part only because of a personal difference with Colonel Ingersoll, with whom he was formerly very intimate. He has now accepted the philosophy of Theosophy, but is no less a skeptic to Christianity, but rather more. He attended the last Congress of the National Liberal League, though taking no part in the proceedings. There is no need of quoting the following from Dr. Buckley except to show what that eminent Methodist regards as comprising Christianity:

> "If he will say that he believes the gospel narrativ of the incarnation of our Lord—that Jesus had not a human father, that the Old Testament is inspired of God, that Jesus in any sense suffered for the sins of men as a propitiation, or anything analogous thereto; that he has not affiliated with the Freethinkers and open opponents of Christianity—indeed, that he holds any single doctrin peculiar to Christianity—so far from being unwilling to make that fact known, it would giv us great pleasure to publish it. Having followed his public career item by item for almost thirty years, we think that nothing he may say will surprise us."

Henry C. Wright was an Infidel. Dr. Buckley says he has heard him "speak definitly against the 'churches,' the 'créeds,' the 'doctrins,' the 'bibliolatry,' the 'intellectual tyranny,' of Christianity. Closing a speech by saying that he wanted to go where some one to whom he referred, who was a rejecter of Christianity, had gone, said Mr. Wright: 'You may call it hell, or you may call it heaven, it makes no difference to me.'" Volumes of testimony from the older Freethinkers and Abolitionists of the country could be adduced to the same effect.

Of Stephen S. Foster Dr. Buckley says:

"Stephen S. Foster we often heard, also, and his wife, Abby Kelly, and once asked them if they believed a certain most savage attack on churches, creeds, and almost everything else ordinarily held sacred, for which they had just then voted. They said, 'Yes!' Mr. Johnson says, 'Mr. Foster, especially, was a shining example of the self-sacrifice and obedience which Christianity enjoins.' Yet this man says of the Methodist Episcopal church that 'it is more corrupt and profligate than any house of ill-fame in the city of New York.'

"In his 'Brotherhood of Thieves," page 43, he says: 'I regard every intelligent communicant in the Methodist church as more guilty and infamous in the sight of God than the common prostitute, the pickpocket, or the assassin.'

"In the same work he attacks other denominations by name, even the Society of Friends, calling them 'thieves,' 'murderers,' 'adulterers,' 'man-stealers,' 'pirates,' etc. Stephen S. Foster was the man who went into the meetings of the different churches, disturbing their assemblies, and abusing them in the style which we hav just quoted. When he went into a certain meeting of the Society of Friends he had with him N. P. Rogers, the editor of the Herald of Freedom.

"In number 356 of the Herald, Rogers describes the scene thus: 'Foster immediately mounted into the very High Seat itself—that Quaker citadel and holy of holies, where Friends themselvs may not mount and liv—and with amazing audacity got up and stood on his feet on their cushioned seat, where the ancient overseers sit. He called out to them [they retiring] to witness him treading on their High Places, and he walked to and fro before their eyes, and called to William Bassett to bring him Edward Burroughs's testimony to the right of entering the synagog and speaking without leave of the priesthood. There they stood, beholding him profaning their very deities.' Is this Mr. Oliver Johnson's idea of 'the shining example of the self-sacrifice and obedience which Christianity enjoins?'"

Mr. Johnson having said that La Roy Sunderland seceded from the American Antislavery Society in 1840, Dr. Buckley givs the reason. It was because "he was not sufficiently astray then to endure all the attacks on religion that were then being made by most of the leading members of that body. But he subsequently declared in print and in private that he had already begun to incline toward Freethinking. He considered his Infidelity a great thing, and spoke of the good his associates unwittingly did him. . . . We affirm that Mr. Sunderland's association with the men referred to had much to do with preparing him first to renounce the church, and finally the gospel itself, though it was not the only nor the chief cause."

One of the unkindest things that Dr. Buckley throws up to Mr. Johnson is his (Mr. Johnson's) own apostasy. Mr. Buckley says:

"The only reason that we did not include Mr. Oliver Johnson himself with those whose influence had much to do in preparing Mr. Sunderland to renounce the church, at least, is that we did not find that he had any close personal relations with him. For this gentleman is the same Oliver Johnson, we believe, who wrote to the Congregational church of Middlebury, Vt, Feb. 25, 1839, as follows: 'The events of a few years past hav forced upon my mind the conviction that their [the churches'] overthrow, and not their reformation, "is registered in the scroll of Destiny." They appear to me, with their formidable array of creeds, forms, ceremonies, and observances, to be the rubbish which hides the pure principles of the gospel,' etc."

Altogether, we think the orthodox Dr. Buckley has got the better of the unorthodox Dr. Johnson. To conceal that this affords us intense gratification would not be fair. It is very strong evidence in support of our claim that those men who hav pushed along the "car of progress" hav in all ages been Infidels of one degree or another, and hav been anathematized by the conservativ religious folk. Having helped to show that the leading Abolitionists were Infidels, we trust Dr. Buckley will now proceed, in his clean-cut and forcible English, to giv the history of the Northern and Southern churches in the antislavery struggle, and set at rest the claim by the more ignorant or dishonest church-members that the negro is indebted to Christianity for his freedom. A perusal of the early files of the Liberator, now in the Astor Library in this city, will afford him ample material, and he will be materially assisted by Parker Pillsbury's "Acts of the Antislavery Apostles," and James G. Birney's pamphlet "The American Churches the Bulwark of American Slavery." The records of the Methodist church, more accessible to him than to an Infidel, will help him wonderfully.

Editorial Notes.

Our "Theological Department" this week is replete with news not found in the religious papers. The ministers, just at this season, are many of them away on their vacations, and their doings are chronicled in foreign papers, if at all. We hav thus taken advantage of their absence to catch up with the procession. These cases printed are not by any means all that hav come to our notice. Quite a number of similar clippings blew out of the window, and we let them go in serene confidence that equally appropriate ones would appear to replace them. We were not disappointed. Other springs dry up during a drouth; the fountain of pious rascality is perennial.

South American countries are pretty badly off. In Lima, for a population of about 100,000, there are 126 Catholic churches, and 12 monasteries and convents; and the same religious privileges extend all over Peru. There are two Protestant churches in the republic. In Chili the Catholic church controls the population in almost the commonest affairs of life, and the result is seen in the great amount of immorality prevalent. In one "orphan" asylum in a city of two hundred thousand inhabitants, there are two thousand children of unknown parentage. There is a very convenient mode for the disposition of foundlings. In the rear wall surrounding the place is an aperture, with a wooden box or cradle, which swings out and in. A mother who has no use for her baby goes there at night, places the little one in the cradle, swings it inside, and the nuns on guard, hearing a bell, which rings automatically, go out and take the infant to the nursery. The next morning the mother, if she has no occupation to detain her, goes to the front door and applies for employment as a wet nurse, always relating the pitiful story of a lost child. Last year, says a correspondent of a city daily, the official statistics gave 62 per cent of the children born as illegitimate; only a small proportion were of unknown parentage, according to the records, as the majority came from the lower classes. The responsibility for this rests with the church. Until recently only religious marriages were allowed, and the church placed a tax on the ceremony of some twenty-five dollars, a sum few Chilian peons ever possessed. The Liberal party, which is fighting Romanism in Chili, as in the other South American republics, has pased a law establishing civil marriage as the only legitimate one, and authorizing any magistrate to perform the ceremony and furnish a certificate for twenty-five cents. This assault upon the ancient prerogativ of the church, depriving the priests as it did of one of their largest sources of revenue, called out an indignant remonstrance from the faithful, and the political issue in Chili to-day is the repeal of that law. The archbishop issued an edict excommunicating the president of the republic, the members of his cabinet, and the members of Congress who voted for the statute, and directing that a similar penalty be visited upon every communicant who obeyed it and neglected to recognize the church as the only authority competent to solemnize marriage vows. This, says the correspondent, brought matters to a crisis. On the one hand, the state declared all marriages not under the civil law illegal, and their issue illegitimate, refusing to recognize rites performed by the priests. On the other, those who obey the law are excommunicated from the church, and their cohabitation forbidden by the highest ecclesiastical authority. Thus matrimony is practically forbidden, and those who choose to enter it hav their choice between arrest and excommunication. Two instances are given of the bitterness with which the fight between church and state is being waged. A young member of Congress, a man of gifts and influence, who stands as one of the leaders of the Liberal party, and who voted and argued for civil marriage, is engaged to the daughter of a wealthy merchant with proud lineage and aristocratic connections. He is willing to accept the civil authority, which he helped to create, and she and her father are also willing, but her mother is a devout churchwoman, and cannot regard marriage as sacred without the blessing of a priest. She favors the alliance, but insists that the church shall be recognized. The bishop declines to permit the ceremony unless the young man shall go to the confessional and retract his political record, with a vow to hereafter remain steadfast to the church. This he refuses to do. The couple will go to Europe on the States and there hav the ceremony performed. The other case occurred in the city of Concepcion. A young couple in similar circumstances were married according to the civil law, with the consent of their parents. Their social and political prominence made the affair conspicuous, particularly as it was the first wedding in high life in all that country where the representativ of the church did not appear. The Catholic organ, which is edited by a Jesuit priest, commented upon the affair by saying: "The Libertad calls this 'a happy union,' but it should remember that 'happy unions' of this sort hav hitherto existed only in the animal kingdom." There was much more of the same sort in the article, which aroused the indignation of the parties concerned, and the brother of the bride, meeting with the ecclesiastical editor, proceeded to giv him a drubbing that will probably result in making him a cripple for life. The bride and groom and all their families hav been excommunicated from the church, and the affair has given an intense heat to the political contest now going on, which in a few months will end in the election of a president.

The Tent.

Hickory Corners, Mich.—The object of the Tent effort is to do propaganda work—carry the glad tidings of truth and freedom to those who otherwise could never hav the advantage of a course of lectures on Secularism and would hardly be likely to hear of, much less be induced to read and study, our best Liberal papers and pamphlets.

Through the energy of that stanch, genial Liberal, Mr. Ed. Flansburg, we were induced to pitch the Tent in this village. It is admirably situated for our work, Augusta, Gull Lake, Bamfield, and Thomasville being within easy distance.

On Saturday, June 20th, aided by our stand-by, Elias H. Gault, we loaded the Tent and belongings upon a lumber wagon, ourself and baggage upon Mr. Flansburg's "Democrat," and rode eighteen miles, from Kalamazoo to Hickory Corners.

Sunday morning we pitched the Tent, which we had barely accomplished ere the rain descended in torrents and kept at it until late in the afternoon, preventing our giving the afternoon lecture as advertised. Sunday evening, despite cold and dark threatening clouds, we had a fair attendance.

Monday and Tuesday it was severely cold, yet our attendance increased. Not alone this village, but the country adjacent, is greatly excited. Secularism and the Bible is the one all-absorbing theme of discussion. The Liberal papers and pamphlets we hav distributed are eagerly taken, read, and loaned to others.

This is the busy time with farmers; they are working their hardest in the hay-field till dark, yet every night, weary though they be, they attend the lecture at the Tent, bringing their wives and families with them. It would be impossible to induce them to go into any building, but the Tent is cool, comfortable, and a novelty; and once they attend, the subjects presented hav irresistible attraction.

We advertised three lectures for Sunday—rather a severe tax on us, having to act as our own tent-master, but will-power eked out where physical faltered, and we had a most satisfactory and encouraging time, good attendance and deep interest. At the evening lecture, subject, "Heaven," the Tent was crowded, every seat being filled by deeply interested listeners.

If the Tent were folded up and did no more, the work accomplished on Sunday alone amply repaid all expense incurred and labor bestowed. Some came twenty miles. One lady from Vermont visiting friends here subscribed to The Truth Seeker and took a number of Liberal publications to send home. They had never learned aught of Secularism in her vicinity. Thus the good work reaches far and near.

The continued course of lectures enables us to deepen convictions, meet objections, and make permanent impressions, and the Liberal literature the Tent effort affords such excellent opportunity to judiciously distribute cannot fail to carry on the good work.

We are proclaiming the glad tidings of the Gospel of Humanity free to all, without money and without price, and no collections. Those who hav generously contributed to the Tent Fund will divide up our converts and hav them as stars in their crowns of rejoicing.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

In answer to many inquirers, we desire to positivly settle and arrange the route for our Tent up to September 11th, the grand Convention of the New York Freethinkers' Association at Albany, N. Y., from September 11th to 13th, and as that will be one of the most interesting and important meetings of Liberals ever held in the United States, we desire to arrange Tent route so as by September to be in easy reach of Albany.

We issue small hand-bills, and send copy, subject to suggestions and alterations by friends. It is always advisable to hav them printed by the local newspaper office.

A local notice in home papers is better than half a column advertisment. We send handsome painted posters.

We need nice level lot, 70x100, greensward preferred; can get along with 70x80.

We need the use of thirty-five or forty planks to make seats and platform. We pay for all damaged and return and pile back just as we found them.

We will not go to any place where the lot is not rented for full time of our stay, a dollar paid and receipt deposited with us. No matter if the lot is owned by the best Liberal that ever lived, this is our rule.

We always announce admission free, and positivly no collections.

We hav very comfortable cane-seated, easy-back, camp chairs, for those who desire, for use of which we make nominal charge of ten cents.

To equalize burdens, we recommend the sale of season tickets to admit lady and gentleman to whole course. As we prefer to stay over two Sundays in each place, this insures from fifteen to twenty lectures. With little effort seventy-five to one hundred tickets can be sold, and there is no heavy tax on any one; of course, where there are but few Liberals, we are willing to run all the risk and depend on the contributions to the Tent Fund, but we desire to reserve that fund for new fields and the distribution of Liberal literature. Of course, all Liberals will purchase tickets for their own use, and to giv to friends they are anxious should attend. Many people will go, being thus complimented, who otherwise would not. There are plenty of good seats free to all. This ticket system avoids taking up collection, and the orthodox horror of passing the hat.

Until Tent Fund increases, I shall do my own tent-master work, lecturing every night, distributing Liberal literature each day. Correspondents, outside important business of the National Liberal League or Pennsylvania State League, will please be lenient and excuse seeming neglect.

The Tent is, and must be continued, a grand success. Think of it, a few decades ago and Liberals could be all gathered in one house, lecturers could be counted on the fingers of one hand. To-day we hav a magnificent fifty-foot diameter Tent, and the grand truths of Secularism proclaimed nightly to immense crowds of intelligent, earnest people. Surely "it do move." Let all do what they can to help forward the good work. All who desire Tent effort, please address me at once at Ithaca, Mich.

Hickory Corners, Mich.—I strike Tent here on Monday morning, July 6th, and ship to Ithaca, Mich. I shall remain there until after Sunday, July 19th. Despite unfavorable weather and all farmers are busy in hay-fields, we hav good attendance, many coming over five miles to hear. Sunday; hav again announced three lectures: Morning, at 10:30; afternoon, at 2:30; evening, at 7:30. C. B. Reynolds.

Religion and the Labor Movement.

The social movement of the present time is said to be irreligious because it is unchristian; it denies the providence of God, and refuses to rest satisfied with the consolations promised by Christ. The clear assumption is that religion must be taken to be synonymous with Christianity, and that it is essential for a religion to hav faith in a supernatural and personal God. To say the least of it, people who can put forth such an objection at the present state of enlightenment in regard to the development of religion, are disqualified from their very mental configuration to grapple with any social question whatever. That great religion known as Buddhism, which comprises by far a larger number of followers than any other religion, has no recognition of God, and never speaks of a providence. The God of the Brahman has explicitly declared that the greatest mistake—his first, last, and only work—was the creation of the world, and he was so disgusted with the botch he produced that he has taken a life-long vow never to touch it any more. The attitude of the God of the Brahman toward his misconceived creation is one of utter indifference and sore compunction. It is the Christian God alone, the Jehovah of the Bible, that has always tried to meddle with the world, sent prophet after prophet, put forth scheme after scheme, each one destroying its predecessor, until the very name of religion has come to discredit in Christian countries; and it is in Christendom alone that you find, not mere speculativ Atheism as among the Hindoos and Buddhists, but Atheism of the rankest kind —open defiance of God.

While the facts of history show that belief in a God is not at all necessary for a religion, the proper object of which is to bind man to fellow-man, a little analysis will prove that all our conceptions of the deity are purely human, that the best God we hav yet been able to think of is but the prototype of the ideal man. As Emerson says, "to know God one must be a God," or, in other words, knowing God and becoming a godlike man are one and the same. It is only when a pretended revelation has come forward to supplement our unaided conceptions that the seeds of Atheism hav been sown. The pronounced Atheism of modern times would be altogether unnecessary but for the God revealed. Open defiance is thrown against his existence because he is represented as a God of thunder and fire, a God who preaches blood and practices damnation—because he is a God in the last degree inhuman.

The above remarks will make it clear how very much the so-called irreligion of Socialism is necessary. For if the best conception of God necessary to rouse our aspirations and direct our impulses to noble conduct is that of the ideal man, and the best heaven is an ideal society, with no suffering and sorrow, in which justice and love shall rule, the sole object of the labor movement is to constitute and realize the true religion of man by achieving an ideal society and giving circumstances favorable to the growth of the ideal man. It proposes to bring down the kingdom of heaven upon earth, while it means to do away forever with a hell, whether in this world or the next.

What, again, is this so-called providence? On analysis it will be found that the only beneficial providence in the growth of the world has been human providence, and not a special or divine one. When men, by using the best of human knowledge, judgment, and sympathies, hav provided for mankind, we hav had all that is good in society; but whenever a special or divine providence, crystallized in a priestcraft, has tried to meddle with human affairs, mischief has been the only result. It was human providence that directed the building of hospitals, schools, and colleges, that has encouraged science and spread education. It was divine providence that prompted the Inquisition, opposed science, burnt widows in India, and hanged old women in New England; that sanctified slavery as to-day it canonizes capitalism. It is human providence that encourages Sunday lectures, concerts, and music, that opens parks and museums on the Lord's day; it is divine providence that would oppose every one of these things. It is human providence that declared that all men are equal and brothers; it is divine providence that has set Hindoo against Mohammedan, Christian against Jew, Catholic against Protestant, burned Infidels and persecuted Hebrews—all for the love of God.

This truth about religion and providence that I hav been trying to explain is most unexpectedly borne out by even professing Christians, who hav the genuin man in them, unspoiled by the conceit of that queer revelation which in the average Christian so much perverts the brain and makes the heart so stale. The Rev. Mr. Kaufman, of England, who calls himself a Christian Socialist, a man of great learning, honesty, and earnestness, has an article in the current number of the London Contemporary Review entitled "Socialism and Atheism," in which he deplores very much what he calls the Materialistic, irreligious, destructiv, and revolutionary character of the social movement, and he earnestly hopes that, although the proletarians hav been detached from the church, they will return to it when they begin to understand that Christianity brings them freedom and equal rights, whereas Atheistic Materialism consecrates their slavery, and sacrifices them to pretended natural laws. He is greatly concerned over the dangers of such a tendency, and says that "nothing can therefore save society but the restitution of religious belief." But, most unconsciously to himself, he givs a definition of this true religion on the very same page that would satisfy the most rabid Socialist. He says—mark you his every word—the province of this religion should be "to direct society toward the grand design of the speedy amelioration of the class which is at once the poorest and the most numerous." That's first-rate. That's the sort of religion we want. And if that is true religion, then the true religion is contained, not in any of the old churches, but is just being born into life with the social movement of the time. It is the great object of Socialism to restore the true religion that the Rev. Mr. Kaufman is pining for—a religion which will direct society toward the grand design of ameliorating the condition of the poor, a religion purified for all time to come from the dross of superstition, the confusions of priestcraft, and the hoax of a revelation.

Having seen what true religion is, and that the present social movement is evoluting in society this religion, to be instituted as the religion of the world with the growth and success of that movement, we at once perceive that the labor question is bringing up a dangerous competitor to the religion of the church; it for the first time is bringing into sharp conflict the kingdom of earth with the so-called kingdom of heaven; we see that the faith of the labor movement is conquest of the earthly paradise, while the church seeks for a paradise in heaven. It is plain, therefore, that the church, as an official body, can never believe in the labor movement. I concede that individual ministers, like individuals of any other profession, are to be judged on their own special merits, and in proportion to their faith in our cause. But I propose here to answer the claim which has been put forth that the proper place for the solution of the problem is within the church, that the church in it has all the elements and principles for that end. We are going to start a new doctrin for the conduct of the world, and that is that salvation is to be attained by work, and not by faith alone. Whoever shall work for our kingdom of heaven, no matter whatever his faith, Christian, Infidel, Jew, or heathen, shall be saved and hav access to it; and whoever shall oppose the growth of the industrial idea will be, not exactly damned, for hell is not in our program, but, in the natural growth of humanity, extirpated from the face of the earth, as parasites and obstructions, with not a trace left to go even to hell.

The labor movement begins, as we hav seen, where the church ends, and their ways lie in directions exactly opposed to each other. It is very superficial to say that the social grievance is one of mere bread and butter for some men. The greatest apostles of the cause hav been far from poor men. Neither Karl Marx nor Lassale was poor when he took up the cause. St. Simon, Fourier, Cabet, Louis Blanc, Auguste Comte, Robert Dale Owen, George Jacob Holyoake, Frederic Harrison—none of these men ever felt the extreme pinch of poverty. The root-idea of the movement is the interests of justice and morality. Its origin is dissatisfaction with the ideas of human relation and duties, and the order of arrangement of the social classes of the present day, and its ultimate destination is a complete revolution in those ideas and in those orders. No mere milk-and-water philanthrophy, or a few crumbs of bread and plenty of pious consolations, will ever remove it. There will hav to be fundamental change of places, and revolution of ideas.

For the ultimate removal of the social grievances the labor movement demands that the best instincts, knowledge, sympathies, and activities of mankind should be devoted to its service. The church requires that these better qualities shall be invested to buy a ticket for heaven. The kingdom of earth and the kingdom of heaven are competitors for the complete possession of the human heart, and each demands absolute fidelity, and the whole of the small energies of man. The social movement says that the love of man and working for the kingdom of the earth are the only things in man's province, as man and world are the only things he has any knowledge about, and that the direction of our sympathies and energies otherwise is pure wate; it creates a diversion, brings in confusion and mischief by creating a breach between his sympathies and his activities. The church says exactly the reverse of all this.

The church is aristocratic in its history, constitution, and policy. It derives its authority from heaven above, which descends through a fixed hierarchy; while the labor movement is thoroughly democratic, and seeks its light from the abyss of life below. The director of the church is an omnipotent God; the labor movement takes its guidance from the misery and helplessness of man. The church seeks to pay homage to a God of the past; the labor question is purely humanitarian and devotes itself to the future of man. The church exists for the glory of a God that is dead; the labor question has arisen for the sake of the man yet unborn. The ways and ends of the two are opposed as the poles. The one is the very antithesis of the other. The church will, by and by, go to heaven, as it wants to (for I don't wish it to go to the other place, where it wishes me to go), while the labor movement will continue the progress of the world.

The logic of the church is extermination of the earth; the idea of the labor movement is an everlasting world. In one word, the labor question will be the test question between the religion of God and the religion of Man. It will bring in an institution that will accomplish what the church has failed to do, but has professed to despise—the regeneration of man upon earth.

I would here remind some goody-goody friends of the labor movement who are highly sensitiv on the question of the church, and hav quite an exalted idea of its grand mission, that wherever the labor movement has taken a pronounced form it is positivly hostil to the church, and Christian Socialism grew up in Germany to be a check to the movement of Marx and Lassale. The Social Democrat, the organ of the German Socialists, says that Christianity and Socialism are as fire and water. "God is the first traitor and the king is the second," says the extreme Socialist. Karl Marx, who was something more than a mere demagog, and was a philosopher to the core, says: "The evident proof of the radicalism of the German theory, and thus of its radical energy, is its starting-point from the decisiv, positiv abolition of religion" (by which, of course, he meant a supernatural religion). The Knights of Labor at its beginning excluded doctors, politicians, and rumsellers from its membership, and now it is beginning to boycott clergymen. The labor movement is a revolt against the social order with which the church is bound up and identified.

Talking over the church question, I was told by no less intelligent a man than James Redpath that the attitude of the people in this country toward the church is one of indifference, and that it cannot be of much importance as a factor in politics. While I fully agree with Mr. Redpath that the people are indifferent toward the church—so much the worse for the church, since it shows that it has lost influence as a moral power—yet the church can be a very powerful factor in politics, when it wants to, by being the tool of the money power, with which it has always been bound. Mr. Redpath knows very well that one of the strongest oppositions he as an Abolitionist had to encounter was from the hypocritical religion of the church. The church has not yet taken a decisiv attitude in regard to the labor movement in this country, because the labor movement has not yet become a coherent moral force. It is in embryo yet. Every moral force arising outside of the church is another nail in the coffin of the old dame, and must count upon her interference, if not opposition. It is a declaration of the moral inefficiency of a played-out ecclesiasticism. The church, like every other institution in the present system, feels the pressure of competition, and, like all who desire to gain power under that system, does not scruple to use unscrupulous means. In Germany Christian Socialism was started to take the wind out of the sail of the Socialism proper, and to divert the movement from its true end. Here in this country there are already signs of the cloven foot.

Christian Socialism is bosh. One might as well speak of conservativ radicalism. The church is committed to the existing order, while the primary idea of the Social movement is a revolution. Let no one start at the name of revolution. It does not necessarily mean blood and fire, but always a revolution in ideas.

Revolution is but the parturition of society after a pregnancy of sorrow, and the coming of a new-born babe. It is a process quite natural and healthy, though not without its risks. New conceptions are growing in the womb of life, and their birth is indicated by an outbreak whose character is determined by the existing obstacles against safe delivery. A revolution, then, is a declaration that the new ideas struggling so long hav become ripe, triumphed, and are going to rule for some time to come. Revolution can no more be prevented by the extreme passivists than it can be hastened by the mere bloodfiends. It takes place whenever the conception is ripe. Humanity stands up regenerated after the process, and presents a new idea to her spouse, the world. In a country like America, with its free institutions, a successful strike on an important issue might consummate a revolution. It is already in progress. Who ever thought a few years ago that Christian girls would go out picketing and holding secret meetings against a boss, and getting the better of him? It is an accomplished fact to-day.

There are two ideas now growing to maturity with our present movement, and they differ from the ideas of previous revolutions in being positiv, not negativ. The French Revolution said, No God, no master. The coming revolution will declare: There is humanity, which needs all our care—and one thing is known to be positivly above all, noble, holy, and omnipotent, and that thing is Labor. It has nothing to say about God or Christ, one way or the other.

I ask, is the church prepared to accept this inevitable destiny of progress? If not, I say hands off. For the risks of a revolution are only increased by the presence of obstacles.

During the late strike of the carpet weavers, at Yonkers, when nearly the whole of the society of that place befriended the strikers, the soul of a leading clergyman was sorely pained at the lack of Christian meekness in the girls, and he used his whole influence, both in and out of the church, to break down their spirits. When Mr. Lloyd, the corresponding secretary of the Central Labor Union, visited the authorities of the church of which Doelger the brewer is a member, on the matter of his mean treatment of his employees, he was told that Mr. Doelger was a most estimable church-member, paid a high pew-rent, and was regular in attendance, and his Christian brethren are satisfied. Are you satisfied, workingmen?

What can you expect from a religion whose prime creed is salvation by faith alone, and in which conduct is at such a low discount? The mention of one or two more points will conclusivly show that the solution of the labor question must take place outside of the church, and in spite of it. Take, for instance, the Sabbath question. Our Sunday lectures are the bread and meat of the movement. Sunday is the only day the workingman has to discuss the misery of the other six. But if the matter is to be left in the hands of the church, why, you will hav to giv up your lectures and meetings, and derive intellectual nourishment from sermons exclusivly designed to flatter the vanity of the well-to-do.

A Christian Socialist writer, after reviewing the serious dangers of the movement, concludes by saying that the "only solution of the question is contained in the true fraternity of the genuin Christian heart."

Now, this Christian heart is a very dried-up affair. There is no juice in it. It is said that the Holy Ghost resides in the Christian heart, and to all appearances that spectral gentleman imbibes all the milk, and leaves a withered fiber, covered only with a tough coating of piety from which nothing can be got but hell and damnation. My experience is that the man who puts his trust upon a Christian heart will get left. It has always been so.

Giv me a good, human heart—not sucked up by the Holy Ghost—with less gush for God and more love for man. Every skin of a boss is a good Christian, an orthodox of the orthodox, seven times godly.

Oh, no; the great mistake of the church is that it treats the workingman as an infant, and not as the growing man. It might be said to address him in these words: "Come back to church and we will giv you bread and molasses to eat. Be meek and humble, forgiv your boss with Christian love, while he skins you with his Christian hand. Turn the right cheek when the left is hit. Be like a good boy, and shut your eyes and open your mouth, and the church will giv you a very nice thing." That's about all.

Having seen how the religion of the Christian church, or, for that matter, any recognized religion now existing, is inadequate to meet the modern movement, let us determin in a few words what form this new religion of ours, we often talk so vaguely about, is to take. How is it to be a motiv power of our thoughts and actions.

My experience in this respect has been singular, and I will giv it in a few words. I am a heathen in search of a religion, and I think I hav found it after all in this Western India, having lost it in the Eastern. Of all the dead and dying religions, that of my country is the most completely dead.

I started from home with the express idea, among others, of seeing how Christians bore the cross, and I hav seen bishops and archbishops roll in equipages in the land of the pious Henry VIII., and I hav seen the followers of John Knox and Calvin quaff inspiration from whisky-toddy, and I hav seen American ministers grow dyspeptic on beans and pie, and all the cross borne I hav seen up to this time, is the jeweler's handiwork in the gold-chain of a dominie or a deacon.

And I hav come across all kinds of people on three continents, high and low, rich and poor, educated and illiterate, and I am convinced that the life of to-day is a gigantic lie, that all professions are hollow, and every practice is mean, that religion is a sham, and philosophy a compound of conceit and lust.

What is this thing they call society, that worships horse-jockeys, and covers with gold opera-singers and dancing-girls, and lets its workers go without bread? What is this thing that calls itself law, that commits every kind of crime under heaven, that murders heroes and gibbets saints, that is the ally of every rich culprit and supports every incorporate monstrosity?

And what is this thing that arrogates to itself the sacred name of religion, that damns the soul of every honest and brave man who dares to think, ministers to the vanity of the rich and idle, and tells the poor and suffering, "Remain where you are and you shall hav the kingdom of heaven?"

I hav found my religion among that band of men and women who hav said, "This earth is our kingdom of heaven; humanity is our religion; this is our brother man; no tyrant shall hurt him; no God shall damn him."

And in this religion of ours, devotion to the needs of the man struggling into life to help the work of the world shall replace the fawning on an omnipotent God that sleeps away in heaven, earnest efforts shall take the place of holy talk, pregnant resolves shall form for useless prayers, the kingdom of heaven shall be instituted upon this earth, and human tears shall soften the wrongs the blood of God has failed to wash.

Let us, then, all who believe in the kingdom of earth, organize this sentiment, spread it far and wide, let this religion take a form. Let every suffering man in any corner of the world be told that the day of rest is coming; that society may turn her back, God may refuse to answer, but there is a band growing to take him in its folds.

Never was light more needed, never was sympathy more in demand. For to-day man is bound to man by the one tie of selfishness, which may snap at any moment and let loose upon earth a hell.

What are we, most of us, to-day but the stepchildren of Mother Earth, born in misery and baptized in tears, with a Murdstone society upon our head, teaching us the civilization of suffering and a strength of despair? What are we but outcasts and waifs, orphans and foundlings, slipping from a despoiled earth, debarred from a cornered heaven? And confine not your thought to yourself, but think of the countless millions yet unborn? What hav we to leave to those that come after us but a society that cries, "No mercy," a religion that says, "Be damned," a present that is lost, and a future mortgaged? Shall they not curse us for bringing them into a world of misery? Shall they not curse us for leaving them a life without a hope?

Make haste, then, all true children of mankind; let our church be built. The misery of the world is full, injustice is rampant everywhere, virtue is pale, and heartlessness is stalking; and the cry has gone out from many a sorrow-laden heart: "Giv us a new light! Make this earth more habitable, pray!"

AMRITA LAL ROY.

"A Theory of the Universe."

This article, June 13th, brings into relief the nullity of metaphysical theology; a duplex nullity, in which the two follies, rebellious to the laws of English grammar, fail to constitute a single wisdom. The two last columns contrast with the first by their sound common sense. Mr. Jones is a sensible man, a good writer, and an Atheist; in spite of which trinity of virtues his first column is neither more nor less than that of any father of the church on such subjects, like the rattle of peas in a gourd.

0 x 0=0; 0—0=0. The positiv clerical and the negativ Infidel amount to the same thing, when the subject may be defined, like the Irishman's screech-owl, as "nothing but a damn noise."

Mr. Jones will hardly be offended if I say he is not spiritual-minded enough to understand Jesus about his bringing, not peace, but a sword, and kicking up hell generally. I hav the advantage or disadvantage of Mr. Jones in being of the manor born, into the oriental idiom of thought. Only analogists and persons in a certain vein of sentiment can pick the meat out of Jesus's hickory nuts.

Compare Jesus with machinery, and suppose him the cause of what is called Christianity. Now, considering the noble fact of true insight between the inventor and nature, the lesser cost and drudgery in production, and the increase of material values due to machinery, shall we not claim it as an admirable contribution of genius toward general prosperity? And, then, look at the operativs of our factories. If your heart sickens, go and refresh yourself by a chat with Mr. Chauncey Depew or Rev. H. W. Beecher on the evolution of the "capables." There intellect flashes in diamonds, and sentiment weeps in pearls.

These two monstrosities, of misery and of callous extravagance, the despair of the hireling and the arrogance of the speculator, are results of machinery—are they not? Might we not say that it came to bring, not a surcease of toil, but misery and malignity, into the world? Yet it is easy to foresee, and not very difficult even to organize, opposit and beneficent results from the same machinery. Take machinery from its priests, the financiers who hav kidnapped it, restore it to its operativs, and it will emancipate, educate, and enrich them. Evaporate the God-idea, and Jesus, unfitted for the office of tithe collector, falls into the arms of his brothers, the proletaries, a harmless transcendentalist, whose greatest fault was the hypocrisy (pardonable in a young Hebrew under the bias of traditional reverence) of confounding his ideal Father Love with the truculent Hebrew Jehovah.

At present the practical point is the prestige of Jesus with the people by heredity still more than by tradition. Christianity, like the measles, often occurs in a mild form, but even when it is severe, Jesus cannot help it; it would probably be all the same had he never existed. It seems to hav been the same in Mexico long before his birth, and as there hav been probably several or a variorum edition of the Jesus, as of the Buddha, everyone may suit his taste in texts sweet or peppery.

The importance of the genuinness of the tradition ceases with the dissipation of the God-idea. It remains to utilize the moral influence of a character and prestige of a name. Is it expedient for the welfare of suffering ignorance rather to eliminate Jesus, or to utilize him socially? It would be vain to expect unison in the convictions of pronounced Freethinkers and of the most enlightened but still earnest Christians, like Heber Newton or Rylance. But there may be harmony of action between philanthropists in the two camps. On the latter will devolve the rescue of that Father Love, the ideal of Jesus, and which society owes to its unfortunate, from the death clutch of the truculent Hebrew Jehovah.

Religion is ill understood by Mr. Jones as a crotchet of belief in any sort of clerical tomfoolery. Religion means for me, and many other Atheists, loyalty to conscience. It is true, when the conscience is the compass of harmony, organic by hygiene, and social by virtue. Such religion may glow alike in Atheist and in Christian hearts. Let us, then, both abjure intolerance.

EDGEWORTH.

Burying the Dead in Cities.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: People who hav been taught to look upon churches as sacred and holy places generally seem anxious to be buried at the close of their lives in close proximity to their favorit church, or even within the very "walls of the sanctuary," regardless of, or selfishly indifferent to, the fact that the putrescent exhalations of decaying mortality are inimical to human life, and are often a fruitful source of disease and premature death.

This fact has frequently been explained by physicians and scientists, and enlightened public opinion has at length decided against this morbid religious sentiment, and declared that cemeteries should be placed at considerable distances from populous cities. Occasionally, however, this sensible rule is violated, and dead bodies are buried in close proximity to the residences of the living. Only a few days ago a person was buried in a vault in Trinity churchyard, New York, and another instance of the same nature has just occurred in the city of Brooklyn, as will be seen by the following account from the New York Sun of June 25th:

"The body of Mrs. Lucy Haskins, the wife of the rector of St. Mark's Episcopal church, in Williamsburg, will be placed to-day in a vault built by special permission of Health Commissioner Raymond in the narrow strip of ground at the side of the church on South Fifth street. The vault is 7 feet long, 6 feet wide, and 7 feet deep. It is divided into two compartments. The Rev. Mr. Haskins intends that his body shall be placed in one of these compartments. There will be nothing to show that bodies are buried there save a tablet which will be affixed to the church wall.

"Some of the neighbors who are opposed to the proceeding said yesterday that they were deterred from getting an injunction to prevent it only by a feeling of delicacy. It is said that Mrs. Haskins expressed a desire to hav her body rest in a vault next to the church."

In the Sun of the 26th inst. it was further stated that

"The services were conducted by Bishop Littlejohn, assisted by the Revs. Messrs. Darlington and Maynard. The church was crowded, and many were unable to get inside. A number of the people who had protested against the burial of the body in the churchyard viewed the interment from opposit the church."

Voltaire, whose satire, says the Magazine of American History, "was as keen and fine-pointed as a rapier," tells us in his "Romances" (page 360) that Babouc, when he visited the city of Persepolis, at the command of the angel Ithuriel, found a similar custom in vogue in the capital of Asia, which he describes as follows:

"Babouc mingled in a crowd of people composed of the most ignorant, dirty, and deformed of both sexes, who were thronging, with a stupid air, into a large and gloomy inclosure. By the constant hum; by the gestures of the people; by the money which some persons gave to others for the liberty of sitting down, he imagined that he was in a market where chairs were sold; but, observing several women fall down on their knees, with an appearance of looking directly before them, while in reality they were leering at the men by their sides, he was soon convinced that he was in a temple. Shrill, hoarse, savage, and discordant voices made the vault re-echo with ill-articulated sounds, that produced the same effect as the braying of asses, when, in the plains of Pictavia, they answer the cornet that calls them together. He stopped his ears, but he was ready to shut his mouth and hold his nose when he saw several laborers enter into the temple with picks and spades, who removed a large stone, and threw up the earth on both sides, from whence exhaled a pestilential vapor. At last some others approached, deposited a dead body in the opening, and replaced the stone upon it.

"'What!' cried Babouc, 'do these people bury their dead in the place where they adore the deity? What! are their temples paved with carcases? I am no longer surprised at those pestilential diseases that so frequently depopulate Persepolis. The putrefaction of the dead, and the infected breath of such numbers of the living, assembled and crowded together in the same place, are sufficient to poison the whole terrestrial globe.'"

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY FOR CHRISTIANS.

Letters from Friends.

SNOWVILLE, VA., June 22, 1885.

TO FRIENDS: As so many are censuring me for accepting donations toward what they call a "pleasure trip," and say that I hav failed in giving satisfaction to those who contributed toward my journey in quest of Spiritual phenomena, I hav taken pains to write to nearly every donor, and every response is an indorsement of my effort. I sent one to the Investigator, and now I send one to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do this simply to save further clamor on the subject.

I hold that I was precisely as justifiable in doing this work for pay as I would be at any other kind of work, and I labored as hard at it. Mr. Lacy being the first instigator of my attempting to see slate-writing, and the largest donor save Truesdell, has a right to be heard upon this question, and here is what he says. I hope the dissatisfied will read, and forever after hold their peace! ELMINA D. SLENKER.

OPEN LETTER TO ELMINA FROM FRANCIS D. LACY.

About the use of money on your trip, why, my worthy good woman, I see not the least chance to censure you. You know that I felt that you had been most judicious in its use, and sought every opportunity to get the truth, and were willing to receive it; but it was not for you, and I am sure in all reason that you hav rendered an honest report.

You should not acknowledge what you deem not true for the satisfaction of anyone. My lectures and performances are largely for the exposition of "spiritual frauds," but am cautious not to try to overthrow any of the facts. I am a Spiritualist, but am death on frauds. The people who censure you hav some of them doubtless been badly duped by chicanery, and are so dull that they hav not yet found it out.

FRANCIS D. LACY.

WEST RICHFIELD, O., June 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I wish some good lecturer would come here and wake up the Liberal element. I believe that there might be a League organized. I am an old man, without much means to do with, and less brain, so excuse me, and send me some of the best literature you hav, and I will do the best I can to get folks to read it. WM. CURVIER.

CANYON CITY, COL., June 27, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: You want short articles, especially on the science of spelling. It is lamentable that the science of spelling is so little understood. I hav asked hundreds of teachers, and a good many of them graduates, "What is spelling?" and never got a correct answer, and now will I fall under the censure of egotism if I undertake to to tell what spelling is?

Spelling, as it is used in relation to words, is simply representing to the eye by letters the sounds that make a word. A figure represents a simple number, whether the number relates to dollars, men, sheep, or cattle. So a letter represents a sound in a word, but has no signification of or by itself; but when its sound is combined with one or more sounds, a word is formed which is significant of an idea. More letters in a word than sounds, or less than the number of sounds, would be a false representation. No lady would pay for a photograph of herself having three eyes in it, nor would she if it had but one. Custom, it is said, is law. That will do where no principle is infracted.

Dr. Webster says: "The spoken language is the legitimate language, to which the written ought to be conformed." Now, the word "though" has but two sounds; if I spell that word of two sounds with two letters, and no other two letters in the alphabet would spell it, wouldn't I spell it right? Would I be laughed at because I conform the written to the spoken language? No laughter is elicited if I spell t-h-o-u-g-h, but if I spell s-o-u-g-h for so, I am called an ignoramus.

How many letters are necessary to spell one sound? How many to spell two sounds? Then how many to spell any word?—As many as there are sounds in the word. More or less is falsification. Suppose every letter in a word cost a cent, then "though" would cost six cents instead of two; "eight" would cost five instead of two; "knowledge" would cost nine cents instead of five; "thought" "wrought," "brought," and others costing each seven cents instead of three; on an average costing the buyers twenty-five per cent on all the printing done in the United States above what it would cost if only a letter to a sound was used. Who is gainer? The printers are not. It is the buyers of books and papers—over the left. Now, my dear friends who hav families of precious children to educate, at the very threshold of their learning they are obliged to load their memories with the useless lumber of a thousand years ago. Where are or what has become of the old wooden mould-board plows that I hav scraped the mud off of many a day? Where are the tow, flax, and wool spinning-wheels and hand cards that used to be in every farmhouse? Where is the crooked sickle for reaping great fields of wheat, and the wooden flail that I hav swung over my head week in and week out. They hav given way to advancing common sense.

Ladies and gentlemen, you are interested in this business. Why will you cling to a barbarism of a bygone age, damaging both to your purse and intelligence, as well as disgraceful to a free, advancing, and independent people? The past is past forever. By correcting the present we correct the future.

I had designed to giv a brief history of our orthography, but my paper is too short and my letter is long enough now, so I must defer it to some other paper, if acceptable,

A. B. PIKARD.

OSAGE MISSION, KAN., June 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to know that THE TRUTH SEEKER is alive to the dangers of the Catholic church to our liberties. Your bold exposures of their machinations are refreshing to one living where they dominate all Protestantism, and make up two-fifths of the entire population in a radius of five miles. The Catholic church is the most strongly organized body existing on earth in historic times. It supplements the strongest pagan systems of Greece and Rome, Persia, Egypt, and India, with fifteen hundred years of despotic sway in nearly all Christendom. The soul-saving part of their work is a mere blind, their only essential object being political. They care not whether governments are republican, monarchical, or autocratic, so long as they can gain control. They insist upon controling all governments. The pope of Rome is superior to any and all governments. Our public school system is their greatest dread. They seek its overthrow by any and all means.

They invade the sanctity of every hearthstone within their reach. If a Catholic marries a Protestant, it is against their protest. Once married, they brave all dangers in bringing the invader of their rights into The Church. When forced to abandon hope in that, they seek to destroy that family relation. The children of a Catholic father or mother cannot be permitted to receive a non-Catholic education while it is in the power of craft and cunning to prevent.

I repeat: Their organization is political, their purposes all political. They hav lost power in Italy, Spain, and Mexico, and are now paying their best attention to our country. The pope is a virtual prisoner in the Vatican. What a glorious home, think they, this will make for his holiness!

I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will giv increased attention to our hoary enemy. The Argonaut is doing a good work in that direction. It is bold. But the Catholic church practically owns nine-tenths of the press of the country. They dare not breathe an offensiv word against the august fraud.

They hav good reason to know here, in their stronghold, that I do not fear them.

A Catholic council convened in Australia recently passed resolutions asking the government so suppress certain societies, among them the Masonic. Such proceedings are about as amusing as the efforts of the bull to arrest the farther progress of the locomotiv.

Next in order to the hoary giant, the Masonic order is the strongest existing organization. I am no Mason, and if I were, nothing would please me more than such insane opposition.

One of our priests here (we hav five of them) can hardly make out a sermon without assailing secret societies, especially the Masons. The one grand secret of this opposition is that there is one class of secrets from which they are excluded. The old fraud will probably outliv other frauds by about a century.

If your blows are only dealt fast and heavy, as the facts will warrant, they will be sufficiently severe. Short of this, pray, never halt. H. L. R. JONES.

CHADD'S FORD, PA., June 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am truly pleased with "Bible Morals," and the ANNUAL also. There is a church close by, and I do quite a good bit of Sunday work, and hav to say some truthful things to the church people, who are Baptists. I think there are a great many Freethinkers here, but they are silent. I think they would organize quickly if some two or three would come out with me. I am poor, but say what I think, and they think all the better of me for it. A. L. VALENTINE.

BOZEMAN, MONT., June 23, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from an extended trip to California, Oregon, and Washington, and want to caution the TRUTH SEEKER friends against paying any attention to advertising pamphlets published in these Western countries, and especially in southern California. That country is the poorest country for poor men to go there is in the United States. And as for the place for invalids, it is just the place to die. A consumptiv the damp and and chilly evenings will soon kill. I took my wife there and found that she got worse. The bureaus of immigration are only real estate swindlers. I found hundreds of poor men everywhere who had spent all they had to get work and then could find nothing to do. The Chinese hav all the work, both in California and Oregon, and a poor white man will starve. Go West and see first, before you sell your home, and then you will know. DR. W. J. STOVER.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., June 27, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I take the pleasure of renewing my subscription with the inclosed amount, and shake hands by writing with the many friends who do their own thinking among your readers. I admire this meeting of minds in these columns, for which every one should feel thankful. Let every one write out their convictions, and by this means truth will be discovered at some time if it is possible. Some always will advance extreme doctrins which hav a tendency to balance each other, leaving the Liberal nearer the right position.

I like the name, "American Secular Union," better than "National Liberal League," although the name has little to do with the work. Yet the new name may hav a better influence on outsiders, whereas the old name may bear to them some odium.

All start in together for the new name; all drop the old name, and work together in military fashion. The new organization, with a new and popular name, will work wonders in the destruction of superstition and church tyranny.

I hav not much to say about what I believe, when I know no more than others about it; but there are a great many practices and mistakes which ought to be remedied.

In regard to intemperance and its probibition, there are mistakes and lack of work. Every one should feel the necessity of protecting the weak and weakening the strong liquor interests. We do not want the valueless liberty which enslaves the weak. We want the liberty to do anything in our power which does no injury to others, and if we injure others we are willing to suffer a just penalty.

I would hope that every beer saloon, liquor store, and manufactory of intoxicating drinks could be abolished, for I think humanity would be far better without them.

You Freethinkers, Liberals, and Agnostics are working for the abolition of orthodoxy, of superstition, of priestcraft, which are far better for humanity mentally, morally, and physically, than intoxicants are to-day. How do you work to crush orthodoxy? Use the same means for prohibition. Make it so that saloons will not pay; so that saloon-keepers are forced to do what is right with their patrons; so that people know what they take and ask for.

When all persons think for themselvs, what they shall believe or acknowledge as true, and what is fit for the stomach, to satisfy not to injure its work, then will come liberality of mind and liberality of body, a liberality on the side of reason and good judgment.

When science and reason control the mind, superstition and religion will lose its power. It is a fact that superstition has an evil influence upon the mind; when we establish Freethought, superstition will be the same as prohibited. When temperance is in the majority and in power, drunkenness will be prohibited. To prohibit drunkenness we must exhibit its evils and prohibit the drunk-making business; to stop superstition we must exhibit to the mind its folly and prohibit its power to control us. They are alike, two great evils of humanity, whose national and general influence must be abolished by education up to prohibition. FRANK MARTIN.

CEDAR VALE, KAN., June 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Some five years ago, I well remember the death of a charming and beautiful young lady, the wife of a young banker. They were both devout members of the church at the time of their marriage, and had a full competence of this world's goods (he being heir to a fortune). They were united in the holy bonds of wedlock with the full assurance of endless bliss. No two could seemingly be more happy. They were continually dreaming of their never-ending perfect joy, with all the assurance of a competence for this life, and in their faith in Christ a greater assurance of endless joy beyond the grave. Their conversation would frequently be upon the possibility of being separated by death, which they, of course, realized possible, but they consoled themselvs in the thought that, if such should happen, they would soon be again united in the other world, where there would be no separation. Their only desire seemed to be that both might end this life at near the same time, so that their separation should be as short a time as possible.

They had lived together only two years when she was taken suddenly ill and died.

A grand and towering monument was erected over her grave, pointing whence her spirit had taken flight, with an inscription at its base assuring the world of the husband's happy hope of again reuniting with her when his death summons should come. The funeral was a sad one. Each had only commenced to stem the tide of life, and it seemed that the young man would die of grief.

The minister consoled him with the thought that "she was not dead, but had only gone before," and he, after a few years, would be permitted to reunite with her, etc.

In about eighteen months after her death, the young banker was married to another. The marriage ceremony was performed by the same minister that officiated at the first wife's funeral.

She, too, was a church-member, and both received the congratulations of the parson with the assurance that their united devotion to Christ and his cause would certainly insure their never-ending bliss.

A year passed and the new bride had, in her charming devotion to her beloved husband, entirely obliterated, seemingly, all remembrance of the first wife from his mind. They, too, were talking of endless joy beyond the grave. In the short space of about three years she, too, was taken from him, and the same minister that united them in marriage and attended the first wife's funeral was again called upon to soothe the grief-stricken husband by his beautiful thoughts of again meeting her beyond the river.

Another monument is erected even more grand than the first, with even more inspired ideas of his future hopes of meeting her in that beautiful city. To cut short, I will say that the young banker has recently taken a third wife, and, seemingly, their mutual love for each other is as great as with either of the two others.

Now, the thought occurs to me that she, too, will, sooner or later, pass the river of life. He, too, will, according to his faith and the teachings of the church, be some day ushered into the gates of heaven, there to meet the trio.

If polygamy is right in heaven, it ought to be right here. But I don't believe it will be right in heaven, and I don't believe either of those wives will agree to it there any more than they did here.

I believe, as much as I believe there is a place called heaven, that "there will be trouble there." I believe there will be an inclination for each of those three women to fight for their man when he comes. If I was a full believer in the Christian faith, I don't think I would marry but once.

W. H. PENFIELD.

FLOYD C. H., VA., June 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Doubtless my name will be new to the kind readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Although I am not educated, and hav had but very little experience in the world, I feel it is my duty to write a short letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER and let it be known that I am an Infidel, or Freethinker, and don't care who knows it. I hav been made what I am by reading the Bible and some Infidel papers that I accidentally got into my possession. I read, studied, and reasoned on the matter until I came to the conclusion that there is no reason for believing the Bible.

About the first thing that put me to thinking over the matter was a sermon I heard preached by a Methodist minister a short time ago, who said, "God is the creator of all things; he created man, and man's own soul is a part of God's own soul." The reverend gentleman then went on to picture off hell in an abominable manner, telling of "the torrid flames," "the burning lake," "the bottomless pit," and the "wailing and gnashing of teeth" that are down there, and using the absurd and vulgar language that is usually heard from such superstitious and brutish clergy.

I hav not been decided on the matter very long, but since I hav decided I hav talked with several young men of this county, and nearly all who hav any pluck or energy at all agree with me on the subject, although they are a little backward about letting it be known publicly, for fear it will injure them in their pursuits of life while people are so superstitious as they are now in this county.

But I say, let them treat me as they wish and keep me out of what business they may, I'll be honest about my principles and not wear the hypocrit's veil of superstition to aid me in the avocations of life. EVERETT T. SHORTT.

P. S.—We are very much in need of a good lecturer in this county. E. T. S.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., June 10, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: After the Bible God had cursed the ground, serpent, etc., there were mighty giants on the earth who were of old. Whence were they? Were they older than Adam? God had told the fowls to multiply, and Adam to replenish the earth, but now he sees that man is wicked, and is sorry that he has made him, and will now not only destroy man, but beasts, fowls, etc. Candid Bible-believer, where is that all-powerful God now who created everything just by saying, "Let there be," and it was so, that he cannot now destroy the wicked without wreaking vengeance on beasts, birds, and innocent children? Where is his mighty power now, that he has to get a man to make an ark, into which, with food, he has to put some of his creatures to save them from drowning? Then he displays his mighty power again by breaking up the fountains of the great deep and opening the windows of heaven and makes it rain forty days and nights and drowns the world. After this he will not again curse the ground for man's sake, because his heart is evil (yes, but, omniscient God, you made it so) from his youth, therefore he will not smite every living thing any more. He blessed Noah and told him to replenish the earth, etc., and now makes a covenant, not only with Noah, but with every living creature, fowl, cattle, and beast (this is too ignorant for common sense) that there shall not be a flood any more, and as a token he sets his bow in the cloud. Untrue; we know it is not set. Again, when he brings a cloud his bow shall be seen in the cloud. Not true, for we often see hundreds of clouds without a bow. We know the rainbow is caused by the unchangeable and never-varying laws of nature that govern all substances, and is only seen when the eye is between the shining (diagonally) sun and falling water, whether from the clouds or any other hight, as each globule of water then displays the primary colors, blue, red, green, yellow, etc., of which the beautiful rainbow is composed, thus proving conclusivly that it is not set in the clouds. Again, where is God's omniscience, that he has to look upon the bow to remind him of his promis that he will not drown the world any more? Noah was blessed, but got drunk and cursed his innocent son, who must now be a servant (slave). God will make a great nation of Abram, and he shall be blessed. Abram lies, which God sanctions by saying that he shall be a father of many nations and tells him to circumcise every man-child. This barbarous and inhuman act upon children evidently proves the grossest ignorance of these Bible beings. Again, the Lord tells Abraham that he shall surely become a great and mighty nation and all the nations shall be blessed in him, and they shall keep the ways of the Lord, but this the sequel proves to be false. Again, where is that ubiquitous God that he has to go down and see about their sin, and then does not know how many righteous there are in the city? And passing strange, angels having the power to smite wicked men with blindness, that they did not prevent Lot from offering his virtuous daughters to a desperate mob? They were sent to destroy the city, but only told a few to escape with their lives and not look back. The Lord then rained upon the cities brimstone and fire out of heaven. Horror of horrors! Is God's heaven full of brimstone and fire? Then where is the Christian's pearly heaven, with gold-paved streets?

The Lord now visits Sarah and she had a son, and now orders Abraham to cast out his concubine and her (his) son, and this grieved him, but God tells him to hearken unto his wife (no matter how wrong), and accordingly he sent them into the wilderness to starve. An inhuman and outrageous act toward a mother and an innocent child, but God sanctioned it. God now tempts Abrahan, but his holy writ says most emphatically that God does not tempt any man, which is false. Abraham does as God tells without a murmur, and raises a knife to kill his son, and then an angel out of heaven tells him to stop. Candid Bible-believer, where was God's omniscience that he does not know whether Abraham fears him until he sees him raise a knife to slay his son? This is really to pueril for common sense. God blesses him again, and says his seed shall be as the sand, etc., and it should possess the gates of his enemies (slavery). Again here the grossest ignorance is manifest. A servant must put his hand under Abraham's thigh to swear by heaven, earth, etc. Isaac is married and entreats the Lord for his wife. Again here are obscene verses that are shocking. However the Lord tells Sarah there are two nations, the one shall be stronger than the other, and the elder shall serve the younger. Esau and Jacob are born. Jacob inhumanly wrests Esau's birthright from him when he was at the point to die. But holy Bible says he despised his birthright, but this is false, for he did not even insinuate such a thing, but, like any other human being, would giv all he had to save his life. Isaac tells Esau to get venison and he will bless him, but whilst he is gone for it the wily mother tells Jacob to get kid's meat of which she will make the savory meat, etc., and he should get the blessing first. He fears detection, but his crafty mother made him obey her, and she disguised him in Esau's best raiment and the kid's skin, etc., and he takes the savory meat to his blind father, who asks him who he is. And he says: "I am Esau, thy first born, and hav done as thou badest me; eat, and bless me." Isaac asks him how he had found it so quickly? He says: "The Lord thy God brought it to me." To be sure he feels whether it is his very son Esau or not, and says, "It's Jacob's voice but Esau's hands," and blessed him. Then he asks again: "Art thou my son Esau?" And he said: "I am." This awful liar's sensitivness must hav been very large. Isaac blessed his lying son, adding, "God giv him plenty, etc.; let people serve and bow down to him; be lord over his brethren, and they must bow down to him (right or wrong); they must be this awful liar's slaves.

Jacob, like a condemned criminal, still fears and longs to conciliate the wrath of Esau, who, like a gracious being, finally forgivs his inhuman and lying brother. Christian Bible-believers, do the preceding holy Bible acts of your omniscient, gracious, all-wise, ever-merciful, and omnipotent Bible God harmonize with justice? He being omniscient, of course knew that men would act just as he (did) had made him. If you believe the fabulous flood legend, then you must see that your almighty Bible God created millions of creatures, man, beasts, birds, and innocent children, designedly, just to drown them?

Instead of striking his adulterous and murderous David dead, he strikes an innocent child, makes it very sick, and it has to suffer death. Does this harmonize with justice? Holy writ says: I kill; I make alive; I, the Lord, do all these things.

Ananias and Sapphira lied, and fell dead. God must hav killed them; but where was this ubiquitous and mighty God when Jacob lied so awfully to his blind father, that he did not kill him? Where was his justice now that he says in this (Jacob's) atrocious, outrageous, and villainous liar's seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed? Candid Bible-believers, consider well the preceding narrativ and you will see that it proves conclusivly that this wondrous, mighty Bible God never existed only in the ignorant minds of men and women, and the greater their ignorance the greater, more wonderful, and mysterious has been their Bible God. And so it has ever been from the remotest time known to the present. Common sense evidently sees at a glance that if an infinit foreknowing, all-wise, and omnipotent being had created everything, it would be perfect; there would be no disgusting, loathsome, and poisonous animals to torment and devour mankind and each other, and suffer from heat, cold, hunger, and diseases, much less would they hav been created to be cursed, drowned, and burnt. Daily observation and experience prove beyond the possibility of a doubt that just as soon as men's and women's minds are enlightened by the grand truths of nature's immutable and never-varying laws, this phantom Bible God will then hav no place to dwell in—will then be nowhere. They will then hav no evidence of any power whatever above, below, beyond, or outside of nature. May the immutable, invariable, and harmonious laws of nature (by which we hav our being) ever be pre-eminent, and illuminate the minds of all mankind, that they may enjoy an enlightened existence whilst here and now. A. MOOT.

BALLSTON, SPA., N. Y., June 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 80. Send me some copies of the "Modern Balaam." I wish to present them to my benighted Christian friends. We are laboring to extend the kingdom of mental liberty and the gospel of humanity and science. Now, Mr. Editor, do you think it is possible that the tent will be able to reach here this summer? There are a few of us here who will do our level best to make it a success and pleasant to Brother Reynolds. I feel certain there will be good attendance, as there never was a lecture of the kind here It would raise trouble with the hell-fire merchants who hold their ignorant dupes in fear and trembling by suspending them by a cotton thread over the flames of hell, as I heard a sky-pilot say some time ago. Only one year ago myself and wife were so suspended, but now (thanks to THE TRUTH SEEKER) we are as free as the air, having nothing to fear. We hav derived more comfort and consolation from Brother Ingersoll's "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child" in an hour than we hav all through life from the so-called holy Bible.

I see many different opinions in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Ironclad Age as to whether death ends all, so I will add mine, without comment: I am a hardened, cast-steel Materialist of Brother T. Winter's stamp.

Myself and family are more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and Truth Seeker Library, as there is an ocean of knowledge contained in these seven volumes, and they should be in the house of every Freethinker in the land. Myself and wife will be at the Convention at Albany (if the sky doesn't fall) and hope to meet you there.

Wishing every member of THE TRUTH SEEKER office a long and useful life, I remain

Yours for truth and humanity, WM. THORPE.

CORUNNA, IND., June 21, 285.

MR. EDITOR: The wheel of progress was set to rolling here by Messrs. Watts and Putnam about a month ago, and the results are already visible in a general awakening of our more intelligent class to the needs of humanity. The church bigots hav been aroused, and hav become pale with rage at our efforts to establish the truth among them. To avenge themselvs upon us, the ministers hav taken to preaching hell in its worst form, and hav consigned all Freethinkers to the bottomless pit. It is but madness for priest and preacher to try to fetter the human brain with such childish nonsense as contained in the so-called word of God. I spurn with contempt every attempt to dethrone the reason of noble man. I don't want to fix up a millennium, but I can plainly read the signs of the times pointing to a grand awakening of scientific truths all over the known world. The bright star of reason has arisen, and will grow brighter as it ascends the heaven of freedom. Oh, for more such heroes of truth to help spread the glad tidings—earthly peace and heavenly beauty—to the millions of enslaved minds that the church now holds in her deathly embrace in a slavery more to be abhorred than even the ravages of war or pestilence. The Seventh Day Adventists, in a tent spread, are holding a revival meeting at the town of Corunna. They are preaching the nearness of judgment, and a general wind-up of humanity. They are making many converts among Bible believers, as they prove everything they say from their pet volume; but it will be a cold day when they make really intelligent people believe in their six-day creation, and their clay and rib story, which they pretend to believe literally. They hav announced that judgment began in 1884, and the cases of the dead are being heard as fast as the judges can handle the books, and as soon as they catch up Gabriel will sound his horn, and the wrath of the lamb, etc. Such is the credulity of many of our people that they readily believe any such childish fiction if it be from the Bible. I would that all friends of progression would become aroused to vigorous action against the blight and curse of Christianity, and make a strenous effort to oust superstition from our midst, and free humanity from the tightening grip of the priesthood; and in no better way can we do this than by distributing Freethought literature with a Liberal hand; by organization; by holding discussions with Christians if any can be found brave enough to defend the principles they espouse, and by living out a life in strict accordance with the laws of natural morality. Let our motto be, "Forever onward, firm in the truth."

Yours fraternally, JOSEPH A. SHADE.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed letter on "Sugar-coated Drones" is from the pen of one of the oldest of the labor reformers of New England, and he knows whereof he speaks. There are but five of us, to my knowledge, living, who flung the labor reform banner to the breeze in 1833 under the leadership of Douglass and Fisk. This reform was pioneered in New York at that time by Ely Moore and William Leggett, and other good and stanch men who were never wounded in the back. John Ferrell represented the workingmen of Philadelphia in the New England convention held in Boston in 1833. All the subsequent years your correspondent has been activ in the great threshing-floor of humanity, winnowing the chaff from the wheat, and has satisfactorily fulfilled his mission, and now, at an advanced age, is still watching the clergy, who ever hav been the allies of the moneyed aristocracy. If there be any exceptions they are able to vindicate themselvs against the charge preferred. The clergy of Massachusetts were very sure that if the workingmen should work less than from "sunrise to sunset they would saunter off to the groggery to the damage of total depravity and faith in the doctrin of foreordination and predestination of whatsoever comes to pass." Why, our indefatigable worker, H. C. Wright, in the morning haze of the regeneration of man, took sides with the robbers of the poor; and the great and good Dr. Channing, with broad faith in humanity, trembled like an aspen leaf at the mention of trades unions, and could smell gunpowder in my raiment fresh from the outdoor atmosphere. A. H. WOOD.

SUGAR-COATED DRONES.

MR. EDITOR: There is a divinity doctor in New York who professes great sympathy for the working people. He seems anxious for them to strike something and join the church. Outside the church, he thinks, "they hav none to look to above the level of man; nothing to come in contact with but selfishness; nothing to look to but toil and trouble, and then the grave; and nothing beyond that they know about." Yes, and what does the church and its sugar-coated drones—the divinity tinkers—know about what is beyond the grave? Surely, "a blind man wishes to show the road." There is not a worker, male or female, in our laud, that does not know as much about what is beyond the grave as any college churchman in the United States, or any other man. The working people of our country, if they are considered simple by the sugar-coated drones, are too old to ask pears of the elm. No, sir; the church has no food for the working people as working people. Did not the church oppose the introduction of the ten hour system of labor? Did not the church break up the Washingtonian movement to suppress rum drinking? "No wonder we hav despondency, dependence on stimulants, discontent, despair, and the shedding of blood"—no, none at all, for all these passions originated from the influence of the doctrins of the church: an endless hell of fire and brimstone beyond the grave, an angry God and almighty devil, and other imaginary heroes too numerous to mention, which gloomed the minds of the parents at a certain time in life, in days gone by. Yes, it is no wonder that the sugar-coated drones of the church who feast on the rust of ages should drum for recruits to replenish empty pews. Let them drum. Drum-heads will in time wear out, and so will orthodoxy. A TOILER.

CHARACTER.

CLEARWATER, NEB., June 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Character in one sense is the disposition of each person, a combination of the good and bad qualities.

Phrenology teaches us that for every pair of organs of the brain we hav a corresponding trait of character. It may be partially or strongly developed, according to the development of the organ. Therefore we see that nature has given us our characters as well as our bodies, and though we may train and educate both, we cannot entirely change either. We may by education acquire refined tastes and manners—habits, we may say, which will, of course, change our actions. We may learn to control our instincts and feelings to such an extent that the world will never know our real natures, but that is training a character we already hav, and not forming a new one. As the child is, almost invariably the adult will be. For instance: Two children of apparently different intellectual ability, one bright and quick-witted, the other slow and seemingly dull, given the same training, the same advantages, and though the slower one may require more time and greater effort, in the end his mental ability is just as great as that of his companion; but though his mind is trained, he has the same characteristics as at first.

Again: Two children of different moral natures, one honest and of strict integrity, the other a dishonest rogue—old age finds them the same. No amount of education can change the character of the dishonest man; he is still a knave at heart. Experience may hav taught him to govern his immoral propensities, to try and hide them from his fellow-creatures, but our true characters are revealed in the expression of our faces. and, however much we dissemble, they are the same. We end our lives with the characters that nature gave us.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. News and Notes.

ALBANY CONVENTION.—A NEW ENGLAND GREETING.—ELIZUR WRIGHT.—PHOTIUS FISK.

The good Elizur Wright givs us the following solid and spiritual comfort:

MY DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I hav your live letter of yesterday. If alive I shall want to attend the great Albany gathering. As to my contribution of Freethought, if I make any it will be on "Bible Revision." I inclose check for $50, payable to Mr. Palmer's order. Please tell him to take $30, which I pledged quarterly to general fund, and $20 is for the Convention.

Yours for liberty, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

We shall all welcome our venerable champion, whose sunset of life is so full of the glory of morning. His recent contributions to the Boston Herald show that his intellectual fire is still unabated. An address from one who has fought so many battles, upon "Bible Revision," will be of exceeding interest, and will add luster to the wealth of Freethought which this memorable Convention will display. All honor to the glorious youth of our chivalrous octogenarian, whose white plume, like that of Navarre, is ever in the advance.

The following, from Photius Fisk, is another cheering message from our New England friends:

DEAR FRIEND: I hav your letter of yesterday and noted its contents. In regard to contributing to the expenses of the coming Freethought Convention, you may depend on me for fifty dollars, to be paid on or before the day of meeting. I should be very glad to meet with you on that occasion, but my health is feeble, therefore I cannot promis that I will attend, but I hope good work will be done and the cause of freedom and Liberal principles be advanced by the assembling of so many together to consult and carry on our work for the coming year. Yours very truly, PHOTIUS FISK.

What a greeting thousands of Liberals would giv to this devoted and generous supporter of our cause, who in so many ways is constantly showing his profound interest in human progress. I wish he could be with us and receive the personal congratulations of his multitude of friends.

It givs us courage indeed to receive these beautiful inspirations, these welcome gifts from honored comrades who were doing such noble service before we entered the ranks, and who, amid the snows of age, cease not their generous toil. It givs us boundless confidence in our work, glowing faith and fresh desire to do our best, when we receive such benedictions. The grand thoughts which bind old and young in such buoyant friendship must, indeed, make broad and bright the stream of human advancement. With such voices to cheer —the trumpet voices of fifty years of labor—we can endure all the burden of the fight, knowing that victory will come. In the name of thousands and tens of thousands of Liberals, I thank the good, true, noble, and ever-honored friends of humanity, Elizur Wright and Photius Fisk.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

P.S.—Still the good news comes in. Alonzo Van Deusen, our most liberal New York Freethinker, both in heart and mind, contributes twenty-five dollars to the Albany Convention, besides one hundred dollars already contributed to the National League. So, indeed, we see the

"Jocund day Stand tip-toe on the misty mountain top" of the grand march of humanity. S. P. P.

FOURTH OF JULY WITH THE TROJANS.

The beautiful holiday came with its thousand flags, its innumerable crackers, and all that noise which goes to show that Young America is still alive and has great faith in sound and explosion as a conclusiv proof that we are a free people. However, Fourth of July comes but once a year, and let us make the most of it and get all the glory we can. We hav a good deal to boast of, although liberty is not yet fully enthroned in the laws of the land. Hope is still bright, and we can keep step to the music of the Union.

I spent this holiday with our Liberal friends at Troy, and I must confess that it was a glorious Fourth indeed—enriched by companionship with those who hav the "divine discontent," and from the present look forth to a nobler future.

Our friends at Troy are working along slowly but surely to a large and successful organization. They hav a little club room where they meet every Sunday, and hav a lecture and discussion. Thus the interest is deepened, social life is cultivated, the ties of fellowship are strengthened, and gradually new members brought in. The work advances by a natural and healthy process. The expenses are few, the burden to each is light. There are many places where the friends of Freethought can join together in the same way. If they are not able at first to hire a large hall, let them secure a small and inexpensiv club room, where a few can come together at regular times. In this way a life can be started and nourished that will unfold to grand results. It is these limited but earnest efforts that become at last the factors of a mighty progress. After various struggles our Troy friends are beginning to hav a unity of power and purpose such as they never had before. Eventually they will hav a lot, build a hall of their own, and hav a home for Liberalism in this growing city. From our infancy we hav learned that "great oaks from little acorns grow," and when, in the future, the widespreading branches of Liberalism shall make beautiful the pathway of human endeavor, we shall find that the massiv trunks from whence they flourish were once "small beginnings," and reached these marvelous proportions through the determined exertions of a few.

The most determined of all our friends in this pioneer work is Robert Wade. I think I shall hav to call him the Bishop of Troy. He has quite a diocese, and is the friend and counsellor of hundreds. Those of all denominations come to him for assistance. He has enthusiastic adherents among the Catholics, the Presbyterians, and the Methodists. He has been for years a resident of Troy. Thirty-three years ago he came from England to America with a good trade and six shillings in his pocket. He has been all over the continent. He was for several years in California. On his voyage thither he was almost crushed to pieces by a terrible accident, and was obliged to be transported across the isthmus by four nativs in a sort of extemporized palanquin of his own invention. Pure pluck kept him a-going, and he arrived at the Golden Gate. He won a small fortune in California, and then returned to Troy, where he has remained ever since, and has acquired an honorable position among his fellow-citizens. Although a Republican in a Democratic ward, he holds the office of charity commissioner as the representativ of that ward, and many a man, woman, and child has received the benefit of his impartial kindness. The Christians know that he is an Ingersoll man, but for all that they find that he is the best one they can go to in trouble. He subscribed in 1853 for the Investigator, and since then he has distributed tracts and papers innumerable, and has kept many an Infidel book in circulatiou. He has always stood squarely by his colors. His good wife has done the same, and they hav lived in delightful agreement together. Miss Jennie Armstrong, Mr. Wade's niece, his sister's daughter, also livs with them, and is known to Liberals as one of the bright contributors to the Investigator, and who promises to do many a brilliant service in our cause.

Quite a remarkable man is Mr. Archibald, the father of Mrs. Wade. He is now ninety-seven years of age, and up to about ninety years of age was a fiery and devoted Methodist. He has given thousands of dollars to that church, and held every office except that of minister. His brother was a Methodist minister. Several years ago he became blind. This physical affliction seemed to clear his mental perception, for he has been able, as he says, to do a world of thinking in the silence of his own soul, with no priests to bother him, and he has reached conclusions very much in harmony with our most advanced thought. He has lost all regard for Methodism and the orthodox churches. He believes in a Supreme Being, but he does not think that this Being interferes in any miraculous way with man, but leaves him to the natural development of his faculties. Manhood here, he says, makes for happiness hereafter. On the verge of a hundred years, having been over three-quarters of a century a professing Christian, in the serene loftiness of a peaceful old age, this sturdy worker is ready to meet all the issues of eternity on the simple merits of an honest and generous life in this. It was a joy, indeed, to see and speak with this noble old man, whose mental vision is so penetrating and lofty.

Morning and afternoon we had delightful drives about Troy and the vicinity with Mr. Wade, Mr. Nelson Gardner, a solid worker in our own ranks, and Mr. Goodfellow, and a good fellow he is, too, full of scientific information, a born skeptic, and an inventiv Liberal. He recently gav a lecture before the Secular Union on "A Journey to the Moon," which was illustrated by drawings, and was quite entertaining. With these choice spirits, the glorious sunshine, the music, and the noise of ten thousand crackers, and a spanking team, of course, we had a memorable Fourth of July.

We first went to Lansingburg, a nice, quiet, old-fashioned town, scarcely disturbed by the busy railroad or canal. Here we called upon Mr. Armstrong, of the Park House; Mr. Edward Matthews, and William Gibson. The latter is a taxidermist, and his wonderful collection of birds and all sorts of animals is a delight to the eye and is like having a glimpse of nature's own wealth, so life-like are the preservations.

From Lansingburg we went to Cohoes, the Lowell of New York state, looked at the Falls, the big mills, the dams and the bright and winding Mohawk, glancing to the broad Hudson. Here, we called upon Mr. Sessions, Mr. T P. Hildreth, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Samuel Page, all brave soldiers of humanity, and last, but not least, Peter Grand-Jean, whose hearty grasp of the hand and Atlantean shoulders made us feel that he would bear with us the brunt of many a battle. We met, also, Mrs. Campbell Wilson, the widow of Mr. Campbell Wilson, of Paterson, N. J., who, in his lifetime, was such a strenuous upholder of Liberalism.

Returning in the afternoon, we visited Oakwood Cemetery, a lovely city of the dead, on high hills overlooking the Hudson. Far off could be seen the noble Catskills melting into the hazy distance. We could see Albany with its immense capitol building—Troy, Green Island, Lansingburg, Waterford, Cohoes, embracing a population of three or four hundred thousand, and destined to become one of the greatest industrial centers in the whole country, and affording a magnificent field for the progress of Freethought.

Our day's outside pleasure of traveling through this varied country was wound up with a little sociable home gathering at evening, with music, etc. Mr. Warren Gardner gave us "The Ingersoll March," and that afforded a pleasant and inspiring close to our patriotic celebration, and we slept soundly until the Sunday morning bells began to peal.

In the afternoon there was a good gathering of Troy friends, and I gave a lecture, or a talk, rather, on the "New Heaven and Earth." Mr. McDonnough, of Albany, followed with a brilliant address in the same line of thought, and Mr. Howard Williams gave us some genial and interesting criticisms.

I cannot forget our amiable friend M. A. Morrissey, who feeds both the inner and the outer man, a scholar and a gentleman, knightly and gracious, who can wield a keen sword when the combat deepens in behalf of human liberty.

S. D. Jeffers, president of the Troy Secular Union, takes hold of his work with the enthusiasm of youth, and his contributions to our Liberal papers show that, with study, he will use an available pen for our cause.

Mr. Charles McNaughton, Mr. William Wittenberg, and others, are earnest members of the society, and I was pleased to shake hands with them in this noble fellowship. I was glad, also, to meet our good friend Hirum Wilber, of Green Island, and his wife, who are enthusiastic radicals; who like to see the world move on and are ever ready to join the ranks of war.

In the evening I went down to Albany. They are having some rousing meeting there and hav entered upon a wide field of practical discussion, as will be seen by the following:

"A discussion will be opened at the Liberal Association Hall, 69 North Pearl street, Sunday evening, June 28th, on 'The Present Condition of Trade and Industry.' The following points will be dealt with: The struggle between labor and capital; strikes, lockouts, and boycottings; organizations, trades unions, and the Knights of Labor; the attitude of the pulpit and the press toward labor reform; modern slavery; immigration and protection; prison and pauper labor; competition of women and children in the labor market; the sphere of government in regulating production; rent, interest, and taxation; land grants and railway monopoly; machinery and over-production; co-operation in production and distribution; Malthusianism; the pauperization of the industrious and the enrichment of the idle. Admission free; the public invited.

Mr. Dodge opened with an excellent address on "Prison Labor: Its Effects on the Honest Industries of the State." Mr. Reed and Mr. Whetmore made some good, practical suggestions, having had some experience themselvs in labor matters. Mr. McDonnough and Mr. Gregory made two of the best addresses I hav ever listened to on these vexed questions that, like the sea, never will be settled, it seems, although we get more light the more we think of it, and if people will only think freely, they will eventually think rightly. Mr. Howard Williams, who started these themes of burning discussion, gave a quaint but very interesting review of the speakers. Mr. Williams is a radical of the radicals, and believes, I should judge, pretty thoroughly in the ideas of Karl Marx. At any rate he is a thinker, and knows how to express himself with incisiv and a kind of electric talk that holds his audience intently, though they might not agree with all his far-reaching theories of Socialistic philosophy.

The entire discussion was valuable and instructiv, and shows that Liberalism is ready to deal squarely with these great issues of the day.

Again we greeted our friends McCabe, Luck, Strevor, Waldfillig, and others, and after an hour or two of social festivity we returned to our couch, and by the magic of the nineteenth century awoke in New York, fresh as a lark, with happy memories and bright hopes, and the music of human progress ringing in our soul. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Nick of the Woods.

When we first came down to the Gift Ridge Farm,
We children found much to delight and charm;
But of all that was charming, delightful, and good,
There was nothing surpassing old Nick of the Wood.

How old was he could not be told,
Except that he was very old;
And though he'd been a glossy bay,
The luster had long since worn away.
His mane a few tufts of grizzled hair,
And scarcely the sign of a bang did he wear.

Corn, though it fed him, fattened him not,
And he'd stand a whole day in a single spot,
Leaning his side 'gainst a friendly rail,
Brushing the flies with his worn-out tail.

He could be as deaf as deaf could be,
And blind as one who cannot see,
But bring the bridle or rattle the feed,
And he'd show himself lively as any steed.

We'd think sometimes to take a ride
On dear old Nicky, our joy and our pride,
But he'd always make for the nearest fence,
Nor love nor money could drive him hence.

"Get off, and let him go," we said;
"To better things he has been bred."
And gen ly from his back we'd glide,
Content to walk at his ribby side.

One day a sorrow we ne'er had felt
Came to us as by his side we knelt,
While father spoke these words of pain:
"You'll never see Nick alive again."
Adding, he thought him of little good,
A Nick of all places as well as the wood.

But this was language hard to brook,
And our juvenil heads we sadly shook,
Crying, as he rested from every ill,
"With all thy faults, we love thee still."

Concord, Ky., 285. VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

How Willie Lost His Jacket.

"Now, Willie, dear, you had better not go in the water again to-day. I am always afraid, anyway, when you go bathing; and you hav been once to-day, and that ought to be sufficient."

But Willie kept leaning and lolling about his mother, and teasing her to let him go swimming.

"Mother, you are so scared! I shall not be drowned—and it is so hot to-day, and I feel so warm and sticky; can't I go swimming?"

"No, you can't—now don't you ask me again!" and Willie's mother was just a trifle impatient with her little boy.

Willie went out to the pig pen, and began scratching the back of the smallest piggy. "You can't go swimming, can you, Piggy? You don't know what fun is, you don't."

"Ugh!" said the pig, looking up in Willie's face, as if to say, "I like to hav you scratch my back, that's what I like."

"Your nose looks like a little pink pancake," said Willie, tickling the pig's ear with a straw. "Say, piggy, I've a mind to go swimming, anyhow. It's so plaguy hot this afternoon. Mother never will know it, unless you tell. I might as well go, and she will never be any the wiser," thought he, hesitatingly.

In another minute he was running as fast as he could toward the river that ran through the village where he, with his mother and sisters, was spending the summer vacation.

Down by the river side there was a big barn, and in that barn he threw off his clothes and donned his swimming pants. He had a new suit throughout, and a very handsome jacket with bright brass buttons, and a new straw hat. He frolicked about in the water a long time, until, thinking his mother would miss him, he shook off the water and ran to the barn to put on his clothes. To his amazement, he could not find his shirt, his pants had partly disappeared, and his jacket could not be found at all, while a black-and-white goat was just swallowing the crown of his new straw hat.

Willie was always afraid of goats, and he looked at the creature with horror and disgust.

"Come out o' that, you mean old goat, you."

"Wa—h!" screamed the goat, and went on chewing the hat.

"He says war," said Willie, "and war it is," at the same time throwing a stone at the animal and snatching for his hat.

The goat ran toward him with head down, and Willie ran outside and around the barn, the goat after him. Slipping in a side door, he picked up the remnant of his clothing, and ran for the hay mow.

He put on his pants with one leg gone—of course, you understand, one of the pant legs—and half of a stocking on each foot, and picking up three of the brass buttons, all that remained of his jacket, he put them in his pocket, and, with his crownless hat on his head, started sorrowfully for his home.

"Goats must hav queer appetites," he said, as he entered the presence of his mother, after a roundabout walk in byways and across lots, for he was awfully ashamed for any one too see him in such a plight.

"Why, Willie!" exclaimed his mother, "where are your clothes?"

"Goat eat 'em."

"Did you stand still, Willie, and let the goat eat the clothes off your back, and even the hat off your head?"

Willie lowered his eyes and surveyed his shoes, with a piece gone from the toe of one.

"Tell me, Willie, did you stand still and let the goat eat the clothes off your back?"

"No, ma'am," and Willie began to cry.

"How did the goat get away with your clothes in such a shocking manner, and where is your new jacket?"

"Here is all that's left," and Willie passed the three buttons to his mother.

"I'll kill that goat, mother—see if I don't."

"But tell me first how it happened," said his mother.

"I—I—was—that is—I left my clothes in the barn—while—while—while—"

"Well, go on."

"While—I—I—I—went—a—swimming."

"So you disobeyed me! Well, now, my little boy, I think you will hav to wear that hat, and those trousers, and these three brass buttons for a jacket till you can make up your mind to obey me."

Willie began to scream and cry very loudly, but his mother relented the next day, and let him wear his other suit.

But how much better it would hav been if Willie had minded his mother, and kept away from the river, wouldn't it? However, the affair made a Willie a more obedient boy ever after, and he always gains permission when he goes swimming, and is very careful that there are no goats around when he goes in the water. Only a Newsboy.

Little Joe first appeared on the streets of New York two years ago. He was small and slight, with great brown eyes and pinched lips that always wore a smile. Where he came from nobody knew and few cared. His parents, he said, were dead, and he had no friends. It was a hard life. Up at four o'clock in the morning after sleeping in a dry-goods box or in an alley, he worked steadily till late at night.

He was misused at first. Big boys stole his papers or crowded him out of a warm place at night, but he never complained. The tears would well up in his eyes, but were quickly brushed away and a new start bravely made. Such conduct won him friends, and after a little no other dared play tricks upon Little Joe. His friends he remembered, and his enemies he forgave. Some days he had especially good luck. Kind-hearted people pitied the little fellow and bought papers whether they wanted them or not. But he was too generous to save money enough even for a night's lodging. Every boy who "got stuck" knew he was sure to get enough to buy a supper as long as Joe had a penny.

But hard work and exposure began to tell on his weak constitution. He kept growing thinner and thinner, till there was scarcely an ounce of flesh on his little body. The skin of his face was drawn closer and closer, but the pleasant look never faded away. He was uncomplaining to the last. Two weeks ago he awoke one morning after selling "extras" to find himself too weak to move. He tried his best to get upon his feet, but it was a vain attempt. The vital force was gone.

"Where is Little Joe?" was the universal inquiry. Finally he was found in a secluded corner and a good-natured hackman was persuaded to take him to the hospital at Flatbush, where he said he once lived. Every day one of the boys went to see him. On Saturday a newsboy who had abused him at first and learned to love him afterward found him sitting up in his cot, his little blue-veined hand stretched out upon the coverlet.

"I was afraid you wasn't coming, Jerry," he said with some difficulty, "and I wanted to see you once more so much. I guess it will be the last time Jerry, for I feel awful weak to-day. Now, Jerry, when I die I want you to be good for my sake. Tell the boys—"

But his message never was completed. Little Joe was dead. His sleep was calm and beautiful. The trouble and anxiety on his wan face had disappeared. But the expression was still there. Even in death he smiled.

It was sad news that Jerry bore back to his friends on that day. They feared the end was near, and were waiting for him with anxious hearts. When they saw his tear-stained face they knew that little Joe was dead. Not a word was said. They felt as if they were in the presence of death itself. Their hearts were too full to speak.

That night one hundred boys met in front of the City Hall. They felt that they must express their sense of loss in some way, but how they did not know. Finally, in accordance with the suggestion of one of the larger boys, they passed a resolution which read as follows:

Resolved, That we all liked Little Joe, who was the best newsboy in New York. Everybody is sorry he has died.

A collection was taken up to send delegates to the funeral, and the same hackman who bore little Joe to the hospital again kindly offered the use of his carriage. On the coffin was a plate, purchased by the boys, whose language was expressiv from its very simplicity. This was the inscription:

LITTLE JOE,
Aged 14,
The Best Newsboy in New York.
WE ALL LIKED HIM.

There were no services, but each boy sent a flower to be placed upon the coffin of his friend. After all, what did it matter that little Joe was dead?

He was only a newsboy.

This is not a fancy sketch. Every word of the above story is true.—New York World.

For Good or Evil.

A German philosopher asserts that "every human being exercises (apart from his words or actions) a poisonous or wholesome influence on all who approach him. It is an effect of temper and temperament."

Lavater's theory was that each man or woman bears a subtle likeness to some animal; and that just as the cow is cheerful, domestic, and healthy, and the snake baleful and unclean, human beings spread about them malign or gracious influences.

The subtle influence does not result from our principles, from our beliefs, or even from our character, so much as it does from the habitual temper and attitude of our minds. It is worth study by young people beginning life, for though intangible and almost indescribable, it is the strongest power which a man or woman can possess.

We hav all known women, neither young nor beautiful, nor intellectual, to whom children, animals, and every weak, hurt, or needy creature were drawn for help by the natural motherhood—the gift of healing—that was in them.—Youth's Companion.

Companionable Father and Son.

I know a most estimable father who is on first-rate terms with his own son. That shouldn't be a remarkable thing, yet I fear it is not just as common as it ought to be. They are, as it were, boys together. He has never whipped that boy. He has admitted to me that he would hav felt badly if the boy, having the power, had thrashed him, so he saw no reason why he should not respect the boy's feelings in this matter, and not take the advantage a father has over a young son if it comes to a physical encounter. This is certainly a magnanimous view to take, and the son has grown to be a fine young fellow, whose conduct quite refutes the saying of Solomon. They occasionally relax into conundrums for amusement, and here is the latest. They were talking of cocoons. "Why are cocoons like knot holes?" was the question. The younger had to giv it up, and, after the fashion of the end man, repeated: "Why are cocoons like knot-holes?" "Because they are not holes," was the reply.—Detroit Free Press.

Correspondence.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought, in accordance with your request, I would write again for the Children's Corner. Mr. C. B. Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y., has been lecturing here, in his tent, for the past three weeks. I hav been very much interested in his lectures. Inclosed find the notice of his last lecture at the tent. I was his bookseller while he was here. I was very glad when I saw the notice in the Children's Corner that you were to giv a history of the United States for the best story. I hav my story commenced already. When Mr. Reynolds was here, he had several "Story Hours" for sale, and he presented me with one the first Sunday he was here. I think the "Story Hour" is the best story book I ever saw. Grandma Gault and I had a good time listening to Mr. Reynolds. He gave twenty-one lectures, so you see we had a feast. But I guess I will close, for I do not want to take up too much space.

Hoping that you will not put this letter into the waste-basket, I remain

Yours, E. D. TUCKER.

Your Iowa friend,

What Is Going On in the Churches—Onward March of the Militant Host.

FATHER CAROLAN ON A TOOT.

A well-dressed man, who said he was the Rev. Father Carolan, a Catholic clergyman of Ohio, was arrested in Jersey City the other day for drunkenness.

A BAD BISHOP.

The Rev. Jabez Sytt Campbell, colored bishop of the M. E. church, Philadelphia, was arrested and taken before a magistrate on the charge of perjury.

THE TRUTH WAS NOT IN HIM.

The Rev. C. W. Turrill, pastor of the Tarport, Pa., M. E. church, on trial charged with lying and imprudent and unchristian conduct, has been found guilty.

ALL TO LEAVE AND FOLLOW THEE.

Mrs. Lester, of East Hartford, Conn., and Mrs. Warren, of the same place, left their husbands to join the Salvation Army. Two divorce suits are pending.

A FIT OF ABSTRACTION.

A Rev. Mr. Armstrong, who figured as the pastor of the M. E. church at Algonac, Mich., has been detected in abstracting various sums of money from a parishioner's till.

A MERE QUESTION OF PROBABILITY.

Mrs. Ellen Nichols makes affidavit that she boarded the Rev. Joshua Bowden; that a young lady visited his room, and that improper conduct occurred. He denies it.

A CANDIDATE FOR THE GALLOWS.

The Rev. Jesse Cook, colored, of Butler, Ga., becoming enraged at his wife, knocked her down with an ax; then, putting his foot on her throat, he dealt her three blows with the ax, knocking out her brains.

HIS SIN HAS FOUND HIM OUT.

A council convened by the First Baptist church, one of the largest and most important places of worship in St. Paul, Minn., to investigate charges of untruthfulness and unchastity against the late pastor, the Rev. R. R. Ridell, found him guilty.

HIGH JINKS.

The Rev. James McMullin, graduate of the Catholic Propaganda College at Rome, and who is said to hav been en route to California to take charge of a parish, was arrested at Chicago on a charge of drunkenness, and, pleading guilty, was fined $25.

REPRINTED WITHOUT REMARK.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 20th.—The Rev. W. F. Morrison, ex-grand councillor of the Order of Chosen Friends, who, on the 12th instant, was convicted of grand larceny to the extent of $3,000, was to-day sentenced to ten years in the state prison.—New York Sun.

THREE OF A KIND.

At Snow Hill, Md., three ministers named Lightbourn, Aldred, and Tompkinson, were tried for alleged intimacy with a domestic who had successivly kept house for them. One stood up like a hero, confessing his sin. The others got away. The prosecution sustained their charges, but failed on the specifications.

Y. M. C. A. NOTE.

The case against John H. Collins, the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Gloucester, Mass., attracted much attention. The police court room was crowded to its utmost, and the sidewalks were lined with people. Collins and his sister appeared in court charged with incest. In the afternoon several witnesses gave damaging testimony.

THE LAST OF PASTOR DALLY.

Racked by remorse, Rev. Jonathan H. Dally ended his sufferings by committing suicide. The cause of the pastor's downfall was a dissolute woman, with whom he had sustained improper relations. Mr. Dally jumped overboard from a Mississippi steamboat May 7th. His last charge was at Trinity church, York street, Jersey City.

THESE THINGS NO LONGER CAUSE SURPRISE.

The following scrap is without date and unidentified. It looks reasonable: "The Rev. Lemuel Moss, D.D., president of the Indiana State University, to-day placed his resignation in the hands of the trustees, who accepted it. The resignation is understood to be the result of a scandal involving a lady teacher, who has also resigned."

THE SENTENCE TELLS THE WHOLE STORY.

In the matter of Canon XII. on the disciplin of the clergy, and of the presentment of the Rev. Timothy O'Connell. The board of triers appointed herein hav found the said the Rev. Timothy O'Connell guilty of scandalous and disorderly conduct in frequently drinking to excess, and becoming intoxicated at various times and places within the city of London. Ontario, within the past year.—MAURICE S. HURON, Chancellor.

AN EMINENT IMMIGRANT.

Thos. Grigg, employed by Willis & Co., Montreal agents of the Wauzer Piano Company, as city agent, has left Montreal for the United States with $8,000 belonging to his employers. Grigg was married, and conducted religious services in the Primitiv Methodist church there. He took with him the wife of a member of his congregation.—Boston Journal.

BEING ACCUSED, HE ACCUSES.

The Rev. James Fellows, on trial at Rochester, N. Y., on the charge of criminal libel, was found guilty. Fellows was formerly pastor of the Methodist church at Henriettta, N. Y., and had trouble with members of his congregation, who charged him with immoral conduct. He retorted with counter charges, and a pamphlet was printed charging immoralities to Dr. Mason and others of the village.

A CHICAGO HUMBUG.

Aanund Reinertson, of Chicago, is in receipt of regular communications from heaven, his latest being that some women who worked in his laundry should leave their husbands and liv with him. The husbands complain, but the women declare that they are happy and glorifying God in the true spirit. Reinertson's influence over the women is founded on his claim to hav a mission from God.

A PASTOR WITH A REPUTATION.

The Baptist council called to receive the report of a committee appointed to investigate the charges against the Rev. George Guirey, of Paterson, N. J., was in session all day, and finished its labors by a verdict adverse to Mr. Guirey. The charges were of improper conduct toward women. Mr. Guirey is now the pastor of Emmanuel church, a congregation which he has gathered around him.

ANOTHER SALVATION ARMY SCAMP.

Charles Corwin, an Englishman residing in New York, a worker in the ranks of the Salvation Army in Wilkesbarre, Pa., was arrested there on suspicion of attempting to enter a railroad pay car. When searched a key was found in his possession which unlocked the car. From letters in his pockets it is known that he recently served a term in one of the New York prisons. He is also suspected of being implicated in other robberies.

ENLIVENING INCIDENTS OF COLORED WORSHIP.

While attending church at a settlement eight miles from Fort Worth, Texas, two colored women became engaged in a family quarrel within the sacred precincts. Two colored members of the church took up the quarrel in front of the meeting-house, and began slashing each other with dirk knives. In the melee Sam Coffee put in his appearance, and shot one Allison in the back, killing him instantly.

POLICEMEN AS PEACEMAKERS.

"The meeting was very exciting, and the police were called upon to prevent a breach of the peace." These words are from the New York Herald, and apply to a meeting in a German Lutheran church, in Trenton, N. J., whose pastor was the Rev. Jacob Zintner. This gentleman was accused of being the cause of a young lady's suicide, and the meeting was called to take action upon his proffered resignation.

ENAMORED TO AN IMPROPER EXTENT.

The minister is the Rev. Thomas Keough. The name of the lady is not given. They were enamored of each other, and it was charged their relations were improper. A conference of Methodist dignitaries sustained the charge and deposed the preacher. It is said that he is about to become a father. This happened at Parkdale, near Toronto, Ont., culminating June 13, 1885. The Rev. Mr. Keough has a wife and children.

THE PENALTY OF BIBLE STUDY.

Fred Winch, of Milwaukee, became religiously insane, and was convinced that he would be better off dead than alive. First he tried to hang himself, but was surprised and saved by Mrs. Winch. He next purchased a bottle of sulphuric acid and poured the entire contents thereof into his mouth, without regard to his eyes, nose, or face, all of which were fearfully burned, as was also his body. His sufferings were terrible, but nothing could be done other than furnish some slight palliation until death released him.

HIS GREAT SPEED WAS HIS SALVATION.

The Rev. J. M. Meredith, of Reading, Pa., not only neglected to pay his board but borrowed $9 of his landlord A Reading paper says: "A strange sight was witnessed at No. 10 North Eighth street yesterday. Detectiv Kershner and an irate boarding-house keeper were in full pursuit of a stranger. The chase out of Eighth street to the Scott hotel was witnessed by quite a crowd. Meredith got there in advance, and while his pursuers were searching up stairs, quietly slipped out of a rear door, with his high silk hat in hand, and disappeared down a narrow alleyway. His trunk was found at an out-of-the-way place yesterday afternoon and was seized. Meredith appears to be forty-five years of age, wears a heavy fur collar and cloth cape and is a good talker. It is said that he was at Lancaster a few weeks ago, where he beat a number of first-class boarding-houses. At last accounts he was still at large, but the police hope to arrest him soon. Several charges of alleged swindling are pending against him."

INVOKING THE STRONG ARM.

The Rev. Mr. Schoppe, pastor of the German Lutheran church at Union Hill, N. J., recently applied for a warrant at Recorder Schleicher's court. He wanted the Rev. Mr. Louipaul, pastor of the German Evangelical church, arrested for disorderly conduct. The complainant baptized an eight-year-old boy whose parents attended the Rev. Mr. Louipaul's church. The latter was enraged and gave the Rev. Mr. Schoppe a piece of his mind, for which the Rev. Mr. Schoppe wanted him punished.

A HAPPY ARRANGEMENT.

The Rev. Henry Howe was dismissed from the United Brethren church of Council Bluffs, Ia., on account of improper relations with Mrs. E. S. Jones. Howe's wife secured a divorce on the same grounds. Howe then proposed to legalize his relations with Mrs. Jones, and offered Mr. Jones a team if he would get a divorce from her. Jones accepted the proposition, secured the divorce, and Howe and Mrs. Jones left for St. Joseph, Mo., where they were married. This is the third matrimonial venture for each of the contracting parties.

A HEAVY BURDEN FOR MERCY.

An esteemed correspondent residing in Leavenworth, Kan., contributes the following to this department. The Leavenworth papers contain the same story: R. Calhoun, of Marion, Kan., leading member of the Presbyterian church, superintendent of the Sunday-school and member of the church choir, has within a year seduced fourteen girls of his Sunday-school, some of them under twelve years of age, and none of them over fourteen. He pleaded guilty and threw himself upon the mercy of the court, receiving a sentence of forty-two years in the state penitentiary at Leavenworth.

PASTOR AND DEACON.

A good deal of excitement was caused at Titusville, Pa., by a fight between A. N. Perrin, a deacon of the Baptist church, and the Rev. C. A. Babcock, pastor of the Baptist church. Mr. Babcock, in his sermon, took occasion to reprimand certain persons in the church, Perrin taking a portion of the sermon as having been directed to himself. On Monday the two met, when angry words passed between them, until Perrin struck the minister in the face, kicked him, and attempted to use his cane upon him, but was prevented. The pastor boarded the afternoon train and went to his home in Panama, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES AT A DARKY CAMP-MEETING.

A negro camp-meeting was held at Mt. Zion church, York county, S. C., June 11th, at which a bloody battle was fought between a crowd of country and Yorkville negroes. Pistols, razors, knives, and whisky bottles were the implements of warfare, and a rivalry between the town and country negroes the cause. Whisky encouraged the fight. One negro was killed, two fatally and not less than a score seriously wounded. The country negroes had warned the town "coons" to keep away from the meeting, and when the fight ended the town negroes were in full retreat.

A VERY FREE METHODIST.

The Rev. John Locker (or Laugher) came to Adrian, Mich., last spring, as we learn from the Times and Expositor, and took a job of preaching at the Gospel Tabernacle, Free Methodist. He was considered able and eloquent. Among his parishioners upon his arrival Mr. Locker found Mrs. Sarah E. Hughes, and between the two love ripened so rapidly that their marriage was fixed upon within a month of their first meeting. But the sheriff of Adrian has been surprised by receiving a telephone message from Jackson, requesting him to arrest Rev. Locker for bigamy should he persist in marrying the Adrian woman. The Jackson message also said that a wife and some children of Mr. Locker's resided in that place. The Adrian Times and Expositor says: "Locker was formerly a M. E. preacher, but he seems to be drifting to the bad. Some people who attend his church in this city think he has taken to drink, one gentleman having information that he was seen in a guzzling attitude no later than this morning. It is further stated that he has already 'done time' for bigamy."

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE WITH HIM?

Professor James Allen Kibbe, of Kendallville, Ind., as we learn from the Standard, "stood high in the community, was respected by all, so confided in by the church to which he was attached that he was authorized to preach the sacred gospel of him who never knew sin, and by the city school board charged with the instruction of the children and youth of the city, employed for four years in the highest capacity at their hands to giv. A former graduate of his school, a beautiful girl of about twenty years, it was noticed, received marked attention from him. A few weeks ago they were both absent from the city a few days at the same time. A rumor was started that they were away together." Investigation showed that they went to Detroit, and stopped at a hotel, registering as man and wife. The Standard proceeds: "He has a wife and four children, all esteemed in the community, who hav to suffer with him the shame of his conduct, and the deprivations the loss of his position and salary will entail. They hav the sympathy of the people, but for him there is a loathing and indignation that is best endured by his absence."

A DISTINGUISHED CAREER FORESHADOWED.

The Rev. Mr. Herman is only 23 years of age. He was recently graduated from an Illinois theological institution. He went to Syracuse, N. Y., and boarded with the family of Philip Yeakel, a carpenter, who has a prepossessing daughter 18 years of age. She was a devout member of Herman's church, and played the organ for the Sunday-school class, and was in every way looked upon as a proper young lady. But it came to light that she was a mother. The Rev. Mr. Herman left the house, but Mr. Yeakel cut his flight short, and forced him to acknowledge that he was the child's father. He will not resume preaching for a time.

LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION.

OSWEGO, N. Y., May 23.—The Palladium today publishes an interview with Thomas Crawford, the defaulting city treasurer, who is now in Hamilton, Ontario. Crawford's statement is that he found himself $600 short at the end of his first year as treasurer. He could not account for it, and confided his trouble to Father O'Connell of this city, and, in accordance with his advice, engaged in margin dealing. At first he made a small gain, but subsequently was a loser. For two years past he has been speculating with the city's money, generally losing, and the final result was his flight from the city, leaving a deficit of $26,000. He places the blame for his course of action upon Father O'Connell.—Times.

USING THE WRONG NAME.

Rev. C. H. Zimmer had been pastor of the German Lutheran church at Batavia, N. Y., for three years. He has a large family and small salary. He had a note for $50, which bore the indorsement of George Borchet, a well-to-do parishioner, discounted at the First National Bank. Borchet pronounced his signatare a forgery, and brought the matter to the attention of the congregation. Mr. Zimmer acknowledged the forgery in the pulpit, but pleaded ignorance of wrong-doing. The minister was roundly denounced by male members of the church. A petition was circulated asking Mr. Zimmer to resign. He refused, and a committee notified him that he would not be allowed to preach any more.

THE ENTERPRISING BURGLAR.

The Rev. Joshua Chance, of Iowa, has been proved by investigation to be a habitual burglar. Chance is a young man who had a large following in his community, and was ranked with the most ardent workers in the Free Methodist church. He prays long and loud every night in the jail, and seems to try to create the impression that he is being persecuted. His wife is an intelligent little lady, and stands well in the community. She first became aware of her husband's guilt a few months ago, when she saw him quietly removing a portion of the weather boarding and examin the stolen watches. When asked by his wife to whom the watches belonged Chance would giv no satisfactory explanation.

THE REVEREND LEECH.

The ecclesiastical council invited to consider the disagreements between certain members of the Second Congregational church and the former pastor, Rev. J. A. Leach, met Monday afternoon. The council, as organized, consisted of twenty one members, including delegates from churches of Fitzwilliam, Winchester, Marlboro, Fitchburg, Goffstown, Bellows Falls, Harrisville, Dover, Concord, Watertown, Mass., and Boston. Rev. Dr. Quint, of Dover, was made chairman, and Rev. Mr. Gerould, of Goffstown, secretary. Mr. Leach was allowed to appear by counsel. Six charges were preferred, one of which contained forty-seven specifications. The charges were: First, untruthfulness; second, slandering and defaming his brothers and sisters in the church; third, sabbath desecration; fourth, neglect of religious duties; fifth, the use of spirituous liquors as a beverage; sixth, the habitual use of morphine.—Keene, N. H., N. E., Observer. The last two charges named hav been withdrawn, thus depriving the accused of all excuse for being guilty of the rest.

"HOW LONG, O LORD, HOW LONG?"

Hiram Pfautz is a respectable laboring man, residing near Lititz, Pa. His family consisted of himself, wife, and five small children, the latter ranging in age from one to ten years. For some time past Mrs. Pfautz has shown signs of weak-mindedness, but not to such an extent as to cause apprehension among her friends. She had been giving much of her time to the consideration of religious matters, had read the Bible through and through, had become converted, and often remarked to friends that the world was becoming too wicked to liv in. While her husband was at work she called her five children around her, prepared their toilet, dressed them in their best, and took them out for a walk. She chose a secluded pathway, and finally arrived at the edge of the mill-pond. On the way she carried the baby in her arms. Standing on the edge of the bank she took the eldest, a boy, and threw him far out into the stream; then the next two in the order of their ages, and finally, taking the baby of one year under one arm and the fifth, a little girl aged three years, under the other, she kneeled on the bank for a moment, uttered a silent prayer, and then with her children plunged in. The children already in the stream called loudly for help. Some men working in the mill then ran to their rescue, but when they arrived all had disappeared. The bodies were brought to shore and were laid side by side, not one exhibiting signs of life. The neighbors at once set to work to resuscitate them. After hard work the eldest three children were resuscitated, but the mother and two youngest children were already dead. Mrs. Pfautz was about forty years of age.

REGULAR PROCEEDINGS OF A CONFERENCE.

I.—When the presentment of charges was in order at the Newark M. E. conference at Nyack, N. Y., recently, Presiding Elder A. Craig said that serious reports were again in circulation about the Rev. George R. Bristor. He said he was informed by the elder of the Wilmington district that Dr. Bristor had committed a scandalous crime on a day in February, 1885. Bishop Walden appointed a committee to hear the charges.

II.—Elder Craig then read a letter from the Rev. J. W. Dally, which contained a confession that he had been "seduced into committing a terrible crime," and a request for the forgivness of his fellow-clergymen, and for permission to return his credentials and retire from the Newark conference. Mr. Craig moved that Mr. Dally be permitted to resign, and the motion was carried unanimously.

CATHOLIC SERVICE DIVERSIFIED.

Los Angeles, Cal., Daily Times: Jacob Pfeister, a blacksmith about forty years of age, created a sensation in the Cathedral St. Vibiana, about 3:15 Sunday. Services were in progress when Pfeister, who has been crazed by religious excitement, entered, walked up to the altar, and proceeded to disrobe, saying that he wished to be "naked like Christ." The fathers tried to hav him "keep his shirt on," but he wouldn't hav it so. Officer Fred Smith added his persuasiv powers, but was only a feather in the hands of the madman. Deputy Sheriff Hammel and Officer Reel also took a hand. For some minutes there was a chaos of priests and policemen flying around promiscuous-like, and at last Pfeister was overpowered and bound. He then quieted down and was sent home in charge of Mrs. Pfeister and Louis Mesmer. He was rather obstreperous again yesterday.

A TIMELY SUGGESTION FROM THE REV. MR. APPLEGATE.

A most shocking statement of the condition of things in the churches was made by Rev. S. P. Applegate, of the Methodist Protestant church, at a recent ministerial meeting. As his story goes, as reported, it appears that some of the strait-laced members of the church under his charge proposed to disciplin some young folks who had been indulging in that irreligious amusement, "promiscuous dancing." It was then suggested by Mr. Applegate, the pastor, that they should first move on "the many members who lied, cheated, defrauded, used profane language, and were guilty of intemperance." This proposition reduced the censuring members to complete silence. They well knew, said Mr. Applegate, that "such a measure would hav swept the floor of the church, turned the officers out to grass, and disbanded the flock."—Pittsburgh Sunday Leader.

MEAT FOR BOCCACCIO.

William Crawford, a brother of Mary and Thomas Crawford, of Oswego, N. Y., went to Bishop McInerney, at Albany, and demanded the removal of Father O'Connell, saying: "If you permit that man to remain over St. John's church you will take a serious responsibility." "What do you mean?" the Bishop asked. "I mean," said Crawford, "that I will do him bodily harm. He has dishonored my sister and disgraced my brother, and I will not endure it to see him there." The charges against O'Connell are that he seduced Mary Crawford, who was his housekeeper for years, and that he was concerned in speculations with public money with Thomas Crawford, her brother, who was city treasurer there for two terms, and is now a defaulter for $26,000, and a fugitiv in Canada. The latter charge is based on statements by Crawford, who is now at Hamilton, Ont. The other charge was made by the woman, who was discharged by the priest at the time of her brother's flight, early this spring.

HIS FINGERS WERE TAUGHT TO FIGHT—ALSO TO STEAL.

BRISTOL, CONN., June 13th.—On the through express train on the New England road was a passenger named Myron Bailey, of Bristol, a recent convert of the Salvation Army. He had a ticket for Plainville, and refusing to pay his fare beyond this point, was put off by Conductor Jacobs. He again boarded the train and was a second time ejected, and Brakeman Thayer was delegated to hold him. As Thayer released his hold to take his place on the rear of his train, Bailey drew a revolver and fired, the shot passing through Thayer's clothing. The train was stopped and Bailey was arrested. Many stories of the fighting Salvationist are told in Bristol. He was recently at a revival meeting in the Methodist church, and went forward for prayers. While the minister was praying, Bailey, with a wire, pulled the contribution box, which had just been passed around, toward him, but the pastor, who was praying with one eye open, detected him, and Bailey was marched into the vestry by one of the deacons.

A HARDENED WRETCH.

Joe Howard in the Boston Globe.

I know a great deal about ministers. I was born and raised among them. I believe them to be very much like other men, with ends and aims and purposes similar to those of their fellows in other walks of life. Circumstances hav much to do with the morality of all of us. A circus rider may be just as honest, just as kind-hearted, just as true to himself and to his duty as a clergyman, but he is likely to be more profane, less careful in his walk and conversation, because the circumstances of his calling permit it, while the circumstances of the clergyman's calling absolutely forbid it not only, but the indulgence of such would destroy him and his usefulness forever. You see the point, of course. There was a pleasant-faced little minister in New Jersey about whom the darlings of the flock gathered with great delight. His teachings were simple, his singing delightful, and the vocabulary of his prayers fervid to a degree. His wife grew old faster than he, and it occurred to him that she was too good for life this side of the grave, so he poisoned her, and one night when she was particularly low, returning from his prayer-meeting, he entered her bedroom. Smoothing back the wet hair from her aching head, he called her loving names and presented her with an apple. She ate it. Its arsenic-charged solidities did their final work upon her fragil frame, and ere the morning dawned her spirit stood upon the further shore, waiting the coming of her lord and master. Harden, that was his name, and a hardened scoundrel he was, was tried, convicted, and hanged. I never shall forget that picture. It was the first execution I ever saw. Being in New Jersey, a mob dominated the place. From the windows of the jail the women and the men looked out upon a courtyard packed to suffocation with smoking, shouting, swearing roughs. It was the old-style scaffold toward which the singing parson moved, heading a procession of officials and brother ministers; with a perfectly firm step he ascended the ladder, and stood upon the drop. He was dressed in neat black bombazine, with prunella gaiters. His black hair was carefully combed and brushed, and he smiled a sweet and saintly smile as he looked about upon the last congregation he could ever address, and asked permission to lead them in prayer. That man was as quiet and as calm as a sheep in the hands of his shearer. Death had no terror for him. He was the picture of self-satisfaction, the very personification of individual content, and in that frame of mind he stood until the bolt was drawn and he and the drop fell together, while those of us who looked on, broiling in the sun, shivered at the sight. Now, there was a man who for ten or fifteen years had been sane enough to preach the gospel, to giv advice, to listen with patience to tales of domestic misery, but he wasn't sane enough to see and to understand, to appreciate the certainty of the detection of the arsenic in his wife's body, and to hav traced to him and his final fruity gift the commission of a crime which insured his death upon the scaffold.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

Wi' joy unfeigned brothers and sisters meet,
An' each for other's welfare kindly spiers;
The social hours, swift-winged, unnoticed fleet;
Each tells the uncoes [news] that he sees or hears;
The parents, partial, eye their hopeful years,
Anticipation forward points the view.
The mother, wi' her needle and her shears,
Gars [makes] auld claes look amaist as well's the new;
The father mixes a' wi' admonition due.—Burns.

THE investigation and pursuit of truth is the special duty of man.—Cicero.

HE is the freeman whom the truth makes free,
And all are slaves beside. —Cowper.

TRUTH is but a conformity to nature, and to follow nature cannot be to combat truth.—Wollaston.

LET truth and falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?—Milton.

IT is falsehood, not truth, it is guilt, not innocence, which studiously excludes the light and flies examination.—Dr. George Campbell..

RING out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.
—Tennyson.

THE theory has been exploded that because a religion has stood the test of ages, it must of necessity be true. The test of one hour of reason is more crucial than the test of thousands of years of blind credulity.—Chicago Times.

IN things of the mind we look for no compulsion but that of light and reason.—Oliver Cromwell.

THE judges of Athens put Socrates to death on the ground that his opinions tended to corrupt the youth of that city. The High Court of Jerusalem sentenced Jesus to death on similar grounds. Practical Pilate asked, "What evil hath he done?" but he got no answer.—M. D. Conway.

BETTER is a little with righteousness than great revenues without right.——How much better is it to get wisdom than gold, and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver!——He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.—Proverbs xvi, 8, 16, 32.

THE gods who are immortal are not vexed because, during a long time, they must continually tolerate men, such as they are, and so many of them bad; and, besides this, they also take care of them in all ways. But thou who art destined to end so soon, art thou wearied of enduring the bad, and this, too, when thou art one of them?—M. A. Antoninus.

EUROPEANS believe in eternal punishment, partly because it has been taught them in their childhood and because they hav never considered what it means; partly because their imaginations are sluggish and they are unable to realize its cruelty; and partly, also, it must be feared, because they hav still the spirit of revenge and persecution in their hearts.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

JOHN LOCKE was born in 1632 and LeClerc in 1657, but though widely separated in age and though differing, probably, in many of their specific opinions, they were conscious that they were traveling the same road—a way then little frequented—the way which led from the received tenets of the churches and the schools to the arena of free inquiry and impartial investigation.—Fowler's Locke.

WHEN convinced that money may be earned without disgrace, we ought to allow money to carry the day. When we talk of sordid gain and filthy lucre, where is the priest, the lawyer, the doctor, or the man of literature, who does not wish for dirty hands? An income and the power of putting by something for old age, something for those who are to come after us, is the wholesome and acknowledged desire of all professional men.—Trollope's Thackeray.

IF a traveler does not meet one who is better than himself or his equal, let him firmly keep to his solitary journey; there is no companionship with a fool. ——He who possesses virtue and intelligence, who is just, speaks the truth, and does what is his own business—him the world will hold dear.——If one man conquer in battle a thousand times a thousand men, and if another conquer himself, he is the greatest of conquerors.—Buddha's Dramapada.

THE "Pilgrim's Progress" is a ludicrously overrated book.—Edgar Poe.

CHRISTIANITY is human in its origin, erroneous in its theories, delusiv in its threats and its rewards. Jesus Christ was a man, with all the faults and imperfections of the prophetic character. The Bible is simply a collection of Jewish writings. The miracles in the Old Testament deserve no more attention from historians than the miracles in Homer. The miracles in the gospels are like the miracles in Plutarch's Lives; they do not lessen the value of the biography, and the value of the biography does not lessen the absurdity of the miracles.—Winwood Reade.

To the crying up of faith in opposition to reason we may, I think, in good measure ascribe those absurdities that fill almost all the religions which possess and divide mankind. For men, having been principled with an opinion that they must not consult reason in the things of religion, however apparently [i. e., manifestly] contradictory to common sense and the very principles of all their knowledge, hav let loose their fancies and natural superstition and hav been by them drawn into so strange opinions and extravagant practices in religion that a considerate man cannot but stand amazed at their follies and judge them so far from being acceptable to the great and wise God that he cannot avoid thinking them ridiculous and offensiv to a sober, good man.—Locke Concerning Human Understanding.

Odds and Ends.

TAKE care of the poor Indians, and the poor Indians will take hair of you.

THE new governor of Rhode Island is named Wetmore. He is evidently a Baptist.

A RECENTLY published cook book includes a chapter with the odd title, "Why Not Eat Insects?" Did the author never eat huckleberry pie in a resturant?

TEACHER: "First boy, read." First boy: "Hope for a season bade the world farewell, and Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell." Teacher: "Why did Freedom shriek?" Second boy: "I dunno; guess a mouse run up her dress."

"YES," boasted an Englishman in the West, "I hav Tudor blood in my veins from my mother's side of the family, and Plantaganet from my father's." "Is that so?" said a citizen. "My blood is a little mixed, too. My grandfather was a Jersey tenderfoot, an' my grandmother was a Digger Indian squaw. We're both half-breeds, stranger. Shake!"

AMONG the specimen extracts from Miss Cleveland's forthcoming book we find the following significant morsel: "The humanity of each of us is like some vast æolian harp, constructed by the Master Musician and laid down tenderly by him on the seashore, where winds from every quarter play continuously." This is not as truly scientific a view of human origin, perhaps, as Mr. Darwin's monkey theory, but it is ever so much prettier.

IN New Orleans they gave a show
To beat the big Centennial;
To which her people said they'd go
When came the great millennial.

And when the month of June had come,
With heat to melt our collars,
The great big show had sunk the sum
Of about two million dollars.

WHEN a woman her home would decorate,
She stops not at obstacles small or great,
But the funniest sight her trials afford
Is when madam essays to saw a board.

With her knee on a plank, and the plank on a chair,
She poises her saw with a knowing air;
Makes several wild rasps at the pencilled line,
And is off with a whizz the reverse of fine.

With lips compressed she gets down to work,
And crosses the timber jerkity-jerk;
She can't keep to the line, her knee slips askew,
But she keeps to the work till the board splits in two.

She has damaged the chair, she has ruined the saw,
Her back is aching, her hands are raw,
And she finds, when she tries to fit her prize,
It's an inch too short of the requisit size.

SHE practiced on him all her wiles
Till in love's silken net she caught him,
And showered on him her sweetest smiles
When to her feet she captiv brought him.

But when he pleaded with the maid
To be regarded as her lover,
She sighed a little, blushed, and said,
"Please wait until the summer's over."

And then began love's golden dream;
To every picnic, every dance he Took her, and bought her lemon cream
And other things that maidens fancy.

At beach hotels with her he hopped,
For she was quite an ardent dancer;
At length the youth the question popped,
And waited for the maiden's answer.

It drew the sweetness from his life,
It burnt and scorched him like a blister;
'Twas this: "I cannot be your wife,
But I will be to you a sister."

AN umpire went sallying out into the east,
Out into the east, ere the sun went down.
He thought of the club that loved him least
And the quickest way to leave the town.
But men must chin and boys must cheer,
And the umpire's lot is hard and drear,
Along with the crowd and its groaning.

A man stood up and called out Foul!
And called out Foul! with an angry frown,
Then made for the gate with a sudden howl,
While the mob with bricks tried to knock him down.
For men will fight and boys will jeer,
And luck is best when the gate is near,
To escape from the crowd and its groaning.

A doctor was working the best he knew how,
The best he knew how, as the sun went down.
He thought as he plastered the broken brow
Of the awful yells and the missils thrown.
For clubs will play and mobs will fight,
And the umpire's lucky if he livs till night
To escape from the crowd and its groaning.
—Philadelphia Call.

THE "free pass" question has very much agitated the present session of the Arkansaw legislature. The other day a well-known representativ arose and said: "Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a resolution making it a misdemeanor for any member of a future session of the Arkansaw legislature to accept a free pass ever a railroad." "Why not let it apply to the members of the present session?" some one asked. "Oh, no, that won't do. We've all got passes and it would be impolite to return them. Sir, this pass system is wrong. It has a tendency, sir, to corrupt, but it saves money. If they hadn't sent me a pass I don't know how I would hav got here. Reckon I'd had to walk, but, sir, it is our duty to relieve future legislators from temptation. I am in favor of all good measures, and I promised my people that I would work for the temperance cause. I am a temperance man from the word go." In turning suddenly, his coat tails struck the corner of the desk. Reaching back and taking the dripping fragments of a bottle from his pocket he remarked: "Temperance is the salvation of man and the joy of woman, but I'd like devilish well to know who put that bottle in my pocket. Smells like pretty good licker, too. Speaking about passes, why, sir, the future legislator ought to hav every possible inducement to behave himself."—Arkansaw Traveler.

COLONEL INGERSOLL and family are spending the summer at Marblehead, near Boston, Mass.

TALMAGE'S life is insured for $60,000. It is safe to say that Talmage did the valuation himself.—Galveston News.

THE Congregationalist compliments the American press by saying there is no daily publication thoroughly deserving to be described as a Christian newspaper.

IN Arkansas no saloon can be built within 640 rods of a church. Hence the nativs build the saloon first; then they erect the church right across the road.

No. 744 Broadway, where the office of the National Liberal League was, is now headquarters for the special agents of the National and State Labor Bureaus.

PRESIDENT MCCOSH, of Princeton, is credited with the statement that the age of nine or ten years is the best at which to attempt to acquire a knowledge of languages. He maintains that a child of that age can learn more easily than a man of twenty-five.

"I CAN'T account for the small attendance at church Sundays," remarked Parson Jones. "Neither can I," replied Fogg with his customary frankness; "I went a few Sundays ago, and I couldn't see anything to attract the small attendance I saw there."

A CLERGYMAN never strikes for more wages. He doesn't hav to. He simply notifies his congregation that he has received a call from a church in a distant city where there is "a broader field for his usefulness"—and a higher salary.—Boston Traveller.

IT was a center shot and a hard hit when the New York woman suffragists called attention to the mockery of making a statue of liberty in the form of a woman to be placed at the portals of a state where women are disfranchised.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A MISS HELEN TAYLOR has consented to stand for North Camberwell, England, at the next election, there being no law against a woman sitting and voting in the House of Commons. As she has every prospect of being elected, the next house will possess refining influences to soothe its anger of discussion.

VICTOR HUGO hated Goethe because the latter severely criticised "Notre Dame de Paris" when it first appeared. "Goethe," said he to a literary visitor, "only produced one really good work, 'The Robbers.'" The visitor was astonished at the apparent blunder, until Hugo added, with a sneer, "And that one was written by Schiller!"

THE Christian Leader has an editorial contributor of great fame for ability and accuracy. A while ago one of his paragraphs contained the following: "To the impartial eye of the Judge of all the earth we cannot doubt that Protestant bigotry smells as rank as Catholic!" This is the first intimation the world has received that the Almighty smells with his eye.

IN Toledo, O., two weeks ago last Sunday, a riot occurred regarding the resignation of a Roman Catholic priest. After the close of the church services a body of his friends attacked the houses of some who had been prominent in the opposition to the priest. Two men were killed, a woman was clubbed so that it was thought she would die, and one house was demolished.

THE Morning Star, a Roman Catholic paper published at New Orleans, La., givs these directions for being saved: "There is a law of nature, that is, an image of God's nature, impressed on the conscience of man. All that he has to do to be saved is to do what he believes to be right. If he does this, it is because he has the proper disposition, because he has a good will, because he would do anything else if he knew it to be right." Such a man as this, the Star thinks, would embrace Christianity when it was brought to his notice, and demand baptism as soon as he heard of it, so that all well-meaning heathen hav been saved.

THE New York Congregational church sent out missionaries to Armenia and, at great expense, made an Orthodox Christian out of a Turk named Siraganian, who came to this city. He fell in with the Baptists, and has joined their church. The Congregationalists are very sore over the affair, while the Baptists are jubilant. Brother Siraganian will shortly return to Armenia as a missionary.

"THE public school-teacher, following the text book, tells the pupil that the Reformation was really a reformation, and that the world is better and purer because Luther lived. Catholics hav to pay for the dissemination of such knowledge as this." For which reason the Catholic Freeman's Journal wishes parochial schools established, where the truths of history will be sedulously concealed from the pupil.

THE Hebrew Standard says: "We are often amused at the comparison of the Puritan Sunday with the Sabbath of the Jews. They are entirely dissimilar and as opposit in their character as the poles. The Sabbath is made for the enjoyment of man, and if there is anything enjoyable in a long face, a sour visage, a three hours' sermon, a cold dinner, or a day passed in nasal psalm-singing, the Jews hav not found it out yet."

"How much for the trip?" asked a tourist in Palestine of a boatman who had taken him to several points of interest in the Sea of Galilee. "Ten shekels, sir." "What?" exclaimed the traveler; "ten shekels? Why, that is an outrageous charge!" "Can't help it, sir. That's what folks hav paid ever since the sea was here." "Well," growled the voyager, as he handed over the money, "I don't wonder that Jesus Christ concluded to walk it."

REFERRING to Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, the Examiner, a religious paper, says: "The one thing that will most effectually hinder woman from whatever rights she may still justly claim to hav recognized will be the championing of her cause by female Ingersolls." One reason why woman has never had any more rights is because she has waited for some female Christian to champion them. Nothing good, worth speaking of, ever came out of Nazareth yet if Nazareth could help itself.

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN has published some religious poems. Here is a specimen. It will be seen that Mr. Austin is of a thankful disposition:

"Thanks for all things that are—
For the fair, the foul, the fell.
Thanks for the Morning Star,
And the nethermost murk of hell;

"For the music of moonlight nights,
And the savor of summer days;
For the swoop of carrion kites,
And the stench of gibbeted jays."

THE Pall Mall Gazette is publishing some terrible revelations about London immorality. It appears that rich, titled, and pious noble lords are in the habit of trafficking in the virtue of young girls. Dates, numbers of houses, streets, and descriptions of persons that leave no doubt of their identity are given. The general impression is that the charges are true. No suits hav as yet been brought against the paper. London morality has never been high; but the people of England can point to one fact with pride: an Atheist, though thrice elected, will not be permitted to sit in the national Parliament!

THE Boston correspondent of the Examiner says: "The Episcopal Theological Seminary at Cambridge has just graduated a senior class of eight members. It is evident that apostolic succession is no safeguard against rationalizing tendencies; for this school, established as an antidote to the high church spirit of the New York Seminary, welcomes the largest liberalism of the age. Some of its professors might compete for honors with Unitarian leaders of the extreme left wing. One of its faculty still retains the influence of his former Baptist training, and is probably more evangelical than any of his colleagues. But the whole school feels a strong pressure from the environment of Harvard, and the trend is strong toward ultra Rationalism."

THE Salvation Army is without honor in its own country. Says the London Saturday Review: "The skunk—that is the name of the animal—is, as everybody knows, difficult to tackle, not because he is formidable by his strength or his courage, but for another reason. You may kill him if you hav the good fortune—it is good fortune in this case—to hav no sense of smell; but even if you succeed you remain unclean for eight days at least. An odor as of a house in Lowndes Square after a flood of sewage hangs round you. These well-known facts hav been recalled to memory by the most recent proceedings of the Salvation Army. They are not to be touched, many of them, simply because they are unutterably offensiv. It would seem that the professed religious world has more patience with blasphemous buffoonery than with differences in creed."

THE revisers of the Old Testament hav changed "hell" into "sheol." Two hundred years ago the man who would hav suggested any such thing would hav been burnt at the stake just to convince him of his error.——Allegogha, an alleged Christian chief in Africa, caused nine hostages to be cooked and eaten because the men who had assaulted him were not quickly delivered up. Some folks will raise their hands in holy horror and say that he did not act like a Christian, but he had not been a convert long enough to learn all his duties. If he had had more experience, he might hav learnt how to act in a more shocking manner.——A son of Dr. Howard Crosby is said to possess enough love for the world to make up for all his reverend parent's piety. ——You can set any two professional theologians to fighting by asking them what true religion really is. The truth of it is that neither of them knows anything about it.—Texas Siftings.

IN France, says the Independent, there is commotion in religion as well as in politics. The survival of the republic for fifteen years indicates its permanence, and that the hierarchy cannot hold a political dictatorship. There is steady progress toward the severance of the connection between church and state. The appalling prevalence of Infidelity shows the utter failure of Romanism as a power for proper religious training. The hierarchy had full control in France; it was the sole teacher of religion and morals; but it was unable to hold the confidence of the people, and they broke away from the guidance of the church, and became not merely indifferent, but, to a great extent, bitterly hostil to Christianity. Italy is another witness to the failure of Romanism; for Italy, like France, is largely skeptical. With only the papal hierarchy to guide them, the people hav wandered away from the gospel, and very largely deny the truth of Christianity.

THE industry of discovering ancient manuscripts goes bravely on. The latest is announced from Vienna, Austria. A correspondent of the London Times says: "An important discovery has been made among the manuscripts which Archduke Renier brought back two years ago from El Fayoum, in Egypt, and which are known collectivly to orientalists as 'Corpus Papyrorum Raineri Archiducis.' A fragment of the New Testament has been found comprising a chapter which differs from St. Matthew, chapter xxvi, verses 30 to 34, and from St. Mark, chapter xiv, verses 26 to 30, more than these evangelists differ from each other. The fragment seems to hav been written in the third century A.D., though, according to the style, it might belong to the first century. In the description of the Last Supper the passage in which our Lord predicts his betrayal is quite different from that in the two gospels, and the words, 'But after I am risen again I will go before you into Galilee,' are wanting. Peter's oath varies also in wording and length. The whole style of the fragment is vigorous, terse, and clear. According to Dr. Bicken, of Innsbruck, the fragment must be the copy of a munuscript older than those from which the accepted versions of St. Matthew and St. Mark hav been taken. The papyrus is at present in the hands of the orientalist Professor Karabacek, of Vienna, and a fac-simile of it is to be published."

What Is the Catholic School Policy?

From the North American Review.

The Plenary Council of Baltimore has made our national Thanksgiving Day a "feast of obligation," thus, as it were, sacro-sanctifying what the will of a free people long since made really holy forever. This may be considered by some as a proof that Catholicism and democracy are not necessarily antagonistic, and it may even prepare the public to receive with composure, as a claim founded on justice, the demand which will ere long be made for a division of the school-tax in such a manner as that Catholic "parish" schools may be virtually endowed by the state. From the standpoint of the Syllabus the common schools of this country are not to be trusted with the education of the children of Catholic parents. They are, like the elementary schools of Belgium, Germany, etc., "godless" places, on the same principle that an "Edinburgh" reviewer once termed George Eliot a "godless" writer. They teach morality, but not as a pendant to the Nicene Creed; they endeavor to lay the foundations of good citizenship, but not in connection with the postulates of any catechism of theology. Consequently, the Roman church—bound as it is to oppose to the uttermost those principles of progress, Liberalism, and the new civilization which are condemned in the Syllabus—cannot look with favor on our common school system, and, as was long since foreseen, the conflict between clericalism and Secularism, begun in Prussia, and continued in Italy, Belgium, and elsewhere, has yet to be waged in the United States. It will be a serious conflict, because one of antithetical principles. Under the late pope the Roman church was definitivly committed to absolutism, and the Catholic conscience was compelled to receive new doctrins which some of the most eminent among modern statesmen hav declared to be utterly destructiv of loyalty and allegiance to the state.

The instinctiv antipathy between Romanism and the modern secular school system must naturally find expression in overt hostility to that system wherever adopted. The papacy is the oldest monarchy in existence, and its traditions and history for over a thousand years enable it always to maintain an attitude of consistency. The secular system adopted in the common schools in this country is necessarily, from the point of view which the Roman church must take, a "godless" system, inasmuch as it fosters independent thinking, and inspires mental habits antagonistic to passiv obedience or intellectual submissivness to authority. Nowhere in Christendom has the church so much reason to dread this Secularism as in the United States. Everywhere in Europe during the last half century Romanism has lost ground; even in England its progress has been incommensurate with the increase of population. Hippeau says:

"In Austria all instruction, public and private, was handed over to the Catholic clergy, by virtue of the Concordat of 1855. . . . Since 1868 all has changed. The supervision and the direction of education hav been taken from the authority of the church and restored to the hands of the state. The school is no longer confessional, for the reason that every school that receives public aid must be accessible to all children, without distinction of sect."

In Germany, the so-called Culturkampf is suspended by a truce that can only be temporary; indeed, while these lines are being written, the telegraph tells us that the Clericals and Socialists hav, by uniting their votes against Prince Bismarck, effectually broken the armistice, while it is certain that the principle of completely secularizing the schools must ultimately prevail. In France, the policy of secularization has absolutely triumphed, and in England, despite "conscience clauses" and other compromises, the politicians of the future are almost definitly committed to the same principle. Only in the United States has the Roman church made real headway during this period, and this expansion is due really to immigration. In the Old World, as ignorance is being dispelled under the influence of the public schools, so is superstition declining; hence Romanism is making no gains in Europe. In this country it is only thriving on the imported illiteracy fostered by itself in other lands, an illiteracy which our excellent school system precludes from being transmitted to other generations. Having this prospectiv increase in view, the prelacy hav made vigorous efforts to provide the means for preserving the allegiance and securing the faith of the immigrant Catholics and their children. They hav built about three thousand parochial schools, and they now support about ninety colleges, six hundred minor academies, and various seminaries for training ecclesiastics. So rapid, however, has been the increase of the Catholic population that the prelacy hav, in the matter of schools, been unable to keep pace with it, and necessarily a large proportion of Catholic children hav found their way into the common schools, undoubtedly to their own advantage, but to the detriment of Catholic progress. Prof. W. H. Payne, of Ann Arbor, Mich., writes:

"I am not sure that the Catholic clergy know the full extent of their danger from this source. On one occasion a poor widow brought me her little boy, saying, 'Please place this boy in your school; I am bound that this one of my children shall know something besides his catechism, and I do not care what priest or bishop may say about it, either.'"

There need be no doubt that the Catholic clergy are not ignorant of the inimical operation of the common school to Catholicity. Whoever credits them with purblindness on this point mistakes them greatly. They know that the public school stands for and represents the spirit of modern progress; that it favors and develops the formation of the modern conscience, which makes creed dependent on reason and knowledge, instead of authority; and that it is an institution as utterly alien to their church as were the sturdy colonists of Massachusetts Bay, by whom the first public schools of America were established. They hav known all this for two generations, and over forty years ago they made a vigorous effort in New York to secure for themselvs and their schools a share of the public money. How they were worsted in that skirmish is well known; but though worsted, they were not vanquished. They hav not ceased to complain, as Dr. Newman complains in England, "We are forced to pay rates for the establishment of secular schools which we cannot use, and then we hav to find means over again for building schools of our own." This they characterize as an outrage, not because they can urge any serious charge against the public schools as means of educating children in secular knowledge, but because the common schools cannot be used to disciplin children in accordance with Catholic belief and practice. Nothing can be feebler than Bishop McQuaid's impeachment of the American school system, as urged in the Boston Journal of Education of Jan. 18, 1883. It is, he alleges, based on a communistic principle, in "utter disregard of the rights of large numbers of citizens;" and inasmuch as it meddles with the duties and interferes with the rights and responsibilities of parents, it is an "unmitigated despotism." It has failed to eliminate the "street Arab" and the dangerous classes, it is a costly experiment, and it has not redeemed the world or enabled us to dispense with prisons. This doctrin of absolute parental rights is rather a novel, not to say an eccentric, one; it has never yet been accepted in any civilized state among pagans or Christians; and it is assuredly one which Rome would hav censured in the ages when the church engrossed and controled the prerogativ of public instruction. The fundamental idea of our public school is based on the principles of '76, and its purpose is to educate the children of the nation into good citizens on the broad ground of human equality upon which the republic is founded. Nearly every state in Europe has accepted the responsibility of forming the mind and character of its children, a responsibility whose assumption was rendered necessary by the indisputable fact that no state church has ever succeeded in educating a people, their failure in this respect being well-nigh as pronounced as was that of the Roman church to effect the moral redemption of society in the long period of its undisputed supremacy throughout Christendom. That even this slight approximation to the communist idea should shock the Romanist prelacy may be very natural, considering how exceedingly un-Catholic must hav been the condition which prevailed among the early Christians before Ananias and Sapphira opened a way to the spirit of papalism, when greed induced them to "lie to the holy Ghost."

This is not the place, however, for a defense of our common schools. They hav already been triumphantly vindicated from such puny attacks as that to which reference has here been made, and the general verdict, based on experience of their efficiency, economy, moral results, and equity, will render it more than improbable for any machinations against them to succeed. The time, however, seems an appropriate one for the inquiry to be made whether the church of Rome, or any schools founded under its auspices, can be trusted as a factor in educating children into good citizenship. The demand made at the Plenary Council of Baltimore for "such a division of the school-tax as will enable the bishops to place their schools on a level with the public schools" is a serious one, and common sense requires us to consider the probability, in the event of such a division of public money, of the Catholic schools ever attaining this level. First, then, with regard to moral education. Criminal statistics loudly declare that Romanism does not insure law-abidingness on the part of those whom it educates. If the fountain-head be impure, we ought not to wonder if lower down the water is found tainted. Morality has never been a very marked characteristic of the See of Rome, and those who care to study Liverani's "Il Papato, L'Impero, e il Regno d'Italia" (Florence, 1861) will understand the possibility of being "near the church, but far from God." In 1656, Pascal pointed out the perils of Probabilism in Casuistry, and Richard and Giraud, later on, denounced it for its immorality; but Liguori may now be considered the confessor's guide, and however moral he himself may hav been, his casuistry, and that of other text-books, can be said to hold the candle to the perpetrators of murder, adultery, idolatry, and theft. The good sense of the American people will not fail them if called upon to decide between the ethics of daily practice, as taught in our schools, and a system whose merits are strongly appreciated by the "cyprians" of our streets and by footpads, as shown in their evident belief that a life of wickedness can be atoned for at the last moment by merely "sending for a priest." The Italian government has rooted out brigandage; it can hardly be likely that the American people will patronize or encourage brigand morality.

Intellectually it seems almost impossible for schools conducted on the principle of observing Catholic disciplin to attain the level of our common schools. If, as the Plenary Council laments, the necessity is so great for a better educated clergy, we may well ask how badly instructed ecclesiastics can be regarded as competent judges of education at all. Under the guidance of Pius IX., the church deliberately elected to wage war against independence of thought, and in the fulminations of the Vatican Council we discern a spirit utterly opposed to that individualism which it is the aim of modern education to encourage and strengthen:

"Let him be anathema who shall say that human sciences ought to be pursued in such a spirit of freedom that one may be allowed to hold as true their assertions, even when opposed to revealed doctrin:

"'Who shall say that it may at any time come to pass, in the progress of science, that the doctrins set forth by the church must be taken in another sense than that in which the church has ever received and yet receives them?'"

There is no hypocrisy, no attempt even at concealment, in this. It is an open declaration of war against modern thought, science, and the freedom of research; and were it possible for the Roman church to deal with the pioneers of knowledge in our day as it dealt with Bruno and Galileo, these fulminations might prove something more than impotent gnashing of fangs long since blunted. The highest intellectual training of Romanism is that of the Jesuits, and however thorough this may be in its way, it is, after all, only a receptiv training, a system of words, not things, whose condemnation may be seen in the fact that neither modern philosophy nor science has been indebted to the Roman church for any marked triumph or discovery. Among modern metaphysicians the late W. G. Ward ranks high as an abstract thinker, but he was the product of the Church of England. The revealed doctrin of Catholicism is a stereotyped thing, and what encouragement can there be for the investigator into nature who has always before his mind the consciousness that, however clearly it may speak, the "voice of nature must be silent before faith?" Among the Reformed, or Protestant churches, despite their first hesitation when geological and astronomical discovery began to open the way to generalizations that seemed to conflict with the ipsisima verba of scripture, not one has been false to the grand principle of free inquiry which underlay the Reformation; so that it has come to pass that in every Protestant community the voice of nature is now regarded as the voice of God. Where enlightened reason and fuller knowledge hav demonstrated that certain old opinions were erroneous, patient study and reflection hav also shown that those opinions were in reality non-essentials of truth, and they hav been quietly buried. With Rome the case is different. It has consolidated and cemented its teachings with every period of its existence, so that consistency requires it now to uphold every stone in the antiquated edifice, since for every such portion an equally divine authority has been claimed with the whole structure.

The Catholics of Ireland hav for years had two sources of primary instruction open to them—the national schools and those of the Christian Brothers. As a preparation for secular life the former is superior to the latter, but both are decidedly below the elementary schools of England to which the Education act of 1870 gave birth. The Irish prelacy know well that, when tested by results, their diocesan colleges cannot compete with the "godless" Queen's colleges, while the Catholic University, which was to deprive old Trinity of the scions of the Catholic aristocracy of the country, has proved a miserable failure in that respect. The civilized world has but recently witnessed one result of Catholic education in the hostility of the Italian peasantry to the doctors who were fighting the cholera, and in their superstitious confidence in the blood of San Gennarow as a prophylactic. Little, indeed, did the sturdy settlers of Massachusetts Bay foresee the time when the educational system founded, as Macaulay said, in accordance with the principles to which they pledged themselvs, "that education was a matter of the deepest possible interest to all nations and to all communities, . . . in an eminent degree deserving of the peculiar attention of the state," should be called in question as perilous to morality and religion by the representativs of a church whose highest educational seminaries are hotbeds of irrational fetichism. There is not one such seminary where some of the students, and perhaps teachers, do not wear the Carmelite scapular, to insure absolute immunity from damnation and other spiritual premiums, or the Franciscan cord, with its ridiculous indulgence, "more than enough to deliver thousands and thousands of souls from purgatory every day." There is not probably in the world one such school whose controlers would dare to pursue the study of history impartially, to favor unrestricted scientific research, or any other philosophy than that of petrifaction. A crooked stick will hav a crooked shadow; and in the light of the perverse twisting designedly imparted within our own time to the Roman tree, we should be fatuous indeed were we to expect it to bear the fruits of civil and intellectual liberty. The premier of England—himself an earnest Christian and zealous Catholic of the Anglican type—has expressed his conviction that "every convert and member of the pope's church places his loyalty and civil duty at the mercy of another," and this opinion is general among European statesmen. Doubtless, were American Catholics ever brought face to face with the dilemma of a divided allegiance, they would, as men of other nationalities hav sometimes done before them, fulfil the duties required of every patriotic citizen. None the less, however, does it behoove every citizen of the republic to reflect upon the possible, and to measure the inevitable evils certain to result from interfering with our common school system, whose efficiency in training our children has been amply and triumphantly demonstrated. "If," says the proverb, "we are bound to forgiv an enemy, we are not bound to trust him;" and it is impossible for us to forget that the demand for a change in our school system comes from those whose first allegiance and duty hav been claimed by and mentally conceded to an authority that has steadily and consistently opposed that New Civilization which is emphatically and energetically represented in the Constitution and life of the United States.

M. C. O'Byrne.

About the Hebrews.

Although New York is the largest city in America, it is the least American of any large city in America. Nativ New Yorkers—the cockneys of America—delight to call it "a cosmopolitan city," while its detractors sometimes describe it as "a dumping-ground for the race-refuse of Europe"—and sometimes as a modern Macbeth's witches' caldron. All these definitions are correct. New York is the city of many nations. Here only, in big crude lumps, can be seen the race elements from which the coming American is to be molded. Not London even, nor Paris, has a more diversified population.

Sunday before last, it happened that I was called on in the forenoon by a Catholic Paulist father, and by a Jewish Christian mystic, and then by a Virginian black and a famous Irish journalist. In the evening I attended the celebration of the Commune—a large audience of French Communists, German Socialists, and Russian Nihilists, and there heard speeches made in three languages, and saw beer drunk in seven or eight. I heard Most and talked to Schwab.

In one group there I saw four persons of the Hebrew race—an American, a lawyer, whose ancestors had lived here for two centuries; a German, also a lawyer, who had been long resident in this country, but who was born abroad; a Bohemian maiden, with black, bright eyes, who had been driven from Prague by the recent Jew baiting mobs, and a young Russian, also of the Hebrew stock, who had been one of the Nihilist propaganda, and had escaped a long sentence to Siberia by evading the police and securing false passports. They were all highly educated persons.

The topic of the day, in Jewish circles, was the boycotting of two Jewish candidates for admission to the Hussars. This led to a talk with one of the Jewish lawyers about the Hebrews in New York. I took down his answers verbatim in shorthand.

"To begin with," I said, "will you tell me the difference, if there is any difference, between the terms Hebrew, Israelite, and Jew, and whether the term Jew is offensiv to a man of the Hebrew race?"

"The terms Hebrew, Israelite, and Jew," he replied, "are not synonymous, but represent distinct historical periods of our race. Hebrew represents the early Abrahamic or nomadic period. Israelite was the title of the theocracy founded after the Exodus, and in the land of Canaan; while Jew was the name of the remnant left in Palestine after the separation of Judah from Israel and the loss of the ten tribes. The word Jew is not offensiv unless used in an offensiv way, just as the word Yankee may be used as the name of a people, or as an insulting epithet. We Jews call ourselvs Jews among ourselvs. The two great divisions of the Jews are the Sephardic and the Ashkenasim."

"What do they mean?"

"The Sephardic are the descendants of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews. The Ashkenasim are all the rest of us. The Sephardic, until late years, hav always acquired greater distinction than the Ashkenasim. The Sephardic hav a tradition that their higher rank and general freedom from persecution are due to the fact that their ancestors were residents of Spain during the period of Christ's life on earth, and, therefore, not having been responsible in any way for the crucifixion, were spared the curse that fell so heavily on their brethren elsewhere. Of late years the German Jews hav acquired greater opportunities by emigration for advancement, both materially and mentally, and therefore they are rapidly winning a higher rank than was possible for them in former times."

"Do these divisions designate their religious divergencies also?"

"No; the Jews to-day are divided, religiously, into Orthodox, Liberal, and Radical. Yet these divisions are not so strongly emphasized as the same words would denote in talking of Christian sects. The Hebrew ritual is sometimes a conglomerate of all three forms of religious thought. Even in biblical times the Jews were divided into Rabbinical and Biblical. The Rabbinical party was the party of forms and ceremonies, and observances, and traditions. The Biblical party placed the spirit above the letter of the law. This division, therefore, as it is founded in the nature of things, will probably be perpetual. Modern Jews are fond of contending that the work of Christ in his life was largely that of a Jewish reformer, bent on warring against the formalism of Rabbinical Judaism, and that nothing was further from his intention than the founding of a new religion."

"What organization does the Jewish Radical support?"

"The Jew who affects radical opinions in religious matters rarely attaches himself to any distinctiv denomination. He merely ceases to attend the synagog, or, perhaps, if he is not entirely emancipated, he attends the lectures of Professor Adler. But, bear in mind, in becoming a religious Radical, and in ceasing to attend the ancient worship, he does not the less cease to remain a Jew. For example, during the controversies which social ostracism hav recently engendered in this country, some of the most fiery advocates of the social rights and equality of the Jews were found among men who had long ceased to attend the ministrations of the synagog. Our pride of race remains. For instance, among the most zealous of those who took part in providing for the Russian exiled Jews, recently, were men—Jews—who had married Christian women, and whose children had been baptized, and who, themselvs, had never been inside of a synagog for from ten to fifteen years. Christian writers, in discussing Jewish problems, often fall into the error of not taking into due consideration our pride—you may say, if you choose, our enormous pride—of race, of which Lord Beaconsfield, a baptized Jew, was a conspicuous example; of which Mr. Lewes, the husband of George Eliot, was an equally striking instance in another field.

"Will you giv me a few facts about the Jews here?"

"Well, the Jewish parents spend more money on the education of their children than any other class, in proportion to their means. I never yet saw a man or woman of my race who could not read—at least in the Hebrew tongue. They are at the head of the money markets—such men, for example, as Seligman (an orthodox Jew), Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the great bankers, and Halgarten & Co. There are large numbers of Jewish brokers, and wealthy Jews are found everywhere in every branch of trade. Everyone knows that fact. We are strong in music. Of course you know that Mendelsshon, Handel, Hadyn, Verdi, Offenbach, Strauss, and Rubenstein were or are of the Jewish stock. Dr. Damrosch was a Jew. Most of the music teachers of this city are Jews or Jewesses. In art? Well, we are not particularly distinguished in plastic art. Perhaps it is true that our religion killed plastic art among us, as Ingersoll says, but the same command preserved our race from idolatry. In agriculture? Well, here again every educated Jew acknowledges the deficiency of his race. For ages our people hav not been allowed to hold land, and, therefore, we hav cultivated trade instead of the soil. But we are trying to remedy this inherited, this enforced deficiency. In our charities technical education is now made prominent. We hav established a technological institute."

"Many attempts hav been made to convert the Jews to Christianity? What, in your opinion, has been the chief obstacle to these attempts?"

"The chief obstacle to the conversion of the Jews to Christianity is that it has been attempted to make the Jew an anti-Jew as well as a Christian; not only to love Christ but to hate his race, instead of trying to teach him that the Christian religion was not the destruction of Judaism but supplementary to it. The Jewish Christians regard Christ as a great Jewish prophet."

"Where is orthodoxy strongest?"

"Well, orthodoxy is most prevalent among those who hav the more recently arrived in this country. The longer the average Jew remains here the less orthodox he becomes. The most representativ synagog, perhaps, of the orthodox in New York is the congregation Sheareth Israel in 19th street near Fifth avenue. The music at this synagog is especially fine. It is arranged from Jewish melodies of immemorial antiquity in Spain. The best synagog of the Liberal is the Temple Emanuel in Fifth avenue, corner of 43d street. Its services are principally in English and German, and its rabbi, Rev. Dr. Gottheil, is a man of eloquence and learning. Radicals, of course, hav no recognized leader, but in the popular estimation Prof. Felix Adler is regarded as their representativ. He lectures every Sunday in Chickering Hall. His congregation is mostly made up of German Jews."

"What is the estimated population of the Jewish race in America?"

"It can only be guessed. No authentic data exist. An estimate was made which gave 75 000 to this city, and it is believed that 350,000 for the entire country would not be far wrong."

"Is there really much social prejudice against the Jews in America?"

"Yes," said my friend, "there is far more than is commonly supposed. We might pass over such incidents as Corbett and Judge Hilton, and even as this disturbance in the Hussars, if they were not rather symptoms than exceptions. Take social life. Dodworth's dancing academy in this city is regarded as the best private school of that kind for young ladies. Yet no Jewess need apply there, for she would not be admitted, however eminent in literature, in science, or in commerce her father might be. Do you remember the recent case of Mrs. Jacobi? Dr. Jacobi, her husband, is recognized as an eminent specialist in children's diseases. His wife was the daughter of George Putnam, the noted publisher, and she, of course, was the sister of "George Putnam's Sons," who succeeded to his business. Mrs. Jacobi never embraced the Jewish faith—never became a Jewess—and Dr. Jacobi had not been inside of a synagog for twenty years. Yet she was refused a suite of rooms for the summer at a hotel in Staten Island. Oh, yes, there is great social prejudice against the Jews yet."

I am not permitted to giv the name of my Jewish friend, but he is a well-known scholar and lawyer of eminence. I hav read the interview to other Jewish men of learning and talent, and they pronounce its statements correct, from the "Liberal" point of view.

An American lawyer who has had large practice among the Hebrews of New York to whom also I read the interview, corroborates its accuracy, and made a few additional points.

"The true reason why the Spanish and Portuguese Jews hav been more successful than the Jews of other nationalities is owing to their intellectual advancement for one thousand years under the Moors. The Portuguese Jews stand high here. In South Carolina and Georgia, particularly, they occupied leading positions before the war—higher, relativly than in the North, for example, Chief Justice Moses, and Senator Benjamin, of Louisiana. In Poland, as I know, the boys are driven to their Talmud at an early age, and spend years in its study. This makes them familiar with philosophy of a high character, full of subtle, metaphysical distinctions; sharpening the naturally acute Jewish mind, and teaching him to regard form as the 'one thing essential' of religion. They preserve to-day the practices of the Pharisees—don't you remember Rubinstein who was hanged for murdering his sweetheart? He killed her lest his reputation in the synogog might be injured by its being known that he had seduced her! He wore phylactories and texts on his forehead; and in jail went through a lot of formalities called prayers three or four times a day. Yet he and all his relations perjured themselvs to establish an alibi on the trial."

I read the interview to a Catholic friend and scholar. He said:

"The Jews deserve to be honored in America. They are good citizens. Very seldom do you see them in the prisoner's bar, as thieves or robbers, nor in the poorhouse, nor in other charitable institutions. They are a good-hearted race, kind to each other, and affectionate to all their relations. I think that the reason why they are so well-to-do, is not because they cheat or overreach, but because they are content with smaller profits. They are ahead because they deserve to be."

James Redpath.

True Greatness

When Washington advised the weak thirteen colonies to beware of foreign influence and entanglements, no unholy ambition for empire and competition with European powers had entered a single breast. Small in numbers, and limited to thirteen colonies, how great we were! What a mighty moral power in the world! Out of an earnest desire to increase our power has grown up a singular spectacle. The greater our numbers and territory, the more insatiable our unholy, damnable ambition to eclipse the world. States rival states, cities compete against cities. We cannot rest till every state in this union is so crowded with people they shall be in the miserable condition of crowded Europe. "There is no greatness but in numbers and wealth." If ever any people were cursed with such insane blindness as to believe that gross, vulgar lie, it is ourselvs. As a result, ere twenty years pass, our people shall be cut off from many privileges, a few shall be immensly rich and millions poor, the land will be denuded of its forests, rivers dried up, climate changed unfavorably, and yet in all the elements of true greatness what more shall we be?

Among the People.

I never found the people more alive to Freethought than now, which is indeed encouraging.

MAPLETON, MINN.—Mr. G. W. Rima, an earnest, aggressiv, working Liberal, engaged me to deliver five lectures—two at Mapleton, two at Sterling, and one at Good Thunder.

Mr. Wyman conducted me to my quarters, and in an hour I found myself in a Baptist quarterly meeting. There the information was furnished that the church would come off victorious in its conflict with Infidelity. What a flutter of excitement even the bare announcement of Antichristian lectures does cause! The more our principles spread, the more noticeable the alarm in the church. The leaders gather their flock, purse their mouths, look defiant, and shout, "Who's afraid!"

Two good audiences were at our Liberal meetings, many coming a distance of eight and twelve miles, and some came sixteen.

The Baptists held three services that day. The preachers raved. Women had contemplated holding a prayer-meeting at our hall entrance to request God to keep the people away from our Infidel discourses. That would hav been jolly. They finally concluded to do it themselvs, instead of speaking to God about it. Gentlemen were called to account in the street by some good Christian sisters for encouraging Infidel lectures in their sweet and peaceful town of maples. The sisters indignantly protested that whoever sent for the horrid Infidel "ought to be ashamed of themselvs, so they ought." Our Infidel brethren bore their castigations calmly and smilingly. They engaged me to giv double the number of lectures. Discussions filled street and store and domicil. By Sunday evening the conflagration reached the Baptist pulpit. The church was full for once, and the Rev. Augur bored us through and through on the superiority of Christianity to Infidelity. I took notes, and on Monday evening devoted about fifteen minutes to a reply, which is about all that is needed to dispose of the average preacher, and which I submit verbatim:

ELDER AUGUR'S SERMON AGAINST INFIDELITY.—Last night we listened to a sermon upon one of the most intolerant texts of the whole Bible. The text was: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we hav preached unto you, let him be accursed" (Galatians i, 18).

An angel from heaven, probably no Christian will deny, is supposed to be a perfectly truthful being, else he would immediately lose his place in heaven. If, therefore, that angel should contradict Paul (who referred to the possibility of his lying for God's glory!) the truthful angel should be disbelieved, and cursed in the bargain. The great mass of the bloody religious persecutions of the ages was prompted by just this spirit of cursing people for their belief or unbelief. The early church fathers professed to preach Paul's gospel; the Christian Inquisitors of Spain preached Paul's gospel; the Puritans of New England preached it; the bloody deeds of all the Dark Ages were prompted by this spirit of Paul's "gospel"—"if any man preach any other gospel" let him be accursed. That was the embodiment of the terrible inquisitions, holy wars, pious crusades, religious massacres, which, as historians tell us, caused fifty millions of human lives to be sacrificed by Christians within eighteen hundred years. In this way nearly every scientist was "cursed." Only a bigot says, "Let any man be cursed who preaches any other doctrin than we hav preached." It was in accordance with that doctrin of Paul's that the Catholic church cursed and anathematized Martin Luther and other Protestants. It was in accordance with that doctrin that thousands of human beings were sacrificed, tortured, murdered, butchered in cold blood by the Inquisitors under Torquemada.

And this is the text that the Rev. Augur chooses as a weapon with which to assail Infidelity in Mapleton. A weaker and wickeder text he could not hav chosen, unless it be that one from the Old Testament which says, "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou nor thy fathers: namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; thou shalt not consent unto him; nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him: but thou shalt surely kill him" (Deut. xiii, 6-9). Take these two texts—are they not twin beauties?

And these are the fine "civilizing" doctrins that Elder Augur is engaged in teaching this community. No wonder there is religious hate and bitterness among a few even in Mapleton. This is the narrow, illiberal, bigoted, intolerant doctrin which thousands of preachers are preaching as the gospel of Paul and the religion of Jesus Christ. The elder could not hav taken a text that would better serve my purpose to show up the hideousness of their doctrins. The men and women who believe in such a "gospel" will grow vicious as they grow older. They will hate man in proportion as they love God. Hate a man, curse a man, kill a man for his honest opinions! Those who really believe in these two Bible texts would kill Freethinkers if they had the power. But, as Thomas Jefferson well said, "the laws of the present day withhold their hands from blood." When those who did believe in these two texts had the power they tortured to death thousands upon thousands of those who differed from them in religious views.

And this is the kind of Christianity that is taught in Mapleton, which was preached last night without one word of apology for the atrocious doctrin of hate to man.

Elder Augur told us last night that Christianity is equally well adapted to the strong-minded as the weak-minded. Is it a strong mind, or a brutal mind, that would accept such doctrin as that a man should curse his fellow, or wish him to be cursed, because he is of a different way of thinking?

The elder said, "It is the genius of Christianity to invite thought and investigation." And then, what? If the thought and investigation lead to Infidelity it is the genius of Christianity to curse him. The elder says so, or his entire sermon last night was without point.

It is said that the Lord chastises those he loves—and, in this case, so do I. If I scorch the elder tonight, it is all for his good and your satisfaction, and my own. Our reverend friend tells us, "Peter says, 'Be ready to giv a reason for the hope within you,'" and that Paul advised to "prove all things, hold fast that which is good." This is just what we hav been inviting him to do; but he shrinks from it. He professes those precepts, but he refuses to practice them. After he had announced that Christianity encourages "honest, earnest, candid investigation" he flinches. Some gentlemen called upon him personally after his sermon last night to come and hear me, and accept our platform, and welcome, half the time. He refused. This is the way a Christian minister invites "thought and investigation." He, a minister of that Christianity of which he had just been boasting—he had just declared that it had conquered every foe in all its conflicts and controversies. He meets us not half-way; thinks it safer, doubtless, to discuss at long range. He thereby, however, commits himself to the principle of free discussion. Why not meet us, face to face, before the same audience? What is his excuse? He really has none that I am aware of. He claims to hav God and truth and victory on his aide. Why, then, should he not debate? Is it a fear, after all, that Christianity might receive damage in this community, although he boasts that it has won victories elsewhere? We would like to see a few. If, as he says, in every former discussion Christianity has gained victories, why should he not show this people just how they were won? We are ready; is he? If victories for Christianity hav always been obtained in discussion, I am willing to help Christianity to another victory in every town I visit. If discussion helps the cause of Christ, I am willing to work for Christ as long as I liv.

According to the gentleman's own Bible, it is his duty to meet the opponents of his religion and contend with them, not at a distance, at long range, but face to face, as Christ and the apostles met their opponents. Does he believe his own Bible practically? Says Isaiah, "Who will contend with me? Let us stand together." That is it. This is just what we hav been trying to get them to do, and they dare not do it after all their boasting. Hollow, empty boast. "Let us stand together," says the elder's Bible, not one here, in this hall, and another in yonder pulpit. Isaiah continued: "Who is mine adversary? Let him come near to me." There it goes again, "Come near." Do the clergy do that? No, they stand off at a safe distance behind bulwarks which hav become notoriously the cowards' wooden castles. "Isaiah vaunted, "Behold, the Lord God will help me." This is just what the clergy believe about themselvs, and still they are afraid to venture, even with God's help, against an Infidel, backed, as they profess to believe, by the devil. "The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned," said Isaiah. Their "learning" is the boast of most of the clergy. They profess to be shepherds of sheep; but they are enjoined to leave the "ninety and nine," already safe, and go out after the lost. Instead, they stay by the safe sheep, and let the stray one go to hell.

Their own Solomon urges, "Debate thy cause with thy neighbor," but at every turn we find the clergy shirking their duty, according to their own Bible, to meet their opponents and contend with them as did the prophets, Christ, and the apostles. These are their examples, as they claim, and yet they utterly ignore them in the matter of free discussion. The clergy of our day lack the moral courage of Paul, Peter, Stephen, Christ, and the prophets, who all set them the example of contending "for the faith once delivered to the saints," of discussing, disputing, and debating.

At the close of the lecture a believer in Christ said he would "stand by the Christian religion, by God." He expects to repent of his profanity just before he starts for heaven.

Rev. Quayle called to see me at my hotel. He informed me that Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant are engaged in sending obscene literature to school children. Liberals who never waste any time attending church would be surprised if they knew how extensivly gossiping parsons retail such stuff, and how eagerly their congregations swallow it.

William Lloyd Garrison Was an Infidel.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The evidence that the late Wm. Lloyd Garrison was an Infidel in the general acceptation of the term, and as defined by Webster, is incontrovertible. He defined his position in regard to the Bible in a speech at the Hartford Bible Convention in 1854. (See a book of the above title published by Partridge & Brittan.)

Again, in 1860, when a pamphlet entitled "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" was published, Mr. Garrison, in a notice of it in the Liberator, said:

"It is an internal exhibition of the utter absurdity of the dogma of plenary inspiration, showing as it does, at a glance, the multitudinous self-contradictions of the Bible, which no ingenuity of interpretation can reconcile, excepting that which can prove white to be black, and black white."

Furthermore I can bear witness myself that in 1854 he did not believe in praying to God. He and I were at the house of a Quaker in Westchester, Pa., attending the annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Antislavery Society, and I heard him illustrate the folly of praying in this way: "There is a stove, and here is coal; how absurd now for me to fall on my knees and pray God to make a fire!" This was said in the presence of several men and women.

During our sojourn at that Quaker's house there was no praying or saying grace. I slept in the same bed with Mr. Garrison, and there was no essential difference in our views of religion or Christianity. He always seemed to revere the character of Jesus, just as Thomas Paine did. I furnished a full report of that annual meeting to the Antislavery Standard, of which Oliver Johnson was then, I think, assistant editor, and about that time became editor-in-chief.

Canadian Notes.

The Toronto Secular Society are in the midst of the summer vacation. Picnics in shady groves by meadow, lake, and stream; sailing by moonlight over the blue depths of Ontario; camping out under the starry vault and wide canopy of heaven—these are the charms and witcheries of the season, which giv us a glimpse of fairy land.

"There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture by the lonely shore,
There is society where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar."

The Secularists of Canada are gradually getting their rights in the law courts. It appears probable that Christians, with all their abominable bigotry, groveling, ignorant superstition, slavish fear, and fiendish hatred, and oppression of all who differ from them in opinion, will yet be compelled to giv a measure of justice to their Freethought opponents.

The officers of the central and local societies in Toronto are receiving daily most encouraging accounts from all parts of the Dominion of Canada of the noiseless but increasing advance of Freethought ideas and Freethought principles.

An Explanation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav noticed in your paper and the Investigator criticisms on my invitation to the orthodox people to send a representativ to the Albany Convention to speak in behalf of Christianity. I hav published such a notice, I think, nearly every year since the Association was organized, generally in one of the New York papers, and the invitation has heretofore extended to the whole country.

This year I sent the notice to the Albany Evening Journal, and confined the invitation to that city. This invitation has never been accepted but twice—once by a young Catholic evangelist at Hornellsville, and by the Rev. Mr. Mitchell at the Rochester Convention.

As some of my critics hav seemed to be at a loss to know the object I had in view in giving these generous invitations, I will inform them.

1st. I desired to show to the world that we were what we professed to be—Liberals. That we were in favor of giving all sides a hearing on our own platform—a thing the church dare not do in its pulpits.

2d. I was satisfied that such a card was the best kind of an advertisment for our convention, which always proved true, as it was some years copied into a hundred secular papers. And if you are going to hav a great convention, you hav got to advertise it in a business-like manner.

3d. If our orthodox friends did not accept the invitation, then I always was sure to read the notice at the convention, and comment on the fact that they would spend money to send "missionaries" to foreign lands, to convert the heathen, but would not go to the heathen in their own neighborhood, when their expenses were paid.

4th. That when they did accept the invitation, we had not only the chance to refute their arguments before a large audience, but what I was particularly looking after, it gave us large receipts at the door, much of the money coming from orthodox pockets when the orthodox champion spoke. That was particularly the case at Rochester. I am sure that our receipts were at least one hundred and fifty dollars more on account of the Wakeman and Mitchell discussion, notwithstanding we paid the full traveling expenses of Mr. Mitchell from Brooklyn to Rochester and return, and his board for a week at Rochester.

But probably I made a mistake in this matter. If so, it was a case of misjudgment, for which I hope to be pardoned. And as I hav now resigned my office of secretary, and the management of future conventions will be under the control of other persons, I hope they may be able to do much better than I hav done and avoid my errors. The doctrin of evolution should operate in the matter of organization as in everything else. Fraternally yours, H. L. GREEN.

The Statue to Bruno at Rome.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following very interesting letter has been received, with a receipt for the subscriptions which were forwarded by me on the 1st of June, ult. It does not seem that $600, the amount suggested by the committee to be raised in America, is at all unreasonable, in view of the facts presented. Who now will add their names to the second instalment of the contributions to the noble purpose of making Bruno immortal?

I will forward as before all moneys sent to me for the statue. Respectfully, T. B. WAKEMAN, Authorized Agent,
No. 93 Nassau street, New York City, July 10, 285.

ROME, June 20, 285.

HONORABLE SIR: I hope by the time I am writing this that you will hav received my last letter, in reply to yours of May 16th, wherein I endeavored to giv you the information you desired. But in case you may not, I will repeat it here in a few words.

The monument to Bruno will be a statue in bronze with a base, bas-reliefs, etc., and will cost about 25,000 to 30,000 francs. We Italians hope to contribute thereto about 20,000 francs. The work of the sculptor, Ferrari, will be gratis. We hav also to hope that when it is seen that the work is going on bravely, the Commune of Rome (the municipal government) will contribute a quarter of the amount above proposed for Italy. This is highly probable if the ensuing elections result in sending to the capital an increased number of Liberals.

We are very much pleased that our "First Number" has been so favorably received by you. We would send you more copies of it, so that you might distribute it among the Freethinkers of America who are contributors to the fund, if we did not, in sending them, incur an expense greater, we fear, than the value of the brochure itself.

We send you copies, however, for the two other members of the Committee of Honor in America, Hon. Elizur Wright and Col. R. G. Ingersoll. We hav not sent to them before, as we received their names through Mr. Bradlaugh without their address.

I would not forget to thank you for the 938 francs ($187.73) which you hav sent with the list of subscribers. We shall publish it in the journals at Rome, which we will forward to you. At the same time I ought to say to you that we still hope for much more from the Americans.

Why may they not more than twice double the sum they hav already given? Excuse the presumption of this question for the sake of Bruno!

To your inquiry as to the contributions of the other countries of Europe, I can only say that, outside of France, England, Spain, and Russia, the other Europeans hav responded very feebly to our appeal. From the countries above-named we hav received some contributions, but as yet very little in comparison with that which we expect from them. As to Italy, we hav every reason to be sure of our success. Our ideas hav penetrated everywhere, but what a pity that here, too, the Liberals are not of the wealthy!

We learn that at Paris one of the streets leading to the Sorbonne has been named "Giordano Bruno," and that the council provisional of Paris has voted 200 francs to our philosopher of Nola.

Accept my thanks for the honor done in printing my letter in your journals, and if you wish for further information you hav only to write to us.

Wishing you to accept the sentiments of our highest consideration, we are, on the part of the committee,

Yours respectfully.
DR. MARCELLO CAMPODONICO, President.
GIOVANNI AMICE, Secretary.

A Minister: "My dear, do you know what the newspapers mean by 'chestnut?' I see the word very often."

Wife: "Yes; a 'chestnut' is an old joke, a revamping of matter which has been published before, or anything that smacks of age or possesses some relish of the saltness of time. For instance, the sermons you preach in the hot summer months might easily be called chestnuts."

News and Notes.

A LECTURE AT MYSTIC, CONN.

On Sunday, July 12th, I went into quiet, orthodox New England, on the shores of Long Island Sound, where the voice of Liberalism has not been heard before, except from our eloquent Mrs. Colby, who made quite an impression some months ago in this Puritanic stratum, which was then being upheaved by the usual winter's revival. We found a good audience waiting, consisting of the leading business and professional men of the place. Some heard the presentation of our doctrins for the first time, and were both pleased and astonished to find such harmony with their own views, and that a Freethought platform was something more than a place for a "bear fight," as so many think it is, under the instructions of a Christian pulpit. There is a bright and lively Liberal element in Mystic, and without doubt another meeting will be held there soon, with far larger results. A good beginning has been made; people are aroused, the crust of custom and tradition breaks, and the stream of thought flows and sparkles in spite of the ghosts of our grandfathers, who on Sunday made every able-bodied man go either to church or the jail.

It was through the earnest efforts of G. W. Haley that this promising work has been begun, which will some time make the intellectual life of Mystic as delightful as the outward glory of nature by which it is surrounded. Mr. Austin Haley, Capt. George E. Tripp, Dr. Gale, the good physician, who has realized something of nature's healthful processes, Mr. Ward, and others, hav generously helped the movement, and will form the nucleus of a growing Liberal society.

I had the pleasure of meeting Jennie C. Williams, a well known correspondent of Aunt Elmina and Susan Wixon, whose thoughtful articles, written upon a bed of pain, hav flashed occasionally upon the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. A few months ago, while almost in the last stages of disease, her mind clouded with orthodoxy, the kindness of Dr. Gale opened to her a realization of the truth through the pages of our Liberal books and papers. Now the mental disease has passed off, and her mind is as clear as the sun. Though alleviated much by the skill of Dr. Gale, she still suffers greatly, but she is happy, for now she recognizes that death is a sweet sleep, and life a joy more enchanting than ever. Though deeply desiring to liv in order to enjoy the mental freedom, death is not a terror, but simply nature's inevitable course. A brighter, serener spirit could not be found than hers, whose bodily weakness is so great, and to whom the silence may come at any moment. Such is the noble power of nature's gospel. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Albany Convention.

LETTER FROM INGERSOLL.—GOOD NEWS FROM REMSBURG.—THE RAINBOW OF PROMIS SPANS THE HUDSON FROM BOSTON TO KANSAS.

The following is an extract from a letter just received from Ingersoll:

"DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I shall be at Albany—at least I fully intend to be there—and I sincerely hope that we will hav a good time. Yours always, R. G. INGERSOLL."

There is no doubt of a good time when our genial leader is with us, and his pleasant family, where life's brightest harmony is revealed, and thought is enthroned in affection.

A glad message from our mighty pioneer, Remsburg, with a subscription of ten dollars for the Albany Convention, answers generously to the noble offerings of the East.

"I note with pleasure the vigorous efforts being made in behalf of the Albany Convention. The cause of Freethought for the coming year largely depends upon the success of this meeting. It is the duty, it seems to me, of every Liberal in the land to giv it his support. Let us do our best, let us surpass the great Rochester Convention of '83, and make this the grandest Freethought convention yet held on the continent.

"Your action in limiting the number of speakers and selecting them in advance was not only wise, but necessary. It is true that in the list of speakers named there are omitted many familiar names. There are other lecturers in the field whom we would be glad to hear. Underwood, Bell, Burnham, Bradford, Reynolds, Jamieson, Walker, Shaw, Stewart, Kelso, Chainey, Putnam, Lake, Severance, Colby, Allyn, and Wixon, each has a host of admirers, each has done valiant work for our cause, and each is capable of preparing an address that would do honor to the occasion. But it is impossible to hear them all, and with the list selected there can, I think, be found no fault. Colonel Ingersoll, James Parton, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Mattie P. Krekel, Helen Gardener, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, and Courtlandt Palmer insure an intellectual feast worth going a thousand miles to enjoy. Their peers for eloquence cannot be found even in our halls of Congress. It requires a great cause to develop great orators, and it is the justness and grandeur of our cause that inspires the eloquence of Ingersoll and of those who hav with him been chosen to defend the right.

"To help the Convention out with its work, please accept the inclosed. I shall see you in Albany, and probably at an earlier day in New York. Till then good-bye.
"J. E. REMSBURG."

The splendid magnanimity of Remsburg will be felt throughout all our ranks, and from East to West there will be a united front.

The following hav been appointed by the Albany Association to co-operate with the executiv committee:

For Members of the Executiv Committee of the League.

TO MY FAITHFUL COLLEAGUES: I would most respectfully call the attention of every member of the Committee to the following letter from Brother Thomas Burk, of Montana. It is replete with sound, practical suggestions, and will well repay serious attention. If the great work entrusted to us is to be performed, it is fully time each and every one of us was at work. If any member of the Committee can suggest—or, better still, prove they hav—a better plan, by giving us an account of better and more effectiv work done, than the faithful carrying out of the system suggested by Brother Burk would result in, please report at once through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Please read the appended letter over two or three times carefully, and write me any suggestions of improvement. Letters addressed to me at the TRUTH SEEKER office will be promptly forwarded. Let all who approve Brother Burk's plan at once put it in practical operation in their own state or territory.

Dear friends, we are hasting to the time of our next Congress—the most important ever held. We must be prepared for it. The impossible is not expected from anyone. But surely our profession of devotion to the cause should be demonstrated by our works. Let us not remain in the rut of orthodoxy, and rest content with mere profession, and having our names on the roll as members, depending on some one else to do the work—"to pay it all, all the debt we owe."

Co-workers for the noblest cause that ever claimed the self-sacrificing efforts of its adherents, let us earnestly study to devise the best possible methods, and then unite in carrying them out with diligence and perseverance.

C. B. REYNOLDS, Chairman Ex. Com. N. L. L.

SALESVILLE, MONT., July 1, 1885.

C. B. REYNOLDS, ESQ., Dear Sir: Some time since I wrote you in response to my appointment as a member of the Executiv Committee of the National Liberal League. Therein I took the ground that it is the duty of members of the Executiv Committee to aid in effecting a thorough and systematic organization of the Liberals of the United States and Canada into a compact body under the name of the American Secular Union, and at the same time to try and make the organization self-sustaining, so that means could flow through natural channels steadily into the National Liberal League treasury.

The plan I hav concluded to operate upon for Montana is this: First. Form my territorial sub-committee. But as our constitution only authorizes the selection of four official associates, it hampers me some. I should hav one in every town in the territory. However, I can do the next best thing. I shall try and hav a co-operating agent in all those places, which will require some time, as I wish to make judicious selections, and some method will be necessary.

Second. Then I shall ask each representativ to prepare a subscription paper, with the Nine Demands of Liberalism attached thereto, which he will present to all the Liberals of his entire locality, both town and county. The object will be to ascertain how many are willing to become members of a permanent organization, and how much each one is willing to contribute annually to defray incidental expenses of such organization, employ lecturer and organizer, etc.

We want a permanent lecturer and organizer. Comparativly, it adds little to our cause, and nothing to permanent organization, for one to pass through the county, deliver a few lectures, organize a few Leagues, and then depart. His tracks are scarcely cold in the street before the organizations are all dead. A failure is almost as bad as a defeat. For that reason I think best to commence at the bottom and build up. Hence the course I am pursuing.

By consultation with prominent Liberals here, I find they coincide with me in the above methods; and, also, I believe that with a properly managed system of organization the Liberals of Montana will sustain a permanent lecturer and organizer of ability. But we cannot ask for such a one till we hav first laid a foundation ourselvs.

I should be pleased to hav suggestions from you and others on my methods, and shall report to you as I proceed. My great difficulty just now is to learn who to appoint in different parts of the territory. THOMAS BURK.

A Lesson of the Past.

The embarrassment and positiv suffering in all of our agricultural districts for want of money at this time is notorious. Men worth thousands of dollars are obliged to borrow in dribs here and there in order to pay their taxes. Thousands of poor families go to bed cold and hungry because the bread-winner can get no work, or, having worked, can get no pay. Thousands on thousands of men whose circumstances are comfortable are trembling on the verge of bankruptcy on account of small debts and their inability to get the money to pay them, although offering property to secure it worth from ten to twenty times the amount required. Truly a beautiful state of affairs, and a condition brought on us by our own folly.

Now is the time to think of the cause and to prevent a recurrence of the like in the future. If not done now, it will not be done hereafter. For just as soon as good times begin, all is forgotten, and we go on as if the good times must last forever. All this was predicted long ago. All this has been endured, from the same causes, by ourselvs and other nations. England suffered every ten years, or oftener, under the very same causes until she provided the remedy. From 1800 until 1850 she suffered terribly. During the years from 1804 up 1820, Lord Brougham often addressed the public on the "distresses." He once, in 1816, remarked that "the distress existing in England was without a parallel in the civilized world." At another time, later, he referred to that statement and said he thought, when he made it, that human nature could endure no more, but that he was mistaken. He cited instances to prove how great was the suffering. Among others he givs an instance of one whole district, formerly prosperous, in which every soul but one householder and his family was on the parish for relief; families not long before well to do, paupers at the time he spoke. His speeches show that he was then groping about to find the cause. He was too sensible, he knew history and the life of the world too well, to believe the wretched twaddle about "over-production," "necessary consequences of our modern civilization," and other drivel. Finally he seized on it and expressed it, not in these words, but this idea: "While under her tariff Great Britain was manufacturing for all the world, she was farming exclusivly for England." You see her protectiv tariff was the reverse of ours, because it aimed to protect her land cultivators. Her corn laws imposed a protectiv tariff on the importation of foreign grains, breadstuffs, meats, and the like. Any tariff on foreign manufactures was a delusion, because her own factories were more than a match for foreign ones.

Meanwhile, her corn law tariff operated on farm labor just as ours does on our factory operativs; first a flush of high-tide prosperity; soon followed by misery among factory operativs from high cost of bread; then reaction, low prices; for bread-glutted marts, tens of thousands of farm hands thrown on the world as tramps. 'Twas then and there the word "tramp" originated. These farm-hands combined by thousands and marched over the country, camping out, robbing day and night the poor peasant farmers around. Often the whole county authorities were called out to repress them, and the military had to aid; battles took place, and thousands were slain or died of wounds and exhaustion.

Thus, in time, things would come around all right to go the same round. Goody-good people consoled themselvs by saying these evils were "mysterious dispensations of divine providence." But at the least hint of removing the corn laws, all the landed interest, all the farmers, small and great, poor peasants, and the miserable outcast tramps loudest of all, would exclaim their horror at the idea: "Bad as things are, you would make them worse."

England was a brute despotism where anarchy was kept down by the sword. Millions of miserable laborers, perishing rapidly and as rapidly recruited from the classes next above them, did all the labor, while a few hundred thousands enjoyed the wealth.

In 1848 Sir Robert Peel, premier and head of the protection party, became convinced by the Cobden Club arguments that two, multiplied by two, are equal to four, and suddenly, using the Irish famin as a pretext, declared for free trade in grain, temporarily. The relief was so prompt, its cause so apparent, that all saw the end would be free trade generally.

From that time on, England's progress has been steady, her prosperity uninterrupted except by our cotton blockade and our precipitation of bankrupt manufactures in her market. During each year her imports hav exceeded her exports by from two hundred to eight hundred million dollars. Lamartine, who, in 1846–7, visited her and predicted a sudden end to her whole social system in explosion, in 1852–4 visited again and declared the change seemed supernatural. He was astounded, and could not imagin the cause. Her system is by no means perfect, her distribution is bad, and her financial system is based on what this writer deems another humbug, specie. The circulating principle of credit is caught and fastened to a scarce metal for convenience of speculators in the metal; but for all that the condition of her people is very happy compared with that previous to 1848.

She by her tariff was manufacturing for the world and farming for herself. We, on the contrary, are manufacturing for ourselvs and farming for all the world. We protect the manufacturers and drive away our farm customers. Empty ships come here to buy of our farmers, as they came to England to buy of her factories. We hav the same flush times for a year or two, when down we go. Our reaction from the depressed state is seen first in reviving manufactures; hers was seen in reviving farms. If anyone dreams of better times for manufactures here next year he knows nothing of the condition. In truth, the manufacturers hav not begun to feel it yet. The consumers of our manufactured products are the millions of agriculturists here who are beginning to bend under a frightful depression and who are now selling their products for the lowest prices ever offered. Why low prices? Simply because our refusal to trade with other nations drives them to trade elsewhere. England and France under compulsion hav taken our cotton for years, and all the while are seeking footholds in Asia and Africa where to raise their own. By free trade we could hav twenty acres in cotton growing where now is one. And we would hav more cotton factories, too, whose South American customers to-day wear the British fabric.

Free trade, speedy and sharp, is the only remedy that will save these trembling manufactures from the thorough, complete, and entire bankruptcy that swallowed them all up (steel rail monopolies of demand and supply always excepted) in 1877.

Really, it is almost laughable, were it not so sad, to see every experience we went through from 1872 to 1878 repeated. We are now where we were then when we of the Northwest were burning corn. What a long road we must travel! We must slowly pass on to the time when we will again be saying, as we were in 1786–7, during the great strikes and riots, "How strange, amidst all this misery and horror of the East, and while so many thousands of tramps wander about, that we Western farmers are doing so well! Did you ever know prices better?"

At that very time it was predicted and written out and published, time and again, that, ere ten years went by, we would be going under precisely the same circumstances, and for precisely the same cause, protectiv tariff. Then people blamed contraction for it. Now, thank God, they cannot ascribe it to anything of the kind. HOLT.

Evolution.

Haeckel teaches the certainty that all natural bodies which are known to us are animate; that the distinction which has been made between animate and inanimate bodies does not exist. When a stone is thrown into the air and falls to the earth, according to definit laws, or when in a solution of salt a crystal is formed, the phenomena is neither more nor less a mechanical manifestation of life than the growth and flowering of plants—than the propagation of animals, or the activity of their senses; than the perception or the formation of thought in man.

If the objections which are raised to the general doctrin of evolution were not theological objections, their utter childishness would be manifest even to the most childlike of believers.

Man is essentially a questioning animal concerning all phenomena that come under his experience and observation. An answer he must hav, and a false one if a true one is not at hand. In man's primeval state, the only answer he gets to all questions is, God made it—God did it. This is the Christian answer to this very day. But, as man gathers positiv knowledge, the results of observation, experience, and reflection, the answer that God made it, God did it, grows less and less frequent. He gets truth instead of mythology.

Darwinism marks the hegira of science from the idolatries of special creation to the purer faith of evolution. There were lately found in the mud deposits of one of the lakes of Germany, in the lowest deposit, forms of organic life of the simplest kind, and of one kind only. In tracing the strata of the deposit upward from the bottom toward the top, the first simple forms began to differentiate gradually and slowly, and to assume by degrees other forms, until at the top there were a number of what are called distinct species. There is evidence which is perfectly satisfactory to competent judges that we hav clearly learned the actual historical process by which the horse came into existence during the tertiary epoch. The evidence is based on the analogy of known developmental facts that a three-toed hipparion form which lived in the miocene epoch gave rise, by the suppression of the phalanges of the rudimentary toes and some other slight modifications, to the apparently one-toed tertiary horse. The pedigree of the ox, the sheep, etc., hav been traced in the same way.

Comparativ anatomy shows us an uninterrupted succession of all possible stages of transition from the simplest organ to the most highly perfected apparatus, so that we can form a pretty correct idea of the slow and gradual formation of even such an exceedingly complex organ as the human eye. The like gradual progress which we observe in the development of the organ during the course of individual development must hav taken place in the historical origin of the organ.

Darwin says many persons, when contemplating perfect organs which apparently were purposely invented and constructed by an ingenious creator for a definit purpose, but which in reality hav arisen by the aimless action of natural selection, experience difficulties in arriving at a rational understanding of them, which are similar to those experienced by the uncivilized tribes of nature when contemplating the latest complicated productions of engineering. Savages who see a ship of the line, or a locomotiv engin for the first time, look on those objects as the production of a supernatural being, and cannot understand how a man, or organism like themselvs, could hav produced such an engin. Even the uneducated classes of our own race cannot comprehend such an intricate apparatus in its actual workings, nor can they understand its purely mechanical nature.

The theory of evolution applies itself to the solution of the greatest of scientific problems—that of the creation, the coming into existence of things; more especially the origin of organic forms and of man at their head.

It is here the right, as well as the duty of free inquiry, to fear no human authority and boldly raise the veil from the image of the creator, unconcerned as to what natural truth may be concealed beneath.

It was a favorit saying of Voltaire: "Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that there is no God. It will still be necessary to invent him, because there is no other way to account for the phenomena of nature." Voltaire would scarcely hav said this had he lived in our day, since the evolution philosophy has shown how and in what manner nature possesses within herself the promis and potency of all created things, and performs all her operations spontaneously of herself, and altogether without the meddling of the gods.

As contrasted with other systems, we may well adhere to that purer evolution philosophy — that great conception which had dawned upon the patriarchs of philosophy; which has been embalmed in the immortal poem of Lucretius; which has been submerged, but not drowned, in the muddy waters of Hebrew and Christian mythology.

The beforegoing short articles on evolution form, together, an attempt at a digest from Haeckel, Tyndal, Huxley, Darwin, Spencer, Youmans, and others.

Toronto, July 4, 1885. R. B. BUTLAND.

The Common Notion of the Atonement Examined.

It has been assumed that all men justly deserve endless punishment. This is the false foundation on which the whole superstructure of error has rested. Almost the whole Christian world hav built upon this foundation a system of vicarious atonement as repugnant to reason and common sense as can be conceived. But it is a necessary result of their false premises, for if every man deserved endless hell every man must hav it, or some other plan must be devised to satisfy justice as well. But theologians, however fond they might be of fire, hav always felt disposed to keep themselvs and some others out of it. For this reason it became necessary for them to invent a substitute for justice. A substitute for justice, forsooth!—what a contrivance it must be! Let us look it in the face. First, they teach that divine justice, like a vindictiv cloud, darkened all heaven, and was bearing down like a storm upon all our race to engulph us all in hell. This was a dreadful doom. Angels beheld, and were about to weep.

Jesus looked on in pity. He knew that he could suffer as much in a few hours as all men could suffer in eternal ages. He generously offered to be punished in our stead, and in his own person satisfy the full demands of justice.

Second, This scheme implies that the endless punishment of all men would hav been perfectly just and right. If so, why was not God satisfied with it? Why wish to substitute anything for what was perfectly just and right? This is truly a great mystery. But justice could not be satisfied in this way. It could not accept what it did not require as a substitute for what it did require. It required the suffering of the guilty, and not the innocent. If God was offended with man and thirsted for revenge, and was so regardless of all principle that he could be appeased with any kind, whether just or unjust, then anything would satisfy him, provided there were groans, and tears, and blood enough in it. But if a moral principle was to be carried out, nothing could accomplish this but the just punishment of the guilty, which it required. Now, if the guilty escape, that is unjust; and if the innocent suffer instead of the guilty, that is again unjust. Now, it is supposed justice required the endless punishment of the guilty, but they are permitted to escape. Here, then, we hav one injustice. Again, the innocent suffer what the guilty justly ought to suffer. Here we hav another injustice. Now, it is thought these two acts of injustice together are a very good substitute for justice. Is it indeed true that injustice becomes justice by being doubled? If so, it would be best to double all the injustice in the world, and that would make universal justice; double all the sin, and make universal holiness; double all the misery, and make universal salvation; indeed, double all the absurdities of a paganized church, and they would all become sound and rational. If these things are not to be done in that way, how can justice be satisfied with the acquittal of those it condemns, and the punishment of those whom it does not condemn? If endless punishment is justly due to all men, the debt can never be paid till they all receive it. Paul says, "The wages of sin is death." These wages are due to the sinner who earned them, not to God. Suppose a clergyman has been preaching to his flock till they owe him $500 salary. I come to them and say, "Here, gentlemen, pay his wages to me; although they are not due to me, yet I am willing to receive them as his substitute, for justice will be equally satisfied when the debt is paid, whether it is paid where it is due or where it is not due." Would not the clergyman be apt to think "this alters the case," and that it was unjust for them to pay the money to me, and again unjust not to pay it to him? Suppose they answer, "You hav taught us, sir, that to do what justice forbids, and not to do what it requires, are together exactly equal to doing what it requires." The poor parson would be likely to discover that moral justice and orthodox justice are two very different things.

Third, Again, if justice did require the endless punishment of all men, and Jesus suffered as their substitute, his suffering must hav been equal to that, unless the principle could be satisfied with less than it required, and if it could it might as well be satisfied with none. If withholding from justice a part of its demand would be just, then withholding its whole demand would be just. Hence it was thought necessary to hav an infinit sacrifice and suffering to be a substitute for infinit punishment, which all men are made to deserve. And as none could suffer infinitly in a few hours' time but an infinit being, it is next devised that Jesus Christ is God, and that the great Jehovah really died to make an infinit sacrifice, to cover an infinit evil, to satisfy an infinit dissatisfaction, and to appease his own infinit wrath. Such absurdities arise, one upon another, like hills on hills to mountain hights, from beginning wrong, and assuming, in the outset, that sin deserves endless punishment.

Fourth, If justice could be satisfied with what it did not require, what could be gained by this theory? Nothing at all. Jesus suffers as much as the endless misery of all men, as their substitute. Well, if so, there was as much misery in the case as if all men had gone to hell. Then no good is accomplished in the case. The misery is moved from those who justly ought to suffer it, and placed on one who justly ought not to suffer it. Nothing is gained to humanity or philanthropy in the case. Justice still has a victim. Might it not better hav had its own proper victim than to hav violated its immutable nature in accepting a victim not its own, without diminishing a whit from the sum of misery? It is to be wished that our doctors could answer such questions. A man has murdered; justice demands his punishment; a friend offers to be punished in his place. Would this satisfy justice? It diminishes no suffering, but the blow falls on the innocent instead of the guilty; that is, the thing is done which ought not to be done, instead of that which ought to be. Where is the wonderful display of mercy in this scheme, so much lauded? None—none; all is inflexible wrath, going into full execution; but instead of going where it ought to go, it goes where it ought not.

Fifth, But yet the theory says all who do not repent shall be endlessly damned notwithstanding! Ah, then the endless misery of all this class is to be so much in addition to the sum of misery which would hav been without the atonement. If it be true that Jesus suffered as much as justice required for the sins of all men, and justice accepted such substitute, then no man could be justly punished at all. For if, as the theory teaches, the whole debt is paid by proxy, there can remain nothing unpaid. And if any should be endlessly punished, their endless punishment would be so much more than even this kind of justice required.

This theory has been lauded by millions as an astonishing display of divine wisdom, goodness, and mercy. But surely, if such be a Bible theory, the writer could never find it there.

These difficulties hav arisen, in part, from the erroneous supposition that the unchangeable God was exasperated with men on account of their sins; and this scheme has been devised as a means of appeasing his wrath and making it possible for him to love and pardon sinners. So it is assumed that the atonement produced God's reconciliation and love to the world. But, it may be asked, if the atonement produced the love of God to the world, what produced the atonement? Did the wrath of God produce the atonement, and the atonement his love? Yonder savage says to his son: "My enemy has provoked my deep and unrelenting hate. Nothing but blood can feast my vengeance and placate my burning soul. Stand up, my son, and receive this knife into your heart, to apease my wrath, and save the guilty wretch from my just revenge." Would not common sense conclude the father to be mad indeed? But the Bible says, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son," etc. (John iii, 16). And again, "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Romans v, 8). So it appears that God loved the world before the atonement was made. Hence the savior did not die to appease the divine wrath, nor to purchase the love of God for men.

We will here examin an argument often adduced by the advocates of a vicarious atonement, to illustrate the justice, propriety, and beauty of the system. It runs thus: A certain king enacted a law that whoever among his subjects should commit a certain crime should hav his eyes both taken out as a punishment. And it so happened that the first person who committed the crime was the king's own son. In terror and chagrin the king reflects on the awful subject. He wished to save his dear son (better than other men's sons, of course), and yet his law must be honored. At last he hits upon the expedient to take out one of his own eyes and one of his son's, and in this way fulfil the law. Now, this is thought by many controversialists to be a beautiful illustration of substitution. No doubt it well illustrates the substitution of wrong for right, but it fails entirely to show that wrong is right, which is the thing to be done in order to justify vicarious punishment. If the law was a good one, then it would hav been right to execute it as it was, and, consequently, wrong not to do it. The king's expedient did not by any means execute the law. Had the law required that the criminal should lose either one or both eyes, then it would hav been executed, whether the old man lost an eye or not. The extraction of the father's eye was no part of the execution of the law, for the law did not require it. And the saving of one of the son's eyes was in violation of the law which did require it to be extracted. Had the law required that the criminal should sacrifice two eyes, either his own or some other, then this would do; but in that case he might as well hav offered two dog's eyes as his own and his father's. But the law required him to lose both his own eyes; and no other eyes would do. Though ten thousand friends might be willing to sacrifice their eyes, this would be something unrequired by the law, and of course would not satisfy its demands at all. If a penal law can be satisfied with what it does not require, then it could be satisfied with the unqualified acquittal of the guilty. It reminds us of the convicted Irishman, who was sentenced to death (as the story goes), but was finally allowed to choose his manner of death. He gravely informed the court that, upon mature deliberation, he had chosen to die of old age! Now, all the above is sincerely believed to be correct reasoning on the subject, and it is submitted with all due respect, to all Christians believing in vicarious atonement, in the ardent hope that unsophisticated truth may triumph over the antiquated whims of the Dark Ages of the church.

Has Medium Mansfield been Proved a Fraud?

In Mrs. Slenker's endeavor to test spirit phenomena I hav taken considerable interest, principally because I deemed her a sagacious and fair-minded person, upon whose methods and reports we could rely. But I must say that my confidence in this respect has been just a little shaken, more especially by her last effort with Mansfield.

It seems that some friend furnished her the funds necessary to try this last experiment, supposing, undoubtedly, that she would take all needful precautions to make it a test case.

Accordingly, Elmina writes a letter to her deceased cousin David, and, as she says, wraps it in tissue paper, and covers that all over with impressions from her rubber stamp, pasting all up securely, so that it was impossible for any one to read it by calcium light, or in any way but by opening it. Having prepared it in this secure manner, she sends it to Mansfield. In due time she gets it back, accompanied by an answer which, she admits, is proof that the letter had been read, although the very close scrutiny (and it must hav been close) which she gave it did not disclose any evidence that the same had been opened. There was the letter just as she wrapped, sealed, and stamped it, with not a vestige of legitimate evidence that the sealing or wrapping had been tampered with. Now, mark the conclusion at which Elmina apparently jumps. Why, the letter must hav been opened, because the answer showed that it had been read. Now, Elmina, that seems to me to be what in argument we call "begging the question." Your test letter had been read, and under conditions, I submit, which estop you from saying that Mansfield did the reading, at least with the ordinary seeing faculty.

But Elmina says, "The letter could hav been opened, and carefully repasted." Admitted. But the question is, could it hav been done so neatly and skilfully that those keen, scrutinizing eyes of Elmina would not hav detected it. In any case, but especially with tissue paper, such a feat would scarcely seem possible. But if Mansfield did really open the letter, and re-seal it so as to defy detection, the fault was Elmina's; for surely it would not seem to be a very heavy task to seal a letter satisfactorily secure; and this Elmina was bound to do in duty to herself and to the friend who furnished the money for the experiment, and the balance of proof, I submit, is that the letter was so secured.

Elmina complains because her dead cousin, instead of Bennett, to whom she had referred in her letter, did not answer her question. This was a matter, perhaps, over which Mansfield had no control; besides, I don't see how, as a test, an answer from her cousin could hav been much more satisfactory, since her letter contains barely one question which is really a test question, viz.: "Tell me mother's full name and thy own?" Several of her questions her cousin, if still in existence, might reasonably be excused for not answering, on the score of want of knowledge, and, of course, his failure to answer them would be no proof for or against the spirit theory. Neither the fact that Bennett (inasmuch as she had referred to him), instead of her cousin David, answered her letter, nor the manner of Bennett's reply, has any special bearing upon the main question at issue, which is, Was the letter read without being opened? As the case now stands, giving Elmina credit for that amount of care and shrewdness which a keen skeptic like her would naturally exercise, coupled with what knowledge she has imparted of her method in doing up her missiv, the preponderance of evidence, I think it must be conceded, strongly favors the supposition that her letter had not been opened.

Of course, it is easy for every skeptic who sends Mansfield a letter, on getting an answer proving the same to hav been read, to say: "Well, notwithstanding all my precautions, Mansfield, by some ingenious process, must hav opened my letter and sealed it up so adroitly as to defy detection." But is such a course fair and reasonable? I think not. In case a person is lacking in ingenuity sufficient to enable him to seal up a letter in such a manner that he will be able to tell whether the same has been opened or not, he had better leave the matter of tests to those having more ingenious hands and brains, and not spend his own or anybody's else money on Mansfield.

It seems to me it would hav been modest, to say the least, on the part of Elmina to hav omitted the charge of fraud against Mansfield, after having bungled and wasted her friend's money upon a spirit test which, through her own want of care and attention, turned out (according to her version) to be simply a test of Mansfield's skill and ingenuity.

I make no defense of Mansfield, for I hav neither knowledge nor belief as to his qualifications for the office of spiritual postmaster; but then, as the old adage saith, "fair play is a jewel," and we like to see its operation in all things. S. Brewer.

A Correction.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Glancing over my hurriedly-taken notes, I find that the words attributed to Rev. Mr. Kaufman in the article "Religion and the Labor Movement," indicating the proper direction of religion (Truth Seeker, July 11th), belong to St. Simon, though the former quotes them as expressing his own sentiment. St. Simon was a Deist. It is evident that Deists, Christians, and so-called Infidels, when they hav the good of the world at heart, all agree that, as the proper study of mankind is man, so the first and most important care of religion is the well-being upon earth of struggling humanity, since God can take care of himself and his heaven. Public Opinion to be Revolutionized.

The simple fact that worlds as a whole are combinations of primary elements, and subject to the same laws of production and reproduction as their constituent parts or outgrowths; that all vegetables are sexual, the tops and roots bearing the same relation to each other as males and females in the animal, and making interchange of sex as necessary to animal as to vegetable life, is as sure to revolutionize public opinion in the not distant future, as was the discovery that worlds are revolving spheres, instead of being flat and stationary—any and all isms to the contrary notwithstanding. Reciprocity.

An Austin clergyman not long since met a prominent saloon-keeper with whose family he was acquainted.

"How is it I never see you in church?" asked the pastor.

"Because I don't go there. If you reverends don't patronize my saloon I am not going to patronize your churches. It is your business to set the good example and come first. I keep open the entire season. We dealers in spiritual things ought to swap pulpits once in a while. Suppose you stand behind my bar next Sunday, and I'll take your place in the pulpit, eh?—Texas Siftings.

The Short Lesson.

Of the picture published last week F. E. Sturgis, artist, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio, writes:

"I think the picture is the best by far, both in design and artistic finish, that you hav placed in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and such volumes of damaging matter and facts to orthodoxy as are here focussed down is really wonderful. The wonder is, too, how any lover of humanity, science, right, and reform, in circumstances above want, can refrain from spreading it broadcast in their neighborhoods. It beats dynamite out of time for blowing Faith and Fanaticism to sheol."

We hope a great many of these "Lessons" will be circulated. The price of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing it is, single copies, 7 cents; in quantities of five and over, 5 cents each. On heavy tinted paper, in the style of "The Modern Balaam," we can send the picture post-paid in rolls, secure from breakage in the mails, at prices as follows: Six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; and one hundred for $3.

Primitiv Christians.

There is a lady prominent in labor circles of this city who is endeavoring to bring the church back to its original Communism. To hear her explain the mode of life of the early Christians is well worth a visit to the Labor Lyceum, but one is irresistibly reminded of the enormous distance the church to-day has drifted from the ideas of its founders.

Perhaps the clearest description of the early Christians is found in Acts: "And all that believed were together, and had all things common; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need" (Acts ii, 44, 45). "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common. Neither was there any among them that lacked, for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need" (Acts iv, 32, 34, 35).

But this community of goods prevailed among the Christians for only a short time. It was the fervor of the first proselytes which prompted such generosity, and as the progress of the Christian religion relaxed, says Gibbon, the custom was discontinued, not to be again put in force. Still, the ministers of the new sect were the same untiring beggars as now. In their weekly or monthly assemblies the clergy asked for their tithes, which were given according to the wealth of the believer or the exigencies of the occasion. The widow's mite was taken, as well as the rich man's offering. "Nothing, however inconsiderable, was refused; but it was diligently inculcated that, in the article of tithes, the Mosaic law was still of divine obligation; and that since the Jews, under a less perfect disciplin, had been commanded to pay a tenth part of all that they possessed, it would become the disciples of Christ to distinguish themselvs by a superior degree of liberality, and to acquire some merit by resigning a superfluous treasure, which must so soon be annihilated with the world itself." So well did the people obey these early priests that vessels of gold and silver were used in religious worship, and many of the children of these dupes were left beggars because their parents had been saints. This was notably the case in the year 1,000, when the people gave nearly all their property to the church in the confident expectation that the world would immediately dissolve upon the completion of the millennium, and the faithful be caught up into heaven. Just why the church should care to own real estate that was about to become chaotic dust, the people did not stop to think. It is a noteworthy fact, however, and one to be explained by the apologists of Christian charity, that none of this property was returned when the saints were disappointed in the fulfilment of prophecy.

Nowadays Communism is a term of opprobrium in the mouth of a Christian, and the advocates of a return to early Christian customs are termed cranks. The interesting lady whose picturesque oratory captivates her hearers has been so called by the preachers of the very gospel she is anxious to restore.

Socialism now is one phase of this primitiv Communism, but the Socialists are not loved by the church. Why is this, when the early Christians had the benefit of the presence of the apostles, and might be supposed to know what Christianity was? We hav a great deal of sympathy with those reformers in the church who upbraid the preachers for their worship of mammon and general inhumanity to man. In view of the wide difference between the teachings of the apostles and the practices of their successors, it would be an interesting discussion to start as to what Christianity really is. We wish our religious contemporaries could be induced to enter into this debate, so that when another minister labors through some dozen pages of a prominent magazine to show that Christianity is not declining, the ground may first be cleared by an intelligent understanding of what he is talking about.

It is a fact we hav often endeavored to impress upon the labor advocates that the church has nothing in common with them. One of the best evidences of this is an incident occurring in the missionary efforts of the lady orator spoken of. On one of her visits to the Liberal Club she sought and obtained aid for a labor paper published in the city. The aid extended was very generous, and we took occasion to remark that it was probably much larger than she could get from any church in the city. With a praiseworthy zeal in behalf of her cherished Christianity, she undertook to lay us in error. She wrote to the pastor of one of the "advanced" congregations, asking permission to canvass his congregation in behalf of the paper. Pending the reply, she intimated to several that she would now "down" THE TRUTH SEEKER, and cause the editor to blush. In due course of mail the reply came. The pastor expressed his regrets, but positivly he could not allow the proposed canvass. His congregation decidedly objected. Thus ended her glorious anticipation of enlisting a fashionable church in the interest of labor.

There is a tradition of a carpenter who once wandered around about Galilee. Upon some alleged teachings of his was built by a few ignorant people a system of Communism. To-day it is a great church. We wonder what the poor despised carpenter would say if he could see the edifices dedicated to his name, and upon whose doorsteps he would not be allowed to rest if his sandaled feet grew tired of treading their limitless aisles.

Funny Christianity.

In the last sermon of the series upon evolution which he has been delivering, Mr. Beecher said:

"For a long time evolution was contested, reluctantly received, then finally embraced, but now embraced with contradictory results. The foremost thinkers of England differ from those of Germany. Herbert Spencer, the typical man of English thought, and Ernst Haeckel, the typical man of German thought, differ very widely. I think the foremost thinkers of England seem to be growing toward a spiritual center, and those of the Continent toward a material center. The English school seems to repudiate with growing intensity that Materialism which is accepted on the Continent, and pronounces it gross, dangerous. They refuse to go further at present, though many of them show themselvs to be impatient of camping out permanently on that ground. I should not wonder to find in Herbert Spencer, should his life be spared, the ablest defender of the essential elements of Christianity that has arisen in many days."

This is strange talk from a minister, and stranger still coming from one who is supposed to know what words mean. Spencer and Haeckel do differ, but they are at one as regards Christianity. Spencer's philosophy leaves no room for such a narrow, one-sided system of religion as the theologians hav formulated. His "Unknowable" is in no sense a reflex of the Christian God. It is an entirely new mental creation. As for Haeckel, he is an Athiest who takes no pains to conceal his sentiments. "German Materialism" is a philosophy based on ascertained facts. Until these facts are shown to be no facts, or new facts are discovered, all the anathematizing of it as "gross" and "dangerous" that English metaphysicians or American pulpiteers can do will not lower its standing among thinking people, nor change by one degree its inevitable logic.

It would be a funny Christianity that Herbert Spencer would defend, unless he first renounced all that he has written. There is not a dogma held by the church to-day that can find a sentence to support it in Spencer's works. Religion with Spencer means "a profound respect for, and an implicit faith in, those uniform laws which underlie all things." With him science—practically applied, utilitarian science—is a religion. He recognizes the absolute impossibility of comprehending the ultimate cause of things; and the whole tenor of his teachings is as Materialistic as the works of Haeckel. To him Christianity is one of many religious traditions toward which the attitude of scientific men must be "proud," which is but a polite word for contemptuous.

Mr. Beecher's easy reconciliation of evolution and theology may tickle the ears of his congregation, but among men of thought it can only excite a smile. Between two stools a man falls to the ground.

Real Christian Sentiments.

From the tone of these remarks we judge that the Baltimore National Farm and Fireside is Catholic in its religion:

"DEMONS' WORK.

"'It is stated that the cadets at the Naval Academy receive regularly well-printed pamphlets containing the most subtil arguments for Infidelity.'—Maryland Republican.

"If there is no law to prevent the use of the mails for the dissemination of such literature, there ought to be, and we hope the Maryland Congressmen will be foremost in trying to hav such laws enacted as will effectually stop the distribution of matter of this description. The laws now forbid the use of the mails to obscene literature and lottery enterprises. The laws of Maryland prevent the publication of lottery advertisments in the papers of the state.

"Such laws are beneficial and insure the morals of the community and the decency and respectability of the entire people.

"The fiends who would send to a set of half-grown youths Infidel literature deserve to be tarred and feathered and then hung without court or jury. The officers in charge of the cadets should prevent the distribution of this impious matter among them, and, if necessary, the secretary of the navy should, by general order, forbid the cadets reading it."

The editor of the N. F. and F. seems to feel pretty bad, and he wants the Infidels tarred and feathered and then hung without trial. Perhaps such a proceeding might relieve his feelings, but we can suggest several other ways of punishing the fiends who send Freethought literature to the cadets at Annapolis. They might be put in a pen filled with combustibles, and the combustibles fired, as used to be done at the autos-da-fé in Spain. Or if the individuals were caught separately, they could be tied to stakes, surrounded with kindling-wood, and burnt that way. It used to be a favorit method of the church in dealing with isolated heretics. Another plan which proved satisfactory to the Catholics of the sixteenth century was to strip the Infidels and stretch them upon a machine known as the rack. Ropes around their arms and feet attached to rollers turned by levers were efficacious in drawing the Infidels apart and preventing any future teaching of heresy. Horses hitched to the ropes and smartly whipped brought about the same desirable result. Thumbscrews placed upon the hands of the heretics often prevented the writing of blasphemy, and an iron heated red-hot and thrust into the eyes was a drawback to making well-printed pamphlets popular in Europe at one time. Or the Infidels might be bound hand and foot and thrown into the "cradle," garnished within with sharp-pointed nails which penetrated the epidermis as the cradle was rocked by the tender nurses. Over in Bavaria, in the city of Nuremberg, there is an ancient torture-chamber whose resources might be drawn upon. There are spiked collars for the neck, iron boots for the legs, gags for the mouth, cloths to cover the face and permit the slow percolation of water, drop by drop, down the throat of the person undergoing this form of torture. There are rollers set round with spikes, for bruising the arms and back; there are iron scourges, pincers and tongs for tearing out the tongue, slitting the nose and ears, and otherwise disfiguring and mangling the body. There are instruments for compressing the fingers till the bones shall be squeezed to splinters. There are instruments for probing below the finger-nails till an exquisit pain, like a burning fire, runs along the nerves. There are instruments for tearing out the tongue, for scooping out the eyes, for grubbing up the ears. There are bunches of iron cords, with a spiked circle at the end of every whip, for tearing the flesh from the back till bone and sinew are laid bare. There are iron cases for the legs, which, tightened upon the limb placed in them by means of a screw, reduce flesh and bone to a jelly. There are also iron ladles with long handles, for holding molten lead or boiling pitch, to be poured down the throat of the victim, and convert his body into a burning caldron. Many other ingenious contrivances for prevention of heresy are preserved in this ancient castle, but we hav mentioned enough to show the editor of the N. F. and F. how peuril and behind the times is his method of simple tar and feathers and a rope over the limb of a tree. Christians were once quite energetic in the good work, and did not mind sitting up nights to invent new arguments against the printing of pamphlets containing heresy. The Baltimore editor is not zealous enough. Let him read a little church history and he will easily be enabled to devise much better methods of punishing Infidels than hanging.

Mistaken.

In answer to the question, "Did Thomas Paine, author of the 'Age of Reason,' spend his last hours in great agony of mind?" the Methodist organ says:

"The New York Observer, in reply to Robert Ingersoll, made a very strong case a few years ago in favor of the prevalent view that he did spend his last hours in anguish of mind. It is of very little importance whether he did or did not. He had abundant reason to do so. If he did, it was natural; if he did not, it was only another proof of the depravity of the human heart, and an illustration of judicial blindness, for 'for this cause shall God send them strong delusion that they might believe a lie and be damned, who hav not pleasure in the truth, but hav pleasure in unrighteousness.' Ingersoll's unconcern in the midst of his blasphemous career is a much worse sign of his moral state than the most terrible anguish of mind, and if he dies in perfect calmness three scripture words will describe him: 'being past feeling.'"

The eminent editor is mistaken. In 1877 Colonel Ingersoll offered a thousand dollars to any one who would "substantiate the absurd story that Thomas Paine died in agony and fear, frightened by the clanking chains of devils." The New York Observer of July 19, 1877, said:

"We hav published the testimony, and the witnesses are on hand to prove that Tom Paine died a drunken, cowardly, and beastly death. Let the colonel deposit the money with any honest man, and the absurd story, as he terms it, shall be shown to be an over true tale. But he won't do it. His talk is Infidel 'buncombe' and nothing more."

Upon this, Colonel Ingersoll engaged the Observer in controversy upon the subject, and the editor was obliged to take back his boast, which in his issue of November 1, 1877, he did in the following words:

"We hav never stated in any form, nor hav we ever supposed, that Paine actually renounced his Infidelity. The accounts agree in stating that he died a blaspheming Infidel."

As Colonel Ingersoll said, "this for all coming time will refute the slanders of the churches yet to be."

We advise the editors of religious papers to obtain from this office a little ten-cent tract entitled "Paine Vindicated." It is a reprint of the correspondence between Colonel Ingersoll and the Observer. Both sides are presented, and Thomas Paine's name and fame are triumphantly vindicated. But it may be that because they are religious editors they will not want to read it.

Slate-Writing.

An esteemed correspondent from the antipodes writes:

"I should like to see a few words in THE TRUTH SEEKER per editor re slate-writing business. Surely he could decide if it ever occurs without fraud. London Punch says it does, through Eglinton, and that is a paper that would rather go the other way if uncertain at all in the matter. The editor of the Investigator seems to fear it is spirits by the way he treats the subject. I do not see it need be, even if writing does occur."

It always affords us pleasure to giv information to inquirers, but in this case we are unable to contribute anything to our friend's stock of knowledge. We hav an opinion upon the subject, but no knowledge. All our personal investigations into phenomena of this kind hav been unqualified failures. The mediums said the influence was bad.

We well remember how enthusiastic the late D. M. Bennett and his brother-in-law were over a seance held with Slade, and described at length in these columns. Taking his word for it, there could be no doubt that slate-writing is as real as rocks. But we cannot forget the experience of the Belleville, Ont., Freethinkers with the same Mr. Slade, in which he confessed that his work was trickery. Mrs. Slenker's experience with Mr. Manfield leads her to the conclusion that spirits had no hand in penning his reply to her queries. In this we coincide. But even while writing this, there comes a letter from a personal friend—not to be published—in which the writer says: "I hav sat beside Mr. Mansfield several times, when he has answered my sealed letters correctly. Never does he open the letters." Now, if this friend—whose perception is quite keen—is not deceived, why not hav slate-writing?

We could quote the experiences and opinions of scores of friends on both sides of the question, but what is the use? Mr. Truesdell once explained to us how it was that Slade performed his slate-writing. A Welsh gentleman who investigated Spiritualistic phenomena in England has told us how Mansfield reads and answers sealed questions. On the other hand, two of our acquaintances, keen business men, honest in all the affairs of this world at least, hav pledged their sacred honors that they hav had slate-writing and letters answered by these gentlemen under such strict tests as precluded the possibility of fraud. In the absence of personal experience, what right hav we to pronounce judgment one way or the other?

If there is another world, inhabited by those who hav lived here, we should think the spirits would wish to communicate with their friends here. Thousands testify that they do. But this testimony has never been sufficient to convince the skeptics. The assertion that there is a future life has not, we think, yet been proven. And our friend will see, too, that upon the question of slate-writing it will be more modest in us not to express an opinion without evidence sufficient to back it up. That evidence we are unable to obtain because of the malign influence our presence exerts upon the spirits.

Editorial Notes.

A CHRISTIAN journal thinks a Saturday half-holiday is a good thing because it enables clerks to hav their fun on Saturday and go to church on Sunday. The clerks are yet to be heard from on this point.

THE third edition of "Bible Myths, and their Parallels in Other Religions," has been printed, and the price reduced to $2.50. It is an exceedingly valuable book for Freethinkers, and deserves the most extensiv circulation.

ABOUT the weakest slush that the book makers hav ever put upon a long suffering public is Miss Rose Elizabeth Cleveland's book, "George Eliot's Poetry and Other Studies," published last week. But, as the World says, it has been beautifully advertised.

THE New York Times says that "it can hardly be doubted that fewer scandals would vex the community were devout young sisters no longer liable to clerical kisses;" and in view of the disclosures made in last week's TRUTH SEEKER of the falls of clergymen, we think the Times is right.

OUR friend, H. M. Eastman, is stirring up the people of Deadwood, Dak., to hav the public library open all day Sunday instead of from 1:30 to 6:30. He thinks the clergy wish the library closed in the forenoon and evening, that folks may be compelled to "recreate" by attending church.

TWO pastors of Kenosha, Wis., churches stopped a Sunday game of baseball in that town recently. Hissing and shouting accompanied each step of the legal proceedings. The attendance was some five thousand. The ministers declare their intention of running the town on Sunday. It seems to us that with five thousand people opposed to them they will hav an interesting time in doing it.

THE "Rev. Father" Holley, Catholic priest at Malden, Mass., has received orders from his bishop to build a parochial school to cost forty thousands dollars. So important is this considered that the church is to be mortgaged to obtain the funds. If Freethinkers wish to learn the aims of the bishop in this matter, let them peruse M. C. O'Byrne's paper transferred to THE TRUTH SEEKER columns from the North American Review.

WE neglected to announce that the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia held a Victor Hugo Memorial meeting on June 19th. An audience of five hundred enjoyed the services. The platform was decorated with the French and American flags. J. Clegg Wright was the orator of the evening. Miss Keyser gave a recitation from the "Hunchback of Notre Dame," Hon. Charles Keyser made a short address, and an original poem was read by Damon Y. Kilgore.

BROTHER BOWEN, of the Independent, held his annual celebration at Woodstock, Conn., on the Fourth. The people around the neighborhood call it "Barnum Bowen's show," but that is unkind. Although Mr. Bowen, like all other Christians, must hold to the republican form of government as merely tentativ, in the absence of the kingdom for which they pray, he is deserving of considerable credit for his display of patriotism. Nevertheless, the people of the Episcopal church in Philadelphia, who formerly rang their bell on the 4th of June in honor of the birthday of George III., were more consistent Christians than those who pacticipated in the celebration at Woodstock.

ABOUT Sunday newspapers the Congregationalist says: "Probably nothing else has helped on the misuse of the Sabbath, the neglect of the house of God, and hindered the progress of the church and religious work so much as the Sunday newspapers." The Christian Advocate adds: "It is often the first step in the religious ruin of a family to let it in. Many hav lost the whole life of piety by it. It means no Bible read, no religious conversation, no prayer or meditation." If this is so, Sunday newspapers ought to be multiplied.

MR. A. TILNEY, of Toronto, has joined Mr. Reynolds in his Tent Campaign, and proposes to giv the people good music to supplement good talking. Mr. Tilney has been prominent in Liberal work in Toronto, and to him is largely due the credit of the fine socials and musical entertainments enjoyed by the Toronto League the past spring and winter. A benefit entertainment was given him on leaving Toronto, realizing some twenty-five or thirty dollars. We hav no doubt his musical abilities will be appreciated by the people where the tent is pitched, and lead to larger audiences.

WE hav just printed three new pamphlets, which are interesting reading. "St. Matthew before the Court," by Secularist, price 10 cents, shows that the only way for St. Matthew to escape the charge of forgery is to prove that he did not write the gospel ascribed to him, which Secularist has done in a masterly manner. The style of the work is new and quaint, and it will undoubtedly hav many readers. "Bible Fabrications Refuted: The Bible's Errors Exposed," by O. B. Whitford, M.D., price 15 cents, is just what its name indicates. "Truth: a Poem in Three Parts," by E. N. Kingsley, price 25 cents, is his former pamphlet of the same title revised and enlarged. It is good reading, and its sale should be commensurate with its merits. All three of these pamphlets are clearly printed on calendered paper, with heavy antique covers.

THE charge of being an Agnostic, made several months ago by the King Solomon Lodge of Masons at Toronto again J. Harrison, has resulted in an authoritativ statement by the Grand Master of Canada that Atheists and Agnostics cannot be Masons. He says: "No person can be initiated who does not believe in the true God, the Great Architect of the universe." The Grand Master added that the attention of Masons all over the world had been directed to this subject by the address of the Grand Master of the state of New York, which he quoted approvingly. Masonry, he continued, wisely required no more than a belief in God, who had revealed his will to man, and would punish vice and reward virtue. It required that, and nothing less would be accepted. The man who denied the existence of a God was already excluded. Practical Atheism should also be excluded in the persons of those who only admit that there possibly may be a God. The Grand Master also decided that a Quaker, who does not take an oath or administer one, cannot be made a Mason; also that an Indian not enfranchised can be made a Mason. This is the first case of the kind ever occurring on this Continent.

THE indictment against Riel, the Canadian rebel, sets forth that he has not the fear of God in his heart, but is moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil. This, however, Riel shows to be wrong. His instigator and mover is the other fellow, as may be seen from the following from his diary, which fell into the possession of the troops with other papers One entry is:

"The spirit of God said unto me: 'The enemy has gone to Prince Albert' I prayed, saying, 'Condescend to inform me who this enemy may be.' It was answered, 'Charley Larance.'

"The spirit of God shows me a measure of merchandise. On the bottom of the measure are written the following words: 'The bowels of the North.' Oh! my God, grant me for the love of Jesus, of Mary, of Joseph, and of St. John the Baptist, the grace to conquer the North, and to be master of all its possessions. Giv me the 'bowels of the North.'"

One of Riel's prayers was:

"Oh, giv to all of us the foresight, prudence, courage, force, and plans which we need in order to attain the end of all our good undertakings, and fulfil thy holy will in every point of view."

The blame for the rebellion, therefore, should be placed by the authorities on the occupant of the throne the farthest removed from sheol.

Lectures and Meetings.

IN addition to lectures previously mentioned, E. C. Walker spoke at Wentworth, Dak., June 23d; Sanborn, Iowa, July 1st; and at Sheldon, Iowa, July 2d and 3d. His address at present is Sioux City, Iowa.

MRS. H. S. LAKE will speak at the Cassadaga Lake camp August 8th, 9th, 11th, and 13th, and will begin an engagement at the Mt. Pleasant Park Camp-meeting (Clinton, Ia.) August 16th. Parties wishing the services of Mrs. Lake for the fall and winter months will address her at Watertown, N. Y., 12 High street.

THE officers of the Pittsburgh, Pa., League for the ensuing year are: President, George Dovey; vice-president, Roman Staley; secretary, Harry Hoover; treasurer, W. F. Schade; financial secretary, H. H. Timby. Council: R. H. Wolfe, John Juergens, H. H. Timby, Frank Bacon, Wm. Evans, Mrs. W. F. Schade, Mrs. Anna Price, Mrs. James Wormersly, Philip Bambach, Ed. Bambach.

THE following has been handed in for publication: The People's Spiritual Meeting which convenes at Arcanum Hall, 54 Union Square, every Sunday afternoon and evening, and Friday afternoons, is enjoying quite a season of interest. Several mediums of ability are present at every session, who delight the attendants by speaking (as the "spirit giveth utterance") messages from spirit friends, also descriptions of the departed. Among the most prominent of mediums are Mrs. Mary C. Morrell, Mrs. Higgins, John Slater, Mrs. E. R. Still, M.D., and Mrs. Henderson. Mr. Charles Dawbarn has delivered several very excellent lectures at this meeting upon subjects connected with the Spiritual philosophy which hav been highly appreciated.

Letters from Friends.

NEVINVILLE, IA., July 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I used to hav many copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER when it was edited by D. M. Bennett, which I used to circulate with the Investigator and the Iron-Clad Age, to which I am a regular subscriber. I hav not had many copies of your paper lately, and the idea seems to prevail among many here that THE TRUTH SEEKER is dead. Please enter my name on your list of subscribers, for which find inclosed $3, and I will convince my Christian friends of the fact, which I hav repeatedly told them, that the paper founded by D. M. Bennett will never die while there is work for a reform journal to do.

F. I. GREEN.

A COMMUNICATION TO THE "BUCKEYE," REFUSED.

LAURA, O., June 7, 1885.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BUCKEYE: I hav read a letter in your paper from J. F. Sloan, of Pennsylvania, formerly of this county (Miami). He seems to be terribly "soured" by the Springfield Convention. He says: "Not a single crumb of comfort and hope was given to the anxious and expectant hungry temperance host." But how could the Rev. Mr. Sloan expect any bread from the old reliable party which he was identified with, but left—the great, grand old Republican party, which has done more for the temperance cause than any other organization in existence—and floated out into the misty waves of Prohibition?

You may protect, but you can't prohibit. Look at Kansas and Iowa; do they hav less crime? The answer is, No. The prohibitionists say that whisky is the cause of nine-tenths of all crimes. If so, why are those states not freed from all crimes except one-tenth? If you can by an amendment to the state constitution prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, can't you as easily prevent houses of ill-fame, murder, and preachers and all other men running off with other people's wives, accounts of which I observe in almost every paper? He says they know it is evil, and nothing but evil; hence this grand old party gets down in the dust, and eats a cart-load of dirt, to get its patronage and votes, saying, "Am I not thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day?" Why, reverend sir, this G. O. P. doesn't stop for a cart-load. It can remove mountains.

And now what is the matter? Why, last July this Prohibition party met, adopted resolutions (even putting God in), bridled up their pet, mounted, and rode until they were kicked square in the face, and they now come to the G. O. P. for a little comfort because they are so badly wounded by falling off the ass.

This old party will not down; it has the brains and the vim. This the prohibitionist will learn. He says the Christian citizen, if he would be true to his God, must vote as he prays. The Democrats doubtless will declare for license. We look for nothing else. What, then, are the Christian men of Ohio to do? Why, pray a little louder to their God, who has all power, and whose ears are open, that he will come to their aid and sweep from the face of his footstool this ungodly demon, intemperance.

Is it not a little carnal-minded for Christians to be mixed up with the political parties of this world? This government of ours is secular, not Christian; not a word of God or his son in the Constitution; but every citizen is declared to hav equal rights. It is not intemperance that the orthodox ministers are smarting under. They use this for a cloak under which is hidden the real viper. They want God in the Constitution. The churches hav held conferences, sent petitions to Congress, and the Catholic and the Protestant churches are consulting for the purpose of forming an alliance. The seventy thousand preachers are a great deal like the saloon-keeper, giving to the people that which satisfieth not. Science is doing more for humanity than all the divines, and they know and feel they are losing power; with that goes the money, and that touches them under the fourth rib.

Now, Brother Sloan, explain the first plank in the platform of 1884 of the Prohibition party. Of course, you hav the right to vote as you wish; and so hav we of the G. O. P.

H. W. HALL.

A REVIEW OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, JULY 4, A.S. 285.

BARRE, MASS, July 4, A.S., 285.

MR. EDITOR: "Why not review THE TRUTH SEEKER for my next article? Surely it deserves it. Not this particular number in preference to its predecessors, but because this is at hand and new," thought I, as I lay here ill on my couch after perusing the entire paper. So here it goes.

First, then, "Notes and Clippings," as usual, are spicy and varied, while "News of the Week," gleaned from all quarters, is true to its name.

Under "Communications," by L. N. Perkins, we hav "The Moral Aspects of Vivisection—Concluded," which goes down into the marrow of the subject, leaving the cruel vivisectionist no ground whereon to stand, unless he is willing to be ranked with barbarians and beasts. (See Elliott Preston's illustration, TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 6, 1884.)

"Nihilism," by the editor of the Nihilist, San Francisco, Cal, comes next; and pardon me, kind editor and readers, if I restate his definition, as it is important that it be well understood and remembered by all: "A Nihilist is a man who does not bow down before any authority, and accepts nothing without examination." Nothing bad in that, is there?

"Lord Bacon a Literary Thief," by "Anti-Bacon," on page 419, and "Bacon a Concealed Poet," by "Iconoclast," page 422, the one against and the other in favor of the opinion that Bacon wrote Shakspere, show that when great minds disagree smaller ones ought to hold a suspended judgment until stubborn facts either prove of disprove.

"The Heavenly Inheritance," by J. G. Malcolm, based on a p[illegible]her figuring out the dimensions of the abode of the saints, with rooms for each 20x20 feet, is ludicrous in the extreme. I trust no one failed to read it.

It is to be hoped that the Liberals will not "throw their mud batteries" on "Liberta," as he apprehends, for his judicious "Refining Liberalism," while he must remember that each worker can only use the weapons in his possession, and that to answer a fool according to his folly, sometimes, is the surest way to silence a railing Christian, though it must be admitted that his demand that "a higher, sweeter, purer tone ought to be cultivated in the journalism of Freethought" is excellent advice, and possibly best if all were developed up to his standard.

"Lights and Shades," by W. Allen Smith, is a contrast that should be republished in every Christian paper and daily. Cannot an effort be made in that direction?

"A Letter from Paris, France," merits a second reading.

I'm rejoiced that Charles B. Reynolds and tent are succeeding so well. My apprehensions that the degenerated would demolish it, it appears, were not well founded.

The attention of Freethinkers is called to Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes," and "The Albany Convention."

Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose we can all reverence. Well do I remember, while she was speaking at the Hartford Bible Convention in 1854, when a Christian mob had extinguished the lights and our lives were threatened, her standing unawed and unmoved on the platform until they were relighted, and order was restored, when, with Bible in hand, she poured out such invectivs upon the representativs of that book, who had sought to break up the meeting, as I had never before heard. Blessings in her declining years for her zeal and usefulness in the past!

The discussion on "The Cause of Planetary Motion," by Messrs. Chase, "W. H. B.," and J. A. Tuttle is replete with interest, but facts only can decide this cause; therefore the value of agitation.

W. F. Jamieson's characteristic "Talk with Ingersoll" is a reminder of the first talk of your humble servant with the same gentleman in 1868, in Portland, Me., while the gallant colonel was "stumping the state" during the great campaign, and before either of us was aware that the other was Antichristian. Since then what a change! Jamieson's report is true in every particular.

Holt's "Pest of Laws" is too true, alas! alas!

Every week, "Canadian Notes," by R. B. Butland, is among the best reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"They Mean Business," by Eva Barnes, viz., to get their Christian God into the United States Constitution, should be deeply impressed upon the heart and intellect of every Liberal.

Our good editorials, "Independence Day," "Signs of the Times in Europe," etc., with "Editorial Notes," more than fill the bill. Whatever else you "skip," never miss those unparalleled editorials and notes. I would like to comment on each, but can only commend the "Modern Balaam."

"Letters from Friends," though always excellent, are unexceptional this week. It would be invidious to mention any and omit others, but General Garfield's religious belief, in the letter of P. B. Reasoner, please review attentivly.

In "Children's Corner" the editor's "Some Children at Onset" must delight the little ones, which with D. B. Cozine's "Egyptian Superstition," poetry, puzzles, enigmas, and conundrums, including Burns's prize riddle answer, make up a page not to be ignored even by adults.

The poem by J. Wm. Lloyd, the same who writes those sterling articles, "The Pursuit of Happiness," in the Sociologist, is a mine of wealth, and the spirit of Robbie Burns need not quiver if implicated in its production, while "The Tramp's Soliloquy," by Eidda, makes the poor wretch attribute all his troubles to rum, even though he ends up with "No prohibition for me."

But I hav now come to the best of the whole paper, and, in fact, what suggested this article, viz., "Book Review: the Old Testament." For terseness, brevity, wit, irony, justice, and truthfulness, "it can't be beat." Will not the reviewer accept my unqualified approbation, warmest thanks, and sincerest gratitude for his able work; and will not THE TRUTH SEEKER readers hunt up July 4th, and reperuse this unique review just to please me, if for no other reason?

"Gems of Thought" are gems indeed, while "Odds and Ends" are enough to make one laugh until he "sees stars."

On the principle "if you cannot say any good about a person say nothing," mention of two articles has been omitted, but numerous little deserving items, scattered here and there like pearls, could not be specified for lack of space.

And all this in one week's TRUTH SEEKER, and for a trifle less than six cents! Is there one reader of these sixteen pages who begrudges the Truth Seeker Co. that moiety of compensation? If so, let him hide his diminutiv head beneath its ample folds. Is there one to whom this heavily freighted sheet makes its weekly visits, that can sit down and peruse the same until the close of the year, and forget that his little bill of three dollars is unpaid? Oh, let us remember the poor editor and hard-worked employees who furnish us with such rich, luscious food; forget, or curtail, some of our luxuries, and make glad the heart of those who labor so earnestly and faithfully for our pleasure and profit.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just organized a Liberal Society. If you will send us something to read we will appreciate it. We shall soon hav some money, then we will buy all we can. We want to encourage the reading of Liberal literature. It will be slow at first, but we'll keep our banner floating, we hope. Your exchanges, after you get through with them, will help us. Respectfully, T. C. GLASS.

[We hav forwarded Mr. Glass what we could, but we hav given away so much the past winter that we can hardly afford to do much more. Letters like this are are often received, and we think it will be well to organize a general Propagandist Fund. We file our Liberal exchanges, but perhaps application to the publishers of the various papers would bring what Mr. Glass wants.—ED. T. S.]

CLINTON, ILL., June 30, 1885.

GENTLEMEN: I am delighted (yes, though an old man eighty-two on the 4th July) with the lists of the names of hosts of pamphlets and tracts. I am a poor man, or I would select a number. I long (now the mists of religious darkness are removed) to develop my anxiety to remove, if possible, the Bible prejudices of persons who were religiously educated, and (as I was) sent to preach what is termed religion. This day I met in our printing-office the Methodist preacher here. I explained to him my views, especially of the Old Testament, as merely and only written by Jews, and only for the Jews, not for us gentiles, from Genesis to Malachi. Henry VIII. needed Moses's help as millions do this day. I can and will war against kingcraft in all shapes, and popecraft and priestcraft. Will some brothers and sisters supply me? I came here to be an old hard-shell preacher; but prejudice severed us.

If any brother or sister who can afford it will pay for papers, tracts, and books, I will circulate them, and try to raise an Abstinence and Truth church here. Help hands, for I hav no lands.

The 4th July is my birthday. I was born in the city of Bath (and so was my partner), England. I drink no beer, cider, wines, or liquors.

Yours very truly, JAMES FACKRELL.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 4, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Being a pupil of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and anxious to learn, I trust that my asking pertinent questions, and offering logical suggestions, for the purpose of eliciting reliable information on subjects of which we are greatly in need of being more reliably informed than we are, will not be regarded as unwarrantably intrusiv nor intolerably annoying.

The cause of planetary motion being fairly presented for investigation, I will inquire if "W. H. B.," or any other of our friends, will make the subject "plain enough" by proving conclusivly that planets were formed by meteoric accretion.

I trust they will perceive the impropriety of drawing upon imagination for premises to reason from, and will offer only conclusions that are reached by logical reasoning from facts that are positivly known, and from facts that are knowable by analogical reasoning from facts that are positivly known, on the scientific axiom that, the law of nature being the same everywhere within her jurisdiction, like cause should invariably produce like effect, and vice versa, throughout the domain of nature.

The fact that the firmament is thickly studded with motionless meteors, and probably has been from the time that matter was transmitted from formless vapor to substance, is anything but conclusiv evidence that planets were formed by the conglomeration of such meteors, but is good circumstantial evidence that they were not. Therefore, I will briefly state some bottom facts.

(1) It should be a well known fact that nature recognizes no law nor yields to any authority but of that despotic old tyrant, Necessity. Therefore nothing can be in nature unless there is an absolute necessity for its being.

(2) It appears to be the universal law of nature that all forms must hav an imaginary before they possibly hav a material existence. Even the farmer cannot make so simple a thing as a tap for his cider-barrel unless the form and dimensions are suggested by imagination; then reason determins its adaptation to the purposes, and will sets the physical forces in motion that are required to giv material effect to the design.

(3) Reason, imagination, and will are not matter, but inherent properties thereof; nor can they create matter nor force, but utilize that which is pre-existent.

Such being the universal law of nature, it should logically follow that imagination, reason, and will were in activ being before any formation or form of matter was possible. They being inherent properties of matter, co-existent therewith, it should logically follow that all matter in incipiency was a formless void, an impalpable vapor so attenuated that it could neither be seen nor felt, that had not so much the appearance of an existence as shadow has. The fact of its existence not being perceivable nor conceivable by any faculty but imagination, it could not really hav had any other than an imaginary existence.

The transmutation of matter from that condition to substance was virtually and essentially equivalent to a creation; as a matter of fact, it really did create substance, without which forms were impossible; and it being equally impossible for substance to exist without form, and the transmutation of matter being a chemical operation, should it not be more compatible with all known principles of nature that all formations of matter should hav been created or effected when matter was transmuted than subsequently? Appearances in nature are so deceptiv that when investigating them we should more safely trust to reason applied to known basic principles of nature than to our eyes and imagination.

J. A. TUTTLE.

BE NATURAL.

COLUMBUS, KAN., July 4, 1885.

I beseech you, O reader, Liberal, Freethinker, Humanitarian, to be consistent and practical, and try as far as possible to lead a natural life. I regret not that I am poor, unhonored, persecuted, and despised, and misrepresented by bigots and many so-called Liberals, but I do lament that I did not inherit a better organism, and that as soon as I was born I began to be taught, by precept and example, to disobey the laws of life and health.

Although I inherited a very activ brain and dominant nervous system, with deficient vital and nutritiv power, yet I could hav lived twenty years longer, and made life yield twenty times as much enjoyment, if I had been taught, had known how to liv. Instead of such teaching, my impressible and imaginativ brain was pictured with images, of unrealities, God, devil, angels, Gabriel, ghosts, heaven, hell, the awful judgment day, away up or down somewhere. I was taught that the body was of little use or importance, but that the soul, and how to save it in an imaginary, and, to me, as yet unproved future world, was my chief concern.

As I (so it looks to me) can only liv this life, with what vain regret I see how, through my ignorance and false precepts and examples, little I hav made of it, and how much I hav abridged it. I now try to run my own machine, do my own thinking, am independent of priests, lawyers, doctors, and life and body destroying habits, customs, and fashions. "I lean upon the bosom of the universe," and unto thee, O nature, I bow; thee, and thee alone, will I respect and worship, and as far as I can I will liv in conformity to thee, will "take nature's path, and mad opinions leave."

I care not how erudite, logical, and eloquent a man or woman may be, or how Liberal and reformatory in words and precepts, if I see them marring, defacing, poisoning, compressing their bodies, every atom of which is sacred for this life's purposes, to me they are not true Liberals, to me it is mentally painful.

There is nothing to compel a Liberal, in public or private, to use tobacco or alcohol in any form, but his own inherited or acquired appetite and want of knowledge, will, and independence. There is nothing to compel so many Liberals and Freethinkers to shave off the beard, the beauty and strength of manhood, and unman themselvs so far, and thus virtually say to nature, "I will be fashionable, instead of obeying thee." To every true physiologist and hygienist a man with a shaved face is a forbidding and repulsiv sight. A man half shaved is a still more repulsive contrast. Look at a recently-shaved face through a high-power microscope, and see the bloody capillary stumps, and if you hav a normal idea of a natural life, and a manhood of strength and vigor, and the uses of the beard, you will be still more disgusted.

To see lecturers on science, advocates of nature, go to the barber's shop once, twice, or three times a week, to mar and thwart nature, and get their faces to look like a shaved hog, is to me inconsistent and deplorable. It is not a pleasing duty I feel I must do to allude to so barbe(a)rous a custom. I will not shave for any consideration unless I am physically compelled.

Our Liberal ladies who follow the suicidal dress fashions, and enslave their poor, diseased bodies, while they talk and write so well about universal mental liberty—oh, that they, too, would see the significance of their own and prospectiv children's lives, and be natural.

"Who livs to nature rarely can be poor.
Who livs to fancy never can be rich."

New York, July 4, 1885.

Mr. Editor: In your late issue you publish a letter from "Constant Reader," commenting upon one of June 13th, signed Genelli, relating to Universology and Integralism, or the Andrewsian system of philosophy. In most of what "Constant Reader" says I can only concur; but it seems to me that something more should be said in appreciation of what Genelli has put forth. There is certainly a sense in which Universology has always existed, as music and logic hav; but in the sense of being discovered by the human mind and formulated as science, that has not been the case, and the perception all the way along by a few leading minds that such a unity of the sciences must somehow exist came far short of the actual discovery of the science. In this latter sense Mr. Andrews is clearly leading the way, and is, I think, doubtless in advance of all the thinkers; but neither he, nor I, nor any other pupil of his would repel or reject or do otherwise than accept and approve of the brain-work of others on the same track, when the work is honestly and truly their own, as in the case of Genelli.

Several of his statements are truly admirable, are undoubtedly original with himself, and must be accepted as a contribution to Universological thinking. As, for example, "In cosmic trinity," he says, "is the only possibility of Universology." This is a near approximation to Universological verity, but Universology goes a step lower and discovers the principles out of which the "cosmic unity" itself is evolved. In fact, the discovery of these fundamental principles is the gist and core of Mr. Andrews's work, and the elaboration of the laws of their working is the continuation of it, and in that work he is engaged constantly. Universology would also correct another of the proximate truths—truths which come just short of being the whole truth—announced by Genelli. He says, "Emerson commends Plato for saying there is a science of the sciences, but destroys its possibility by positing Theism, or a cosmic dualism, as a first principle. My belief is that matter alone exists. Were matter and force, or spirit, separate entities, there would be general antagonism instead of harmony. If Mr. Andrews is really the parent of Universology, he may be able to set us right."

Mr. Andrews, or anyone competent, speaking as a Universologist, would set Genelli, and those thinking with him, right by dealing out these few general facts and principles:

First, in point of fact, we hav, and always hav had, and always shall hav, "general antagonism," not "instead of harmony," but as necessary to harmony, as one of the factors of harmony, or as one of the two legs upon which harmony stands and rests. And this is because the Universological principle back of the facts demonstrates that there can be no harmony until there are opposits to be harmonized. There is, first, a general, undifferentiated unity, to illustrate from a social point of view, as in the Catholic church. There is then antagonism, the first stage of which is dualism, as between Protestants and Catholics, and between the numerous sects of Protestants. If reconciliation and harmony were to come between them, which Genelli is probably not prepared to anticipate, it could only be by the recognition of the principle that diversity or antagonism is just as necessary as simple unity. The error af Genelli is in confounding mere unity with harmony. There is first unity, then antagonism, then harmony. Harmony is the higher unity that partially conquers and fully reconciles the antagonism. Without a series of antagonisms there can be no harmony. There is, therefore, not only room in the universe for cosmic dualism, but an absolute demand for it, alongside of the simple monism, unism, or unity, in order that we may hav the third thing, which is the composit, artistic, and high harmonic unity which grows out of the blending of the simple unity and the antagonism. Hence it is that Integralism is the new and surprising thing in the world—an absolute philosophy of reconciliation and harmony.

As an instance of the catholicity of Mr. Andrews in the acceptance of the contributions of other minds in the elaboration of this great new science and philosophy, I hav heard him speak in the highest terms of appreciation of an article by Mr. Preston, published some months ago in The Truth Seeker, with a square diagram illustrating slow and rapid composition and slow and rapid decomposition. Mr. Andrews observed that this was an important contribution to Universology itself, and that for thoughtful minds it would be more convincing of the probability of Spiritual materialization than all the testimony and argument contained elsewhere in Spiritualistic literature.

McCune, Kan., June 30, 285.

Mr. Editor: Allow me space in our best of all papers to report once more from this place. Last spring one of the noble men of this world died about five miles west of here. His name was Joseph Wein, and he was sixty years old. He had dared to think for himself, and asked that a Liberal should speak at his funeral, but he wanted no canting priest on that occasion.

Two weeks ago a preacher, J. P. Allen, near here whipped his wife and bruised her very badly. He has been before the courts for the offense. It is not done with yet. His wife has sued for a divorce. And just here in our town, last week, a good Christian, one of the Lord's old sheep, a follower of the meek and lowly, was caught reaching for the forbidden fruit of another brother by being rather near where he should not be in the absence of the husband; and at this time a preacher sixty-two years old is under bonds in this county to appear at court for trying to rape a girl ten years old.

M. S. Gowin.

Bangor, Me., July 7, 1885.

Mr. Editor: Who is "Liberta?" Is it a man or a woman? I often see articles from her, him, or it; but the last one takes the cake (slang).

Please excuse bad language as I never went to school; I am, therefore, one of the rag-tag and bob-tail of Liberalists. If I belonged to the high-toned, kid-gloved class, I should not read the grand, old Truth Seeker, founded by our lamented D. M. Bennett. But I should subscribe for the Index, or join a Baptist church, and become respectable, and help make orphans, and then ask praise for helping to support them.

Some of the best thinkers I ever saw were not college graduates, or what are commonly called cultured. Yours for the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, whether clothed in rags or silks.

MORE COLOR DEMANDED.

Cleveland, O., June 16, 1885.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed please find $1, to extend my day of grace. I see by your last issue that you allow people to giv you some advice without any talking back. It encourages me to do the same. I am now nearly seventy-eight years old, and my eyesight very poor, so poor that I cannot read over half that I see in your paper. Now, I will say with S. Parsons, use coarser type and more ink. Then, perhaps, I shall be able to enjoy your paper better. Now don't get spunky, and tell me to get better spectacles. I hav got the best that I can find in three states, and yet for lack of ink on your types I am not able to read all I want to read in your paper.

Please remember us old folks, and oblige

Yours most truly, Hiram Van Pelt.

Oshkosh, Wis., June 27, 1885.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me "Crimes of Preachers," and the balance of the money in "Ingersoll Catechised," and the "Modern Balaam." In The Truth Seeker of 27th inst. I read a large number of references by Andrew Jacobson, and I must say, I like his way of bringing those things before the public. You are probably aware that no sensible man of the present day believes the Bible, except those who do not read it, and many a man would read such short references in a paper, in preference to hunting them up in the Bible. That page of Mr. Jacobson's will do a vast amount of good, and it is the only way to make people read the Bible, and as soon as they do read it they will condemn it. There are, of course, in the Bible a number of obscene passages sufficient to condemn it, and of the existence of which many people are ignorant. They should in some manner be pointed out. [See "Holy Bible Abridged."—Ed. T. S.]

Every day when I am able to go out, I pass a church, and on the opposit side of the street is a school-house, and the children are marched from the school to the church where much of their time is spent. Now, I think it is criminal in any man to teach our children such falsehoods, and those who do it should be severely punished for it. I wish we could hav a few lecturers here this summer, but those who are traveling seem to giv Oshkosh a wide birth. But tell them not to be afraid, for if they come here I will not let anyone hurt them. There are many Liberals in this place, and all they want is a stirring up a little. I am distributing all the tracts I can get. The Index sent me a package last week, but they are all gone now.

Geo. M. Hare.

Texas, Mich., June 29, 1885.

Mr. Editor: Brother Wells's letter in The Truth Seeker of June 27th gave me a text to free my mind. Why, oh, why will Liberals stultify their principles by calling a priest to legalize a marriage? They should hav no more to do with a marriage contract than they hav with the execution of a deed or any other legal business.

Marriage is a simple contract between parties, and in making a public record of the same, a religious teacher should hav no more to say than a pedagog or shoemaker. Yes, Mr. Wells answered the dominie right when he asked to pray—"that he did his praying with labor." So he would not eat unless he could pray. I hav seen children that would refuse to eat unless they could hav their own way. Poor soul! Like children, he will not die from starvation.

I am equally astonished to see the poor weak-kneed mortal, that has not the least respect for or faith in Christianity, as soon as a death occurs in their family, call some orthodox minister to abuse them at the funeral, and the one most available generally is the one called. He frequently is some old moss-back that has come down from a former generation, having never heard that Beecher had abolished hell. So, true to the letter of the Bible (old edition), they consign the departed, also the mourners, to the abode of their best friend, the devil. Well, if people hav never read The Truth Seeker, or used their good sense, they may be excused for the first mistake, but for a second offense, Brother Wells and others should be condemned to listen to the bray of a priest until he would eat.

Yours for principle, L. S. Burdick.

Rockford, Ill., June 20, 1885.

Mr. Editor: Some think that mind overlies the whole universe in the same way that it does in the animal's brain, some that mind came first and made this matter, others that matter and mind were produced at the same time. Now, it would seem to me that when we talk about matter we talk about Herbert Spencer's impersonal, unconscious, unthinking, eternal energy, such as we know oxygen, hydrogen, etc., non-metallic elements, and iron, calcium, aluminum, etc., metallic elements, most positivly to be; that it is their electrical properties, with their different circumstances or environments, that hav produced the varied phenomena of the universe, mind not excepted; that matter is a servant to mind only when we learn how to handle it, which is the very thing that science is doing; as to wit: the calculations of astronomers, the compounds of chemists, the appliances of mechanics, the manufacture and control of gas, steam, electricity, of which not one particle can be traced to revelation, intuition, dreams, visions, etc. But to persevering effort, the comparison of results, and profiting by the research of others that hav passed away before us, has it been accomplished; and by science, the only thing that can improve the condition of both vegetables and animals, and develop the minerals of the earth; make human environment better, and by cultivation of the intellectual and reflectiv faculties, control the selfish and social propensities, which would giv us natural morality without any superstition.

"The mind of man may dwell on nature's laws,
It nothing learns about the great first cause."

If those who hav the leisure, and about $1.50 to spare, would send for the science primers, "Chemistry," "Astronomy," and "Phrenology," they would get an immense amount of information out of them. I hav been asked by young folks that hav been through the High School here, What is this matter? They hav been over it as a sort of a task, but it leaves but little impression. I would also say that my children enjoy "The Story Hour" immensely, the stories are so true to nature.

Thomas Beale.

Newport, Me., July 8, 1885.

To the Liberalists in General, and the Albany Convention in Particular: Wishing to do all in my power to help on the work of humanity, I offer the following for your consideration, which I send to The Truth Seeker for publication:

Whereas, The history of the past shows that "church and state" hav always been partners in crime; that while the church has drunk the blood of millions slain by the sword, her bloody teeth are still firmly set in the iron jaw of the state, and that without the aid she draws from the state, she would be powerless for harm; therefore

Resolved, That the "Nine Demands" that the Liberalists put forth as the hope of humanity will prove powerless while the state exists; that, instead of "Nine Demands," there should be one universal demand for the immediate and unconditional surrender of the state as a bloody usurper, a tyrannical monster continually devouring the lives and substance of the people; and that no true Liberalist can consistently support the state by his vote and at the same time complain of the church for her persecution of Freethinkers.

Seward Mitchell.

Cedar Vale, Kan., July 1. 1885.

Mr. Editor: It perhaps would seem absurd to say that all the cowardice in the world is the outgrowth of Bible teachings, and yet I verily believe it to be so. Were it not for the thought of future punishment, no one would fear death.

Were it not for the thought of spirits, of God and devil, as taught in our Sunday-schools, the children would not fear ghosts and hobgoblins when alone in the dark.

In proportion as the impressions of hell, God, devil, angels, and all other unintelligible teachings of the Bible, are fixed in the youthful mind, the more cowardice and timidity we hav in the world.

These assertions are made from many years of observation. If any doubt the truth of the idea, let him select two boys intellectually equal, both of the same amount of education, and possessed of the same amount of bravery and independence of character.

Let those be selected who hav never had any religious training at the age of say eight or nine years old; send one to Sunday-school regularly every Sunday for only a few months, and then start each of them out separately over a lonesome road after dark. The one that went to Sunday-school (if he had a fair teacher) will see ghosts, and hear niggers, wild animals, and declare that he had to run all the way to keep from being taken in. The chances are that he will forget entirely the errand he is sent on; while the untutored youth will go on his errand singing and whistling, will do his errand correctly, and will tell of nothing but facts. If you can get the boys, try it. I hav, and that is the way it worked.

Where Mince-pie Grows.

Little Sam Sugartooth said to himself,
As he sat by a great big rose;
"I wish I could go with a fairy elf
To the land where the mince-pie grows.
I'd sit all day, in a dreamy way,
And I'd watch them bud and bloom,
And I'd eat and eat of the fruit so sweet
Just as long as my stomach had room."

Little Sam Sugartooth fell asleep,
And, as sure as the tale I tell,
The elfins softly 'round did creep,
And the boss one said: "'Tis well."
With a graceful hand he waved his wand
And sleeping Sam arose
On the elfins' backs and they all made tracks
For the land where the mince-pie grows.

Little Sam Sugartooth opened his eyes
And he looked with a wondering gaze,
And he saw 'twas the bakermen making pies.
And the boss bakerman, he says:
"Dot's a nice leedle tog unt a olt creen frog,
Unt some drash vat I fount in de streed;
Shust schop dem nice mit dose rat unt mice,
Unt 'dwill do for de next mince-mead."

Little Sam Sugartooth kept quite still,
But he thought that his sides would bust
When he saw those bakermen with a will Commence on the mince-pie crust,
In a great big trough, with their stockings off,
In their bare, red, flat, Dutch feet,
They tramped that dough till the boss said "Ho!
Dot'll do, pring de nice mince-meat."

Little Sam Sugartooth watched them close
As they brought out their rolling-pins,
And he saw them putting that horrid dose
Into rusty old worn-out tins.
But his stomach was sick and his sight grew thick,
As any one would suppose,
And he wished in his heart that he might depart
From the land where the mince-pie grows.

Little Sam Sugartooth stirred himself,
And he found he had dreampt a dream,
But he looked around for the fairy elf,
For the whole thing strange did seem.
And since that day the folks do say
That he turns his nose up high,
And hops like a frog and barks like a dog
When you offer him fresh mince-pie.

Out in the World.

Four little birdies dressed in brown,
From the home nest never had strayed,
They ne'er had encountered a single frown,
And always their parents obeyed.
But one morning Johnny struck Joe,
Who was lame and weak from his birth;
And he struck such an awful blow
That Joe dropped right down to the earth.
He fell on a sharp-edged stone,
And injured his dear little side;
He uttered one pitiful moan,
Breathed gently a sigh, and then died.
Disorder then reigned in the home,
And Johnny declared he would go
In the great world at large to roam,
That something of life he might know.

He coaxed Nannie and May also,
His dear sisters, with him to flee.
"Come," he said, "where the wavelets flow,"
Come out in the bright world with me.
I can get my living," said John,
"And you each can scratch for yourself;
There's grain to be had by the ton
To eat and to lay on the shelf."
So they went one beautiful day,
Intending their fortunes te seek;
Johnny was brave, chipper, and gay,
The sisters were modest and meek.

The first thing, a monster with claws
Caught Nannie, and squeezed her to death.
"Oh dear!" said John, "I am the cause
Of dear Nannie losing her breath."
"I wish we were at home," sobbed May,
"Cuddled up in our little nest!"
But, alas! they had lost their way,
And, wearied, they sat down to rest.
All that night May thought she should freeze,
As she perched on a branching tree.
Next morning she said with a wheeze,
"I am out in the world, I see!"
Quite soon came a stranger that way,
Gaily dressed in a vest of red;
Low and sweet he sang, "Pretty May,
Come with me and let us be wed!"
So May married, and then went abroad,
And her housekeeping cares began;
Her feathers grew ruffled and frowed,
And herself grew worried and wan.

Poor Johnny was hungry and cold,
And one day he went to the shore,
Where, caught by a kidnapper bold,
He never knew liberty more.
Ever since in a cage he sits,
And he sings this dolorous tune:
"If I had had only my wits,
I would not hav left home so soon."

It isn't such fun as you think
To be out in the world unknown,
The nectar of joy that you drink
May conceal a prisoner's groan;
And the bird who has wisdom enough
Will wait till his feathers hav grown,
Ere he tries the way that is rough,
Outside in the cold world alone. S. H. W.

The Sailor's Bride.

A STRANGE BUT TRUE STORY.

Many decades ago a vessel from Boston arrived at a dock in London. Among the hands on board was one named Tudor, a steady, well-looking young man, who acted as sailor. Very early one morning a young, beautiful, and decently dressed woman came tripping down to the vessel and inquired of Tudor for the captain. She was told he was not risen, but she insisted on seeing him without delay. Tudor called him up, and she addressed him with:

"Good morning, captain. I hav called to see if you will marry me."

"Marry you?"—believing her to be a suspicious character—"leave my vessel instantly, if you know what is for your good!" She next went to the mate and received a similar answer. She then went to where Tudor was, being engaged in handling ship-tacks, and put the same question to him. "With all my heart," answered Tudor, in a jocular manner. "Then," said she, "come along with me." Tudor left his work and followed her. By the time the principal shops were opened the lady entered a barber's shop, followed by Tudor. She ordered a knight of the razor to clip his beard and hair, of both of which he stood in need. She paid the bills and entered a hat store. She requested the best of beavers in the store, and told Tudor to select one, and he did so, the price being paid by the lady. Tudor threw his old tarpaulin aside. They next visited a shoe-store, and selected a pair of boots, the lady also paying for them. Tudor by this time was puzzled to devise the object the lady had in view. He solicited an explanation, but she told him to be silent. She led the way into a clothing-store. Here Tudor was told to select the best suit of clothes in the store. The man of the tar-bedaubed pants and checkered shirt was in a few minutes metamorphosed into as fine a gentleman as walks the streets, the bill, as before, being paid by the lady. Tudor's amazement was now complete. He again and again earnestly insisted on an explanation; the only answer he received was, "Follow me and be not afraid; all will be explained to your satisfaction." He therefore resolved to ask no more questions. Next she conducted him into a magistrate's office and politely requested the minister of the law to unite her and her companion in matrimony. This was rather a damper to Tudor, but he yielded. The ceremony over, the couple were pronounced man and wife. Without uttering a word or exchanging a kiss, Tudor and his wife left the office—not, however, until she paid the magistrate his fee. The couple walked in silence, Tudor hardly knowing what he was doing or what he had done. Turning the corner, he saw a splendid house, toward which the wife directed her steps and into which they entered, passing into a room that was furnished in a magnificent style. She told him to sit down and make himself contented while she went into another room. The first one who addressed her was her uncle, who asked how she escaped from her room and where she had been. Her only answer was: "Thou fiend in human shape, I allow you just one hour to remove your effects from this house. You hav long deprived me of my property, and meant to through life; but you are frustrated. I am mistress of my own house. I am married, and my husband is here!"

We must leave the newly-married couple for the purpose of giving the history of Mrs. Tudor. She was the only child of a wealthy gentleman, Mr. A——, his daughter's name being Eliza. He had been at great expense in her education, she being the only object of his care, his wife dying when she was quite young. A short time before his death he made a will by which his brother was to hav possession of all his property until his daughter was married, when it was to be given up to her husband, but if she died without marrying, the property was to go to her uncle and his family. After the death of Mr. A——, his brother removed into his house and Eliza boarded in his family. She soon discovered that her uncle did not intend she should ever marry. He shut her up in one of the center rooms in the third story, and refused her associates by telling them, when they called, that she was gone on a journey. The unfortunate girl was thus shut out from the world for three years. Her scanty breakfast happened one morning to be carried to her by her old servant Juan. Seeing the face of her old friend and servant, Eliza burst into tears. Juan well understood the meaning.

"Hush, Eliza! Some of your old servants hav long been planning means for your escape."

"What?" exclaimed Eliza, "is it possible that I am to be delivered from this place?"

It is unnecessary to detail all the minutiæ of the escape. Suffice it to say that on the morning of the fourth day after the interview she made her escape. This was about daylight. She immediately bent her steps to the wharf where the Boston vessel lay.

The amazement of Tudor and transport of his wife at the sudden change of fortune may possibly be conceived, but cannot be expressed.

One pleasant morning, some days after the marriage, the crew of the Boston vessel's attention was drawn to a splendid carriage approaching the wharf. The driver let down the steps, and a gentleman and lady elegantly dressed alighted. The gentleman asked the captain what port he was from, and many other questions, all the time avoiding his scrutiny; at last, turning to the captain, and calling him by name, he said:

"Captain, before leaving your vessel, permit me to make you acquainted with Mrs. Tudor."

The captain and those about him had not recognized him to be their old friend and shipmate Tudor, whom they supposed some fatal accident had befallen. You may judge of the congratulations that followed.

The captain regretted the harsh judgment he had at first passed upon the young lady, but unlike the mate, being a married man, he was spared the added mortification of the latter that he had spurned even to consider so fortunate an offer of marriage.

This remarkable marriage, the bride being snatched from prison walls, as it were, and the groom called from the hard and humble lot of a common sailor, both brought suddenly and unexpectedly to positions of freedom and affluence—has hardly a parallel in all history, The union thus formed proved to be a very happy one. The large fortune that then fell under the activ management of Frederick Tudor was wisely handled and largely increased. In due time Mr. and Mrs. Tudor transferred their residence to Boston.

With shrewd foresight, Mr. Tudor entered largely into the ice business, being the first person to make shipments of ice by sea. His venture was made in 1805, when he sailed himself with a cargo of one hundred and thirty tons, in his own brig to Martinique, West Indies. In 1815 Mr. Tudor obtained the monopoly of the Havana ice business, and important privileges from the Cuban government. In 1817 he introduced the business in Charleston, S. C., the next year in Savannah, and in 1820 into New Orleans. In May, 1833, he sent the first cargo of ice to the East Indies, which was delivered at Calcutta in the autumn of that year. Of the one hundred and eighty tons nearly one-half was wasted in the voyage, and in going up the Ganges. The ice was sold immediately, at no more than half the cost of that prepared by the nativs. In 1834 the first cargo of ice was shipped to Brazil by Mr. Tudor, and until 1836 he had a monopoly of the shipment of ice, but it finally became so large and profitable that others entered into the business from various ports.

Mr. Tudor's foresight secured to Boston the chief position of the Calcutta trade, and gave her ships cargoes for Southern ports, thus reducing the costs of freighting Southern products to the North. The extensiv and valuable Tudor estates in Boston and vicinity, where representativs of the family still reside, are well known. The Tudors hav always been noted for public spirit, intelligence, and refinement, and it was a streak or good luck for more than two that brought about the establishment of the family in America.—Boston Commonwealth.

Superstition.

I was reading an article not long since, which shows how ignorant people are. A gentleman of the name of Joseph Thompson in his recent exploration of Central Africa, made the people believe that he was a great "lybon," or medicin man; claims that it was a better protection to him than an army, and his photographic apparatus and galvanic battery more effectiv than Gatling guns. He told them in his "Through Masai Land," that he was the lybon of the Lajomba; that Mbaratien, their chief lybon, was a fraud in comparison to him. "Now you there," he said, "just look here for a moment and I will show you a thing or two. Gaze on my teeth. Observe how firm they are," and here he tapped them with his knuckles. "You see there is no fraud there. Just wait then till I turn my head. Now look—they are gone." Every one shrank back in intense amazement, and the whole party were on the point of flight. "Once more I turned my head, put matters to rights, and bowing and smiling to my wandering spectators I once more rapped my teeth." He had two false teeth, which to him at this time were perfect treasures. He manipulated them to the astonishment of the Masai, and they hailed him at once as a veritable "lybon n'ebor" (white medicin man). So much for superstition.

Seven Wonders.

The seven wonders of ancient times were the Pyramids of Egypt, the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the Tomb of Mausolos, the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Statue of Zeus by Phidias, and the Pharos of Egypt, or else the Palace of Cyrus, which was cemented with gold.

There are greater wonders in these modern times, and more wonderful wonders than those of antiquity, and in the time to come there will undoubtedly be still greater and more surprising wonders, for the march of mind is ever onward, and there is no limit to the ingenuity of the human brain, yet the skill and patience of those who lived and wrought in earlier times may possibly never be surpassed, if equaled.

The Fireman's Daughter.

In a large school, in which the pupils were assembled, and busily engaged in their work, there was a sudden alarm of fire. As usual, a terrible panic immediately ensued. In wild confusion, and with shrieks and cries, the children darted to the doors of the school-room, forming there a mass so dense as to render escape absolutely impossible to many. In the struggle to get out several of them were seriously injured, and one young lady, a teacher, rushed to an open window and jumped out of it. Throughout this scene of confusion, one girl—one of the best conducted in the school—maintained her self-composure, and remained seated on the bench where she had been when the alarm commenced, without once moving. The color had, indeed, forsaken her face, her lips quivered, and some tears rolled down her cheeks, but not one cry, not one word escaped; and there she sat, silent and motionless as a statue, till all danger was declared to be over. After order had been restored, the question was asked her how it happened that she had been so composed as to sit still when everybody else was in such a fearful state of fright? Her reply was, "My father is a fireman, and he has told me that, if ever there was an alarm of fire in the school, I must sit still. I thought of his words, and did as he desired me; and that was what made me stay quiet."—Tract Magazine.

[We presume it was simply an oversight in The New Thought, in its issue of June 20th, when it printed and neglected to ascribe our story, "What the Fern Said," to "The Story Hour," from whence it was taken, or to The Truth Seeker, in whose columns it originally appeared. It is an old thought that credit should be given where credit is due.—Ed.C.C.].

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

Obituary.

Tuesday, June 30th, our League was called upon to bury an outspoken and activ member in the person of Susan Brady, wife of Peter Brady, who died of congestion of the lungs after less than twenty-four hours' sickness, aged thirty-six years. She was a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I send you an account of the services, and a brief synopsis of the remarks of Captain E. M. Lester, our president, as they may be of assistance to other Leagues on similar occasions, and encourage them to dispense with the services of a priest.

The president of the League stepped to the head of the coffin, and called upon Mrs. King, an intimate friend of the deceased, to read the following Preamble and Resolutions adopted by Friendship Liberal League, at a special meeting held at the house of Mrs. Lulia Steiner, Monday evening, June 29, 1885:

WHEREAS, Death has entered the social circle of Friendship Liberal League, and torn therefrom our beloved sister, associate, and friend, Susan Brady; and

WHEREAS, It is appropriate that this League should giv expression to the sorrow which pervades the whole body of its membership; therefore

Resolved, That the sudden death of one so endeared to us by all the ties of association, friendship, and love has produced in this League a sense of bereavement attested by tearful eyes and swelling hearts; that in the summer of her days, when life was full of joy, and her companionship a priceless treasure, she should be taken from our midst by the grim Destroyer, passes comprehension, and appears too sad almost for contemplation,

Resolved, That, from the fulness of our hearts, our deepest sympathy extends to the stricken relativs, who, in this visitation, hav lost one who was a faithful wife, a loving mother, and a devoted sister.

Resolved. That this League attend the funeral of Mrs. Susan Brady, to take place from her husband's residence, No. 1227 Germantown avenue, on Tuesday, June 30th, at 2 o'clock P.M., and hold such services as may be appropriate for this League and the occasion.

Mr. Lester then spoke in substance as follows:

"Friends, we hav met to perform a duty we owe to a comrade in sorrow, and to commemorate the life and services of one who has left us. We do not, however, thus assemble with any purpose of pomp and display. Such a spirit would contravene the life and teachings of our deceased sister, as well as be foreign to all the objects of our organization.

"It is fitting and proper to erect in Memory's temple a tablet on which we may engrave the virtues of departed friends, proper to thus recognize the worth and social value of a well-spent life, that we may profit by the example and, in a spirit of emulation, strive to be of equal service to our fellow-men.

"At best, with us all, the journey from the cradle to the grave is short. In view of this fact, and the additional uncertainties involved in the many accidents of life, which so hurriedly take from among us those we hav learned to love and rely upon, it behooves us to, at all times, hav the work of life well in hand, to the end that midst the pleasures of life, we may find appropriately interspersed the record of duties faithfully performed.

"Our sister, whose loss we mourn to-day, was frank and candid in all the relations of life, and more than ordinarily hospitable and cordial to friends. As a wife, a model of a patient, faithful helper in providing a competence for the usual wasting years at the sunset of life which she was not destined to see. As a mother, she leaves a monument in the son she has reared so free from all the vices of the age. As a friend and member of society, she was ever ready and willing to aid and oblige.

"A lover of flowers, she scattered them abundantly along the pathway of her life, and the harvest you see in the fragrance that permeates the funeral gloom.

"Speaking for the League and myself, there has been only pleasure in knowing and associating with our deceased sister, and can be but sadness at this sudden parting. How much greater, then, must be the sorrow of the relativs so suddenly bereft, with scarcely a moment's warning!

"The brothers and sisters mourn a circle broken; the son, a fond and thoughtful mother, that all the world cannot replace; the husband, a partner in all the joys and sorrows of life, and a competent helpmeet in all its struggles and triumphs.

"Nature gave us our sister, with qualities and powers that hav borne a rich harvest; but her mission is now completed; and we can only giv her immortality by faithfully enshrining her virtues in our memories and our lives, thus leaving them a rich legacy to all coming generations. 'Tis a sad parting, but no shadow of wrong mingles an element of bitterness with our sorrow."

Longfellow's "Bridge" was then sung by the League choir, followed by an opportunity for three-minute tributes by members. J. C. Hannon and Mr. Jauncy responded. Dr. Fernandzo sang Beethoven's "Farewell;" after which each member took a last farewell and laid in the coffin a small bouquet they had worn during the services. Then followed the usual farewells of other friends and the family.

At the grave the services were very brief, consisting of a few simple words of parting in consigning the body to Mother Earth, whence it came. G. LONGFORD, Secretary.

UNIVERSAL HISTORY
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

Freethinkers will find this, for an outline, history the best for their use, as Professor Cottinger is a Freethinker, and in his reports of the church's actions has stated facts with a truthful freedom not found in ordinary histories. He dates his work from the beginning of historical certainty and not from the mythical Eden, as do most "universal" historians, and brings it down to 1883, with a brief mention of subsequent important inventions and discoveries.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. ALL in a LIFETIME,
A ROMANCE.
BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks. . . . . But what pleased me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type. I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel. Suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached. Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of 'All in a Lifetime.' It will yield a liberal reward for the outlay."

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

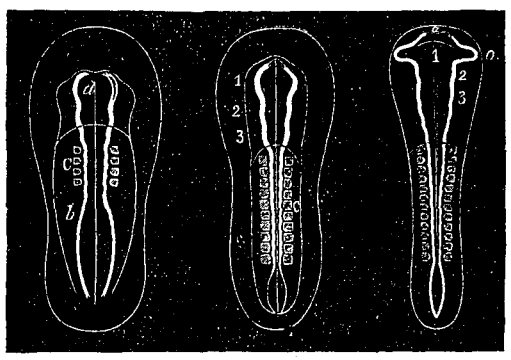
SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE;

OR, THE MYSTERIES OF MAN.

By R. T. TRALL, M. D.,

Carefully Revised and Enlarged Edition. Fully Illustrated.



This work was first published in 1866. Its success has been very great, and it has had a sale in every part of the world where the English language is read. It has become an authority on the subjects of which it treats. In England, in Australia, in New Zealand, in this country, it has been in constant demand since it was first published.

The advance in knowledge has made it desirable to revise the work and incorporate in it new discoveries made during the last 20 years. To this end it has been carefully revised, most of it re-written, several new chapters and a large number of fresh illustrations added, so that it is to-day practically a new book, and far the best of its kind which has yet appeared. It may be relied upon to give most complete knowledge of Sexual Physiology in all it departments.

Among the new chapters may be specially mentioned the one entitled, The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female. In no work is this subject so fully and interestingly treated. The subject matter has been drawn from a great variety of sources. This chapter alone will fully repay for the entire work.

There may be those who think the subject of Sexual Physiology one which should not be studied. There was a time when the subject of anatomy was considered improper, and it was considered unsafe for a man to devote his life to it. That day is past, and the benefits to the world from a knowledge of anatomy have been immense; and the benefits to the race from a perfect knowledge of Sexual Physiology will be far greater; and while we may respect the feelings of those who would never read on this subject, yet we must insist that it is one of the noblest studies, and brings one nearer than any other to the Creative Power, and one which, thoughtfully investigated, tends to make man wiser and better.

The illustrations in this work are 111 in number, and will greatly aid the reader by making everything plain and clear. No work of its kind has ever been so profusely illustrated; see samples in this adverisement.

The following are some the titles of the chapters: The Origin of Life; The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female; Pregnancy: Embryology; Parturition; Lactat on; The Law of Sex; Regulation of the Number of Offspring; Hereditary Transmission; Sexual Hygiene, etc., etc.

The price of the work is $2.00 by mail, post paid.

Something for Invalids to read and stud over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

THEOLOGY is no more the same thing as religion than writing or reading a chemical treatis about food is the same thing as eating it. But this is how the name of religion is brought into unmerited disrepute with Freethinkers; it is confounded with theology. We cannot accurately speak of the Christian, or Jewish, or Mohammedan religion. Religion is one and the same in every human breast; it is the Christian, Jewish, and Mohammedan theologies that differ. And in this most unfortunate confusion of terms lies one of the sources of that disastrous confusion and abuse of things embodied in the word priestcraft—an abuse which has done, and even now continues to do, little less probably, in the way of obstruction to general prosperity and happiness, than is accomplished by the most lawless crime.—Dalton's Religion and Priestcraft.

IF the main sanctions of morality are those of a future state, and if it is Christians alone who feel anything approaching to an assurance of such a state, surely morality must come with somewhat weak credentials to the rest of mankind. And Locke doubtless believed this to be the case. But then, if this be so, Christians ought to be prepared to tolerate a much lower morality than their own in dealing with men of other faiths—one of the many inconvenient consequences which result from founding morality on a theological basis.—Fowler's Locke.

EVERY idea must hav its influence on morals; whether that influence will be good or evil, cannot be determined by any foresight, least of all by the prejudices of those who do not hold that idea, who hate it, and hav not impartially studied its bearings. Many of the best books in the world hav been pronounced immoral and wicked in their time and after it; and if the average commonplace of any period, as represented by judges that know only precedents, and jurors instructed by them, be allowed to suppress all thoughts and works that do not merely respect the prevailing notions, all inquiry is at an end and all progress paralyzed.—M. D. Conway.

THE safety of life is this, to examin everything all through, what it is itself, what is its material, what the formal past; with all thy soul to do justice and to say the truth. What remains except to enjoy life by joining one good thing to another so as not to leave even the smallest intervals between?—M. A. Antoninus.

WHAT blessings thy free bounty givs,
Let me not cast away;
For God is paid when man receives:
To enjoy is to obey. —Pope.

MRS. L. M. CHILD was no Materialist herself, but Spiritualist in the highest sense, giving God-speed to Spiritualism in its candid investigations, abhorring aught in it of trick and, while encouraging it in its explorations and convinced it was not all imposture, not subscribing its creeds. She believed in and adored the Supreme One, would sometimes call him Father, and doubted not his righteousness, but professed no assurance, in the church sense, about the forms or details of a future life. She said, some months before her decease, "I think, but do not know, there is for us a future state."—Dr. C. A. Bartol. [In this modest judgment Mrs. Child showed herself much more of a philosopher than Theodore Parker did when he answered the question "Do you really think that you are to liv forever?" "Think, sir, I know it." Such arrant dogmatism might be pardoned in Dr. Johnson, but in no one else.—Hylax.]

LIBERTY means that every individual is left perfectly free to follow his own will, to pursue his own objects in his own fashion, with no limit whatsoever imposed upon him by others; this complete freedom being bounded only by the equally complete freedom of every one of his neighbors. Nothing less than this is liberty; nothing more than this is possible. This liberty is the birth-right of every man and of every woman. The right to life comes from the fact of birth; and life implies something more than mere existence; it implies the right to exercise every physical and every mental faculty, to grow, to develop, to become perfect.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

PEOPLE will always differ from one another about religion and carry on constant strife and war, until the right of every one to perfect liberty in these matters is conceded, and they can be united in one body by a bond of mutual charity.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

THE pulpiteers insult the conscience and intelligence of their hearers and of the age when they tell, with a long face, the old scare-crow fables which nobody believes, and teach dogmas and expound miracles which the average intelligence of a child rejects at sight.—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE simple precept, Seek the truth, respect the truth, speak the truth, and liv the truth, is one without which no character can be perfect; and it is one which will make a character for a man, though he never read a line of theology, never listened to a single sermon, never entered the portals of a church.—J. G. Holyoake.

TO a man truly virtuous nothing is so hateful as a hypocrit.—Pope.

IF I hav spoken with bitterness, let it be recollected that my subjec is hypocrisy.—Coleridge.

BEWARE ye of the leaven of the Pharisees which is hypocrisy.—Jesus.

WHAT man so wise, what earthly witt so ware,
As to descry the crafty, cunning traine
By which Deceipt doth maske in visor faire,
And cast her colors died deepe in graine,
To seem like Truth, whose shape she well can faine,
And fitting gestures to her purpose frame
The guiltlesse man with guilt to entertaine?
—Spenser.

THERE is a moral phenomenon more prevalent than we are apt to suspect, and that is the existence, in the same understanding, of two opinions mutually destructiv without any consciousness of their incompatibility.—Bailey's Pursuit of Truth.

Odds and Ends.

THE man who all the long, long day
From church to church is running,
On Monday morning finds his brain
Almost devoid of cunning.

"BRACE up!" whispered the hangman to a poor fellow whose hempen cravat he was skilfully adjusting. "Yes, it's easy for you to say that," was the grim reply, "because you are a suspender."

DIGGER Indians say that food is more plentiful this summer than it has been at any time since 1868, but this should not be attributed to a change in the administration. Digger Indians eat the seventeen-year locusts.

A BOY in one of the public schools, while engaged in defining words a few days since, made a mistake that was not a mistake. He said: "A demagog is a vessel that holds beer, wine, gin, whisky, or any other kind of intoxicating liquor."

"WE hav held a consultation," said a doctor to his patient, "but we are unable to agree as to the exact nature of your disease. Three of the physicians are of one opinion, while I am of another." "But, doctor, how will the matter be settled?" "Oh, the autopsy will show who knows best."

AT the meeting of the New England Baptist Missionary Convention, Rev. H. N. Jeter pronounced ice-cream "a demoralizing substance." It is inferred that after Rev. Mr. Jeter and his ladies ate their cream, he made the startling discovery that he had left his pocket-book at home in his other trousers' pocket.

"Now, whither may you be bound this beautiful Sunday morning, my pretty little girl?" said the benevolent old gentleman. "Please, sir, I'm going to church, to hear my grandfather preach." "Ah! indeed; that's pleasant. And who may your grandfather be, my good little girl?" "Please, sir, he's Thomas Harrison, 'the boy preacher.'" "Oh, ah, yes; I used to hear about him when I was a boy."

OLD Mrs. Bennington: "Did ye find out how Mrs. Brown is gettin' on? I heard she's very sick." Old Mr. Bennington: "I saw the doctor as he was drivin along to-day, an' he said she shuffled off a mortal coil last night. I s'pose it'll do her good to get rid of it." Old Mrs. Bennington: "Drat these new-fangled doctors, they can't talk nothin' but Latin. The poor soul may be worse. I'll try an' git over there myself this afternoon."

"I UNDERSTAND the old man doesn't want you to come to see his daughter," said one young man to another. "That's the state of the case, but I went all the same." "No?" "Yes. Was there last night." "Did he kick?" "Some." "Much?" "Well, no, not a great deal," was the hesitating reply; "that is, not as much as he might hav done. He only kicked me from the parlor to the front door, and I went the balance of the way myself."

WHOSE eyes upon me love are beaming?
Whose eyes with truth are ever gleaming?
Who gave to me his honest heart?
Who's free from artifice and art?
Who cometh at my beck and call?
Who singles me from each and all?
Who follows me like a faithful shade?
Who now before my feet is laid?
Who seeks my hand with kisses warm?
Who'd safe defend me from all harm?
Who'd giv his life my own to save?
The little mongrel dog I hav.

IN a poem called "The Organist," we are informed that "He sits him down at twilight hour, Before the ivory keys, And lets his fingers wander o'er, The clavier as they please. . . . Though dark and still the empty church, An angel flits o'erhead, And, passing near, with drooping wings, He leaves the player—dead." That angel should not weary in his good work. Sometimes when a man is clawing the ivory keys the neighbors want to hurl a brick at him, but they would be satisfied if an angel would hover over him and leave him dead. The angel should also hover o'er the amateur flute-player, the cornetist, the accordion fiend, and other musical aggravations.

THE Crow and the Hare.—A Crow and a Hare met by chance one day, and were so well Pleased with each other that it was Agreed to form a Partnership. "The first thing in order," remarked the Crow, "is to select a Home, which will, of course, belong to both of us. Hav you got your eye on any particular Tree?" "Tree!" echoed the Hare, "why, we want a Burrow, of course." "Burrow! but I can't liv in a Hole!" "And I can't Climb a Tree!" "If you didn't intend to Consult my Wishes, why did you Propose this Partnership?" "And if you weren't ready to giv way in these little Matters, why Accept my Proposals." They were hotly Disputing and Abusing each other, when the Fox came along, and, being Appealed to for his Opinion, he said: Moral—"My Friends, while you are both wrong, you hav still exhibited rare Judgment. The Human Family alone are Fools enough to Marry first and Quarrel over their likes and dislikes and Nature's Incongruities afterward."

MAN'S TROUBLES.

Man that is married to a woman is of many days and full of trouble.
In the morning he draws his salary and in the evening,
Behold, it is gone!
It is a tale that is told:
It is vanished, and no man knows whither it goeth.
He riseth up clothed in the chilly garments
Of the night.
And seeketh the somnolent paregoric,
Wherewith to soothe his infant posterity.
He cometh as a horse or ox,
And draweth the chariot of his offspring.
He speedeth the shekels in the purchase of fine linen
To cover the bosom of his family;
Yet himself is seen at the gates of the city
With one suspender.
Yea, he is altogether wretched.

Notes and Clippings.

A GEORGIA man tried to cut the cords in the feet of his daughter, so that she could not imperil her soul by dancing.

"WHENEVER you get near enough to an Indian, shoot him," was the remark made by a man reported to be an "activ Christian worker" in one of the churches of Chicago.

WHENEVER a new and startling fact is brought to light in science, the church first says, "It is not true;" then that "it is contrary to religion;" and, lastly, "that everybody knew it before," and it is an argument in favor of Christianity.

As a result of religious excitement now prevalent at Carnesville, Ga., J. T. N. Hancock has been seized with queer lunacy. He imagins that he is John the Baptist, and has just been beheaded by Herod, and is clamoring for the return of his head.

THE population of Europe has increased in a century from 145,000,000 to 350,000,000. Englishmen hav multiplied five-fold, the Russians four-fold, and the Germans less than three-fold, while Frenchmen and Spaniards hav added only about 50 per cent.

THE New York prison officials are being hauled over the coals because they force convicts to attend one sort of preaching all the time. A murderer belonging to one denomination doesn't want to sit through a sermon by a preacher of another, and the officers ought to know it.—Detroit Free Press.

FROM Paris it is reported that the most important issue in the coming general elections in France will be the religious question. This fact is generally recognized, it is said, and the Pope and Cardinal Guibert, archbishop of Paris, are directing all their efforts to prevent a result which would culminate in the separation of church and state in France. It is said that a very large number of Catholics in France favor separation as valuable to the cause of liberty of Catholic action.

PROFESSOR BRIGGS makes an attack, in the Presbyterian Review, on the revised version of the Old Testament. He holds a chair of Hebrew in a leading theological seminary. He charges that the revisers hav slavishly followed the Jewish Masoretic text, instead of seeking to secure, as did the New Testament revisers, a correct text; and that they hav proved themselves incompetent, from their ignorance of Hebrew grammar to translate correctly the text as they hav received it.

THE Marquis of Salisbury, England's new premier, replying to a letter from Glasgow asking his views on the proposal to disestablish the Church of Scotland, declares his opposition to the movement. He contends that the established church secures to all districts regular ministrations of religion, which, he says, is "so necessary to the public welfare." Probably Lord Salisbury has heard this cant phrase repeated so many times that he thinks he believes it. It is not true, and never was. Further, all good people must hope that the community will never become so depraved that the adoption of Christian "morality," as exemplified by many of its shining lights, will tend to public welfare.

A BOSTON legal authority says that the young lady who has been jilted has the right to read the recreant's letters in her breach of promis suit, but she must not weave them into a novel and copyright them. That privilege belongs to the gentleman. She may, however, demand the return of her own letters as her property. This is not the popular idea, but there hav been many decisions. George Washington kept copies of his letters, and bequeathed them to his nephew, who had them published. A compiler of another biography of Washington copied them. There was a lawsuit. The judge said that Washington did not part with the ownership by sending the letters to his correspondents, and he declared this doctrin to be applicable to all letters, whether of literary value or not.

THE Salvationists of Schenectady, N. Y., are a rare lot of scamps. At a recent meeting one of them got up and said that he was a devoted Christian. A gentleman who knew him rose and told the enthusiast that "the Lord didn't love anybody who didn't pay his grocery bills." This declaration caused so much excitement that the speaker could not go on, and the order was given to sing. This hushed the discussion for a brief time. When the next man in the little band arose, he said that for all the riches of the world he would not exchange his happiness since he had become converted. At this the same dissenter remarked that any man who felt so good ought to pay a bill of $55.20. This was too much for the Salvationists. They marched to their barracks, followed by a disorderly crowd.

THE El Paso Times says: Some of those Boston excursionists are very irreverent and will go to "sheol" yet, if they don't look out Some of those who passed through here on their way to the City of Mexico seem to hav given offense to our pious and religious neighbors over the river. At least one of the most influential papers of the republic complains as follows: "At Paso del Norte some of them chipped off pieces of the church to see what it was made of, and shook hands with the figure of the Virgin Mary. At other places they walked into houses and looked about as if they were ancient ruins, without asking permission or saying a word to the inmates." It is plain that excessiv culture of the Boston brand and Paso del Norte simplicity and unaffectedness don't go very well together.

FOND papa (proudly displaying the accomplishments of his six-year-old boy to the visiting clergyman): "Now, Tommy, tell the gentleman what you would like to be, when you grow up to be a great, big man." Tommy (pointing to the distinguished visitor): "I'd like to be a minister like him." Visiting clergyman (greatly gratified): "Ah, my young friend, you would like to be a clergyman like me, would you? And now tell me, why would you like to be a clergyman like me." Tommy (promptly): "'Cause I heard pa say yesterday that you had the softest job of any man he knew. Nothing to do but talk an hour every Sunday, liv free on the members of the congregation, and be worshiped like a little tin god on wheels by all the women in the parish."—Somerville Journal.

THE folly of the present system in England of selecting jurors by a religious test is shown by the following from the London Truth: "When the jury was about to be sworn in the case of De Worms against Hughes, one of them asked the clerk to swear him on an Old Testament, and, in answer to an inquiry as to the reason, explained that he was a Jew. A hurried consultation took place, and the Jew was ordered to leave the box. Baron de Worms got his verdict, and, to my mind, most properly; but are we to understand that, in case of a Jew and a Christian going to law, the latter is to be allowed to exclude all Jews from the jury. How would it be if the Jew were to insist upon the exclusion of all Christians? This would reduce us to juries of Infidels, and, if I am not mistaken, they, too, would be excluded if they declined to swear, or if they stated that an oath had no meaning for them."

IT is a matter of official record that at the funeral of the pastor of the church in Ipswich, Mass., 200 years ago, there were consumed one barrel of wine and two barrels of cider, while the mourners at the funeral of a Boston clergyman's wife about the same time required "above fifty gallons of wine." A century later, about the time of the Revolution, a New England church had a pastor who was often the worse for liquor, even in the pulpit, and once, at least, at the communion table; but although successiv councils were called to consider his case, the neighboring clergymen stood by him, and he held his place till his death. It was doubtless a fellow-feeling which made his brethren of the cloth so kind, for the Rev. Dr. Leonard Woods, a clergyman who died only thirty years ago, said that he remembered when he could reckon up among his own acquaintances no less than forty ministers who were intemperate.

A RADICAL Socialist entered a fashionable restaurant in Paris and ordered a sumptuous dinner. "How is this?" said a brother Communist, who approached him. "Ah, my friend," said the champion of frugality and economy, "I am now about to giv myself some idea of the vile existence of the infamous rich classes who hav the heart to feast sumptuously while citizens are starving." "And I, too," said the other, "hav come here with precisely the same intention." So they united their appetites, and gained a crushing victory over the aristocratic meal.

A MINISTER in Cleveland rode to church last Sabbath on a bicycle. As he swept up to the sacred edifice, a large Newfoundland dog, belonging to the senior deacon, came lumbering out to greet the pastor. The bicycle struck the dog on the head under a full head of steam and run him down with a shock that could be plainly felt with the naked eye. The reverend gentleman took a header, and jammed his silk hat down over his ears so tight that he had to crawl through it to get out of it. The scattered leaves of a seven-headed sermon flew around the avenue like a theological snowstorm. The dog made Rome howl with his wails, and attracted a crowd of 300 people. The parson's coat was split down the back, and his trousers ripped across the knees. He pinned up the knees, and had to wear a pepper and salt sack coat the sexton loaned him. When he appeared in the pulpit in this garb the congregation smiled, and when he announced his text, 2 Kings, xii, 6, "But it was so . . . the priest had not repaired the breaches—," there wasn't a dry eye in the conventicle.—King's County Wheelman.

THE Chicago Tribune says: "Pain must necessarily be created in all proper minds by the news from Upper Guinea, Africa. The fact that Prince Allagogha, lately converted to Christianity, so far forgot himself as to kill a few offending villagers and eat them, must create distrust in the thoroughness of some of our missionaries. The man who, feeling for a dime when the contribution-box goes around in church, and, finding only a quarter, has to drop that in, consoles himself for the munificence of his gift by the reflection that it will do more good than a dime, anyhow; but if we cannot rely on our missionaries—if when they convert a heathen they cannot do a good, workman-like job—what use is there in supporting them? That Prince Allagogha should hav killed a lot of villagers is bad, but that he should hav also eaten them is shocking, and proves his conversion to hav been of the slouchiest and most superficial kind. Missionaries cannot afford to put such goods as this on the market. It won't do. The conversion of a thoroughly-bad, all-wool heathen like Allagogha must be something substantial, something which, like Bertha Ricci's kiss in 'Apajune,' goes clear through and buttons at the back."

ACCORDING to information given to the Christian Union by a large number of clergymen, not more than five per cent of American artisans in cities attend religious services of any kind. All but two of the letters say that the attendance is diminishing, and all but one that the neglect is not from unbelief in Christianity. The cause of non-church attendance, as given by these experts, may be summed as follows: The men hav to work all the week, and they recreate on Sunday. They cannot dress as well as those with whom they must associate, and therefore stay away. They think secret societies are as good as the church. They are unable to pay for the privileges, because of the high price of things which they must hav. The large salaries of the ministers disgust some. Some feel that the minister is a hireling, and therefore seeks to upbuild his church as a doctor seeks to increase his practice, not from love of souls, but to increase his salary. Some employers of labor are so bad in their treatment of their employees that the men do not want to go where they shall meet those in whose real Christianity they hav so little faith. All the letters indicate that, especially in the large places, artisans feel that they are not welcome in churches ffequented by the wealthier classes.

News of the Week.

THE czar has extended peaceful assurances to England.

THE car shops at Norwood, Conn., were burnt Sunday. Loss, $200,000.

GENERAL GRANT'S physicians state that their patient is daily growing weaker.

CHOLERA continues epidemic in Spain. The daily death rate is between 600 and 700.

THERE were 208 deaths reported in this city in the twenty-four hours ending at noon last Monday.

THE weather during the past week has been unnecessarily hot. Some days it sent the thermometer up to 99° in the shade.

JOHN ROACH, the ship builder, has made an assignment. His failure is supposed to be due to the withdrawal of government patronage.

THE excursion party of Mexican editors are in the Eastern states. They are receiving considerable notice from members of the press.

THE yacht Genesta has come over from England to try and win the American cup. She is 90 feet over all, and of 81 tons measurement.

A LOUISVILLE clergyman wishes all the clergy of New York to pray at once for General Grant. These ministers seem to learn nothing from experience.

THE Northern Cheyenne Indians, according to reports received at Fort Keogh, Mont., are on the warpath, and encounters between them and cowboys hav taken place.

BISHOP LOUGHLIN, of the Long Island diocese, is having a new house built in Brooklyn. Sixty thousand dollars hav already been expended in its construction, and it is not nearly finished.

A REPORT from Rome says: "A madman has been arrested at San Dona, near Venice, on the charge of kidnapping. He confesses that he has stolen and eaten a number of children, because he was starving."

AT Baltimore, last Sunday, thirty eight young ladies took the nun's veil. and vowed to be eternally poor, chaste, and obedient to the Catholic church. Their conduct is attributable to idiocy, insanity, and superstition.

A MAN who calls himself Bishop McNamara has a following in this city who call themselvs Independent Catholics. They oppose Roman Catholicism. A half-dozen new converts to this peculiar sect were baptized by the bishop in Harlem last Sunday.

SEVERAL American applicants for admission into the Bachelors' Club, a high-toned London association, hav recently been black-balled. Since the Pall Mall Gazette's exposure of immoralities in English aristocratic circles the Americans may construe this action of the Bachelors' Club into a compliment.

WILLIAM E. DODGE, of New York, has brought suit in the Atlanta, Ga., courts to eject seventy-five land holders in that state. Several thousand acres of land are involved, and Mr. Dodge claims to own nearly a whole county. This is the Dodge who has lost his reputation in this city by backing Anthony Comstock.

THE London Secularists hav a cricket club, and indulge in that game on Sunday in the Abbey meadows. They hav been mobbed once or twice by the Christians, who regard rioting as more godly than cricket, and some of the players hav received severe injuries, but they express a determination to play again. There is no law to prevent Sunday cricket-playing in London.

THE Rev. Mr. S. I. Prime is dead. He was editor of the New York Observer, in which capacity it is probable that he uttered more slanders about Freethinkers—from Thomas Paine to D M. Bennett—than any other man with the same amount of intelligence could hav done. He belonged to that generation of unscrupulous religious bigots which, happily, is fast passing away. His works were not good, and it is hoped they may follow him. He had attained the age of seventy-two years.

Communications.

Napoleon I. a Freethinker and Reformer.

It is a fact, well established in history, that all the great men who accomplished great changes in political affairs, as often as these changes were of a progressiv character, and were of practical benefit to humanity, were Freethinkers. Churchmen know this to be so, and they therefore attempt to pervert or hide the real facts, covering up their misstatements in apparent praise pleasing to their kindred.

The history of the United States furnishes two illustrious instances of the correctness of this assumption, in Washington and Lincoln.

It may not be without interest to Agnostics to hav reintroduced to them evidence for the stated assumption with regard to other great men, or with regard to men having accomplished great results.

To introduce such evidence concerning Napoleon I., I am induced by Mr. Elliott Preston's sympathetic appeal in "Bonaparte's Defense."* But Mr. Preston failed in not stating the real causes for which Freethinkers should consider Napoleon Bonaparte as a hero also in the field of human intellect and progress, as he undoubtedly was on the battlefield. Not sooner did General Bonaparte accede to any influence on political matters than he at once made work to lay the legislativ ax to the root of the evil under which the people of France had been suffering almost since the conquest by Roman consuls—to their civil law, which privileged the nobles and priests, and suppressed the citizens and peasants. The jus primae noctis was not the only outrage on humanity, decency, family, and morals sanctioned under the old French law. The lettre cachet system as well as torture were sanctioned by this law, and the people of France were then living under the same laws as royalty had developed them, although their more hideous features had been practically abolished by the Revolution.

The main effect of laws and legal procedure established and grown under a despotical government was then in France the same as it is under the same law this day in the United States, namely, that he who had more money could always beat his neighbor, having less money, out of his rights and property. The only difference between the two otherwise analogical cases consisted in the fact that the people of France had not acquiesced in this state of affairs, felt a moral repugnance at this state of its laws, and had revolted against it; while in the people of the United States there is no such feeling except in the victims, and it is generally assumed that it would be preposterous on the part of a man of limited means, or of a poor man, to attempt to find redress in law for any outrage in person or property he has suffered at the hands of a rich individual or corporation.

In practice the state of affairs was less intolerable in France then than it is on this continent at present, because in France the oppressing nobility and clergy were people of refined manners, having a good deal of regard for outward decency, while in the United States wealth and control of legal procedure and adjudication are in the hands of people lacking not only refinement, but even almost all regard to decency, because our moral standard tells us that money covers up shame, wrong, and crime of all or any descriptions. In France the state of affairs had been brought about by the monarchical institutions, and had been fostered by the privileged classes under the eager co-operation on the part of the law profession, who then understood, as it does now, how to bury justice and good common sense under misapplied cases of precedence, and to drown right in a sea of procedure and formalities.

On this continent our grandfathers revolted against the monarchs, but their laws, cutting into their daily lives, and degrading their morals slowly but surely, they maintained.

Bonaparte codified civil, commercial, and criminal law, and created a new and simple procedure in civil, commercial, and criminal cases, made the law uniform over all the land he ever ruled over, made thus the provisions of law and practice of courts a matter of public information and knowledge, and the property of the people, and thus killed off a monopoly which, until then, had sustained a class worse than the augurs of Rome and the priests of France—a class of vampires feeding on the very heart's blood of the people, the lawyers, and reduced them to a class which has to work like other laborers to make an honest living, the law regulating their maximal fees and their duties.

Washington did not dare to interfere with this dangerous brotherhood, and the consequence is that we hav no English queen on this continent, but we are governed in all our civil and commercial rights and criminal jurisdiction by English cases of precedents. We maintain a law where the rich can beat the poor out of all his property without cause whatever, if he so chooses, by alleging constructiv trust, or by some other contrivance getting the coveted property only in the hands of a receiver, who will, before the case is adjudged, sell it to the rich man's agent—a law which, because royalty has considered womanhood vile and venal, has by case of precedence no punishment for the blackguard who applied vile, venomous names to your wives and daughters unless they can prove special damages to themselvs.

We hav no Bonaparte to take the curse of common law and common law practice away from us, and history has no instance yet where such an immense revolutionary measure, such a progress of humanity and human welfare, came from the people itself. Tyrants alone, Freethinkers alone, hav achieved such deeds, hav forced the benefit on the stupid, helpless masses of humanity.

Will a reformer like Bonaparte ever come to this continent? Or will the people wake up to see their disgrace in living on under royal enactments of several hundred years ago governing their household affairs, while in political matters they hav been independent now for over a hundred years, but hav suffered them to be corrupted and assimilated to the royal institutions still governing their property and individual relations?

It is thus that at the hands of the law confraternity corrupt juries are created, perjurers are manipulated as the tools for undermining right, justice, and morals, the people feeding meanwhile this costly confraternity with its life-blood, and bathing the confraternity's feet in the sweat of its brows, the result of hard labor in keeping up their own and their children's lives. If ever people needed a reformer like Bonaparte in this matter of law, court practices, and arrogance of the class of legal practitioners, this American people does, and well we may look at the hero who did for the French nation what no one did for us.

I hav no French history of Napoleon I., and therefore I must refer to an Englishman's book, redundant on almost every page with national hatred to the hero. But this is an advantage almost, because then there will be less cause to doubt what good he may hav to say about their great enemy. In Charles Macfarlane's "Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" we find the following (pp. 215–217):

"The compilation of a new code of laws for France was an important undertaking of Bonaparte's consulship. In the year 1800, soon after his accession to political power he appointed a commission composed of some distinguished civilians under the presidency of the second consul, Cambaceres (who had received a legal education), to frame a civil code which should be comprehensiv and clear, and suited to the changes which had taken place in France. In the eighteenth century this country had possessed a number of very eminent jurists, and the school was not quite extinct when the Revolution began. Tronchet, Bigot de Presmeneau, Portalis, and Malleville, members of the present committee, had studied in it, and might be called distinguished French lawyers. They supplied the knowledge in which the first consul was deficient; and it appears that if they were at times aided by his great natural sagacity, they were as often impeded by his wilfulness and obstinacy in error. They framed the project of a code which was printed early in 1801. Copies were sent to the higher law courts of France, which were requested to make their observations upon it, these observations and suggestions being likewise printed, the whole being laid before the section of the legislation in the council of state composed of Boulay, Roederer, Thibaudeau, Portalis, and three others of name and note. Bonaparte and Cambaceres attended most of the sittings of the section in which the various heads of the projected code were discussed. Occasionally Bonaparte took a very activ part in the debate, not, indeed, on technicalities which he did not understand, but on general principles, concerning which he went on discussing, in his usual off-hand way, sometimes expressing sensible and acute remarks, and at other times wandering away from the subject for the sake of illustrating it. (He took an especial part in the discussion concerning the law of divorce.) After passing the Council of State the various titles of the civil code was laid before the Tribunate, where some of the clauses met with a warm opposition. At length the whole code passed both the Tribunate and the legislativ body, and was promulgated in 1804 by the name of 'Code Civil des Francais.' After the consul became emperor it was called 'Code Napoleon.'"

The general object and arrangement of the code resemble those of the institutions of Justinian, defining the civil right of the civilized, with their legal relation to each other. And it rather minutely prescribes laws concerning persons, and laws concerning property.

"'A Code de Procedure Civil,' defining the forms of civil process, and the practice of the courts, was framed likewise by a commission, and became law in 1807. Bonaparte took little or no part in this discussion. The 'Code d'Instruction Criminelle,' or of proceedings in criminal cases, was promulgated in 1808. While it was under discussion, Bonaparte showed himself very unfavorable to the institution of trial by jury.* Two years after this came the 'Code Penal,' or laws defining crimes and punishments, in which many of the provisions are certainly harsh, and savor of despotism." †

A commercial code, perhaps the best of these French codes, completed the number. These are sometimes called the "Five Codes," as having been all published in Bonaparte's time. He likewise produced a military code, in the construction of which he was more at home." ‡

What the Englishman refers to as "wilfulness and obstinacy in error" on the part of Bonaparte will be found in the records of these deliberations, which many years ago I had an occasion to read up, to hav been the obstinate firmness in supporting Liberal views, amongst others the one holding that the best protection for women is the knowledge that they would hav to bear themselvs the consequences of improper conduct, and the consequent provision of the Code Civil, "La recherche de la paternite est interdite," of which common law had not known, leaving the doors open to extortion by bad women without protecting the decent ones—a provision which resulted, as shown by the statistics of fifty years and more, that there are less bastards in France than in any other European country.

Bonaparte's opposition to trial by jury was limited to political offenses—an opposition well justified when the peasantry of France at heart was yet royalist. But Bonaparte then already attempted to secure a higher standard of juries to France than this republic boasts of at present by securing limitation in the selection of jurymen by the amount of taxes paid—a limitation valid until this day in France, and protecting it against Cincinnati's occurrences, for which there is now so frequent cause on this continent.

While with us the educated classes take no part as jurors in the administration of justice, but buy off, in some states, with ten dollars per annum, their duty to do so, leaving this duty to the poor and easily corrupted part of the population, and in some cases, as here in New York, to political court-runners and professional fee-hunters, the function of juror is an honorary one, which the law bestows on those only who carry the burden of the cost of administering justice.

The Code Napoleon is valid to-day, not only in France, but in Spain, Mexico, Cuba, Belgium, Holland, the Prussian Rhenish provinces, Louisiana, etc., and the deep sympathy of the people living in these countries for the memory of Napoleon I. is due, not to his victories, but to his laws.

This reminds me that New Mexico has, under Federal rule, been robbed of its Code Napoleon; that by some stroke of legal escamotage or legerdemain this territory has been subjected to the abominable provisions of common law, and to the oppressiv rule of lawyers in place of the well established and well-liked code the people had when General Kearney drove out the handful of Mexican officials forming its cheap administration and government in 1847, instituting therefor a government which since has furnished the bounties with which Washington politicians paid off returning board services, and other services of similar description.

When in 1869 Castillo, then Spanish governor of Cuba, as he is now, once more attempted to do the same as our officials had done in New Mexico, namely, attempted only to abolish their Liberal code of 1812, the Cubans revolted. They hav tolerated political tyranny, but they were not willing to tolerate tyranny in their civil and criminal laws and procedure.

So enthusiastic is the adherence of even the German people to these Napoleonic laws, that when the Prussian government attempted to abolish them even that meek, subdued, pleasure-addicted, jovial people living along the border of the Rhine showed so much fight, and did indeed growl to such an extent, that the Prussian government, then not having a Bismarck, withdrew from the attempt.

Bonaparte's glory was the enthusiastic love of the people of half the European continent, at his lifetime, for the hero was as much, if not more, the result of his action as a reformer, than of his victories on the battle-field. The reforming of the laws governing the lives of individuals and families; the making equal of all before the law; the abolishing of the odious privileges of hereditary nobility, and of an arrogant, overbearing clergy; the regulating of the relation between the people and the courts of law and lawyers, not only by codifying the civil, commercial, and criminal laws, but by creating codes of procedure—these reforms are the solid bases for Bonaparte's "gloire," and the criterions for his real greatness. He created order where he found a chaos. This should never be forgotten. And this great reformer also was a Freethinker, and as such only could be what he has been.

In evidence thereof I refer to the same source to Bonaparte's fanatic enemy, Macfarlane, pp. 191:

"Bonaparte calculated that, by fostering the Catholic religion and entering into terms with the head of the church of Rome, he should detach the pope from the coalition of sovereigns, and the priests of France from the royalists. 'It is indispensable,' said he, 'to hav a religion for the people, and equally so that that religion should be directed by the government. At present fifty bishops in the pay of England direct the French clergy. We must destroy that influence; we must declare the Catholic the established religion of France, as it is the faith of the majority of the French people; we must recognize the constitution of the church. The First Consul will appoint the fifty bishops—the pope will induct them. The bishops will appoint the parish priests, and the people will pay their salaries. They must all take the oath of fidelity. The refractory must be transported. The pope, in grateful return, will confirm our sales of the church property. He will consecrate the revolution. The people will sing, "God save the Gallican church." For this some will call me a papist.

* April 12, 1884, of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

* This is an English mistatement, the opposition being restricted to political crimes, and to the qualification of jurors.

† The severest punishment fell on crimes against public property, and property in trust of the people.

‡ This military code legally opened the road of promotion in the army to the entire people, while under the French kings it had been open to the nobility exclusivly. The military educational institutions had a most severe disciplin, and soldiers, not military dudes, were educated there, but advancement remained open to all who distinguished themselvs in service. It was not a Napoleonic institution to exclude the common soldier from advancement, as this is the practice in the North American army.

I am no such thing. I am no believer in particular creeds; but as to the idea of a God, look to the heavens and say, Who made that?'" (Compare Madame de Stael's Considerations.)

These were words uttered in council. In private he said: "I am convinced that a good part of France would become Protestant, especially if I were to favor that disposition. But I am also certain that a still greater portion of those who hav any rel'gion at all would remain Catholic, and would oppose with the greatest zeal and fervor the schism of their fellow-citizens. I dread these religious quarrels, which hav been so terrible in France. I dread the family dissensions and the public distractions which a change to Protestantism would inevitably occasion. In reviving a religion which has always been dominant in the country, and in giving the liberty of exercising their worship to the minority, I shall satisfy every one without establishing a church separate from that of Rome. I will be the head of the church in France. . . . In every country religion is useful to the government, and those who govern ought to avail themselvs of it in order to maintain their influence over mankind. I was a Mohammedan in Egypt; I am a Catholic in France. With relation to the police of a state religion, it ought to be entirely in the hands of the sovereign. Many persons urge me to found a separate Gallican church; but before I can resolve to any such measures the old pope must push matters to extremities. But I believe he will never do that." His secretary reminded him that Cardinal Gonsalvi had said, "The pope will do all the first consul desires." "This is the best course he can take," rejoined Bonaparte; "he must not suppose that he has to do with an idiot. What do you think is the point his negotiations put most forward? The immortal salvation of my soul! But with me immortality only means the recollection one leaves in the memory of man. That idea prompts me to great actions. It would be better for a man never to hav lived than to leave behind him no trace of his existence" (from notes by Bonaparte's private secretary, Bourrienne).

He, however, continued through life to declare that he was no Materialist; that he believed at least in the existence of a God, or some first, great Cause; and wishing at this moment to appear to believe more than he did, he was exceedingly wroth with Salande, who, while he was negotiating his concordat with the pope, wished to insert his name in a biographical dictionary of illustriousAtheists(Bourrienne). During these negotiations he endeavored to elicit the sentiments of several of the councillors of state on the subject of religion and a national church. Thibaudeau reports a remarkable conversation which he had with one of the councillors, most probably with Thibaudeau himself:

"On the 2d Prairial the councillor of state N— dined at Malmaison. After dinner the first consul took him alone into the grounds, and led the conversation to the subject of religion. He spoke at length against the various systems of the philosophers, on Deism, on natural religion, etc. 'All that,' said he, 'is nothing but ideology.' He repeatedly called Garat the leader of the ideologists. 'Hear me,' he said; 'I was walking about this solitary spot last Sunday evening; everything was silent, when the sound of the bell of the village church of Ruel suddenly struck my ear. I felt deeply affected, such is the power of early impressions and of education. I then said to myself, how great an influence these things must hav upon simple and credulous men! Let your philosophers, your ideologists, answer that! There must be a religion for the people, but this religion must be in the hands of the government. At present fifty bishops, immigrants, and in the pay of England, lead the clergy of France. We must destroy their influence, and for this the authority of the pope is required. They must vacate their seats, or the pope will supersede them. We will declare that, as the Catholic religion is that of the majority of the Frenchmen, the exercise and worship of it must be legally organized. The first consul appoints fifty new bishops, and the pope givs them the canonical institution. The bishops appoint the parish incumbents, and the state pays them. They must all take an oath of fidelity to the government; those who refuse shall be transported. The pope sanctions the sale of the church property, and thus he consecrates the republic. They will sing in the churches, "Salvam fac rempublicam." People will say that I am a papist. I was a Mohammedan in Egypt, and I shall be a Catholic here for the good of the people. I do not believe in religion. . . . But the idea of a God'—and then raising his hands toward the heavens he exclaimed, 'Who then has made all this?' N— now spoke in reply, after having listened in perfect silence. 'To discuss the necessity of religion,' said he, 'would be foreign to the present question. I will even grant the utility of a public worship. A worship must hav priests; but priests can exist without forming an embodied clergy, without a hierarchy animated by one spirit and ever aiming at one end and at the same object. A hierarchy is a power, and a colossal power. Were the hierarchy to hav for its head the chief of the state, it would not be half so formidable; but as long as it acknowledges a foreign prince for its head, it is a rival power.'"

In these last words there is contained a warning for the Protestant and Freethought people of this republic. Already the vassals of this same foreign prince, though now, and perhaps because now, a prince without land, raise their bold voice demanding that the relation between their church and the state shall be governed by their own (the canonical or Roman) law, one of the provisions of which is to withdraw their priests in all criminal matters from temporal jurisdiction.

Whatever in Macfarlane's statement is not to the taste of a Freethinker of to-day is a consequence of Bonaparte's belief that the people had not then been educated for self-government. He had seen the people become a sanguinary brute when it was at liberty to shape its own fate, and the liberal despot, loving though despising, believed that he for the people would better achieve reform and progress than the people itself, as yet ignorant and full of venom, consequent to the torment and atrocities it had suffered under royal rule.

The Bonapartes hav never been more nor less than a revolutionary dynasty. European dynasties hav always considered them so, and were always ready to conspire against them, because the Bonapartes were progressiv, and the outcome of revolution. Now the republic has been firmly established in France, their time has passed, but, notwithstanding this, Bonaparte must be considered as the son of the people, as the promoter of liberty, of equality, and as a Freethinker.

If, under his leadership, the blood of a hundred thousand has been shed, it was in combating against the prevalent power of European hereditary and absolute monarchy, who claimed that the people were their God-given property, and had to liv or die as they saw fit to order. All Napoleonic battles were fruitful in the destruction of that idea that Europe forever had become the boon of a few monarchical families. This is well illustrated by the fact that Frederick William III., when taking possession of the Rhenish Province, after it had been in war (1815) reconquered from the French, found himself in the necessity to leave Napoleonic law untouched, and to promis to that province a constitution and the right to vote its own taxation, a promis unfulfilled from 1815 until 1848, when fear wrung its fulfilment from Frederick William IV., but soon broken again when the tax-refusers were driven asunder by the bayonets of soldiery.

Such men as Bonaparte must in necessity be tyrants. The stupid people does not deserve better than to be forced into rational progress if it shows and proves that it can neither bring it about nor enjoy it without abuse and self-destruction. But progress once established, the great man's small son has certainly no right to palm himself off on the nation as its owner. Nevertheless, has hereditary devotion a deep hold on the masses.

Thibaudeau's statement, as given by Macfarlane, leaves no doubt that Bonaparte was a Deist. It is more than probable, and almost certain, that in this his creed he followed our Thomas Paine. While Paine was in prison in Paris, in 1793, he published in French and English his "Age of Reason." Bonaparte had then returned from Corsica, and, as his own publication, "Le Soupé de Beaucaire," proved, took a vivid part in the movements of the times. We also know that he read at the time Jean Jacques Rousseau's "Confessions." How could Paine's book, then familiar to all who were participating in the public events, escape Bonaparte's attention?

Bonaparte's pamphlet promoted him to the colonelship of a battery at the siege of Toulon, and to his first military achievement. Paine remained in prison until the American envoy reclaimed him, but he remained in France long enough to witness Bonaparte's success, and when, in 1802, he returned to America, he knew that the affairs of France were in the hands of a Freethinker, then First Consul of the republic, and who, as his enemy asserts, "was anxious to promote the positiv sciences, was a utilitarian before that sect had adopted the name."

Tramps and Strikes—Why?

Until about 1868–70 strikes were almost a novelty in the United States, and tramps were quite so. If you ask why these inauspicious symptoms hav grown up of late, the reply will be, "Our increased population." This answer has satisfied everybody, almost. But a little reflection will show it to be erroneous.

The population of the United States in 1877, the year of the great strikes, the Pittsburgh riots, and the marching of tramps over the land, was by no means so confined as it was in 1850. Of course the words "increased population" imply that a greater number of people were confined within smaller limits, else there is no sense in assigning numbers as the cause. Prior to 1850 there was no extension of railways over new lands. From 1865 up to 1875 railways opened up to settlement such enormous areas of new lands that the price of real estate fell very low over Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and other states. The people were comparativly much more crowded in 1850 than they are to-day. Moreover there was a greater increase of manufactures both in number of factories and in capital invested, from 1850 to 1860, comparativly, than since then. I remark this because it is generally supposed that the tramps are from the factories. In this western country the tramps are so numerous along the railways that they become a serious annoyance to the people living there. Not long since on one evening some eighty were counted between Corning and Craig, six miles along the Kansas City & Council Bluffs Railway.

The highways and byways of England, from 1820 to 1848, were literally lined with tramps, and I believe it was about that time the word tramp originated. Another fact is that the population of several Eastern states was about the same in 1855 as it is to-day, and yet tramps were not known.

Tramps and strikes are the legitimate result of bad legislation—legislation as offensiv to free government as ever the institution of slavery was.

Repeal such statutes, and ere three years pass tramps will hav become a tradition. C. I.

Spencer and Comte.

By discarding from his philosophy every prejudgment that is not scientific; by banishing across the frontiers the problems of substance and cause which human intelligence is incapable of solving; by basing on experience the whole doctrin of the general science which unites the special sciences; and, above all, by co-ordinating positiv knowledge according to a law of evolution into a series, the gaps whereof are skilfully covered by hypotheses that reason may accept and that reason does not contradict; by all these features, and by the last especially, Spencer presents to us one of the most complete types of the philosophical spirit of the nineteenth century.

To authors who maintain this class of doctrins, or at least such of them as are considered fundamental, it has been the custom for some years past to giv the name of Positivists, and they hav been regarded as the disciples of Auguste Comte. The public, from the midst of which this powerful mind had gathered with difficulty a small circle of followers, had allowed him to liv, think, and die, without giving to his work the attention it deserved, and without cherishing toward him personally any feelings but those of utter indifference.

A few years after Comte's death the opinion kept gaining ground in the scientific and philosophical world that Comte's Positiv philosophy would entirely supersede and replace Christianity and the old beliefs of mankind. Afterward, and without very close consideration, Comte received credit for the grand movement of contemporaneous thought which he did not create, and which appeared to pursue another route than that he would hav wished it to follow.

This term, "Positivists," is admirable. It applies well to that general group of thinkers, savants, and even mere amateurs, who base their general ideas on the positiv sciences as a whole, and regard as insoluble the problems that the positiv sciences can do nothing to explain. Still it cannot be said that these savants and thinkers belong to Comte's school. A school supposes a master who has founded it, and disciples whose chief care is to reproduce faithfully the master's ideas of processes, allowing themselvs more or less liberty in details. Here we hav certainly bold lines, fundamental doctrins, but points of divergence cannot be called details. Besides, the grand lines on which there is agreement were traced out already before Comte.

If, then, it was well to giv the name of Positivists to all those who adopt those essential principles, it was wrong to connect them with Comte, as if they were his disciples and he was their master. A confusion would arise from such thoughtlessness that would misrepresent their respectiv attitudes.

In spite of the resemblances, and analogies, and agreement on essential points between the ideas of Comte and the writings of diverse contemporary authorities who adhere to Spencer's synthetic, experimental, evolution philosophy, there exists a profound disagreement on points that are especially characteristic of the philosophy of Comte. Hence the protests that hav appeared from all quarters, especially from John Stuart Mill, who writes with a good nature growing out of an acceptance of many of Comte's views; from Herbert Spencer, whose impatience is mingled with a profound respect for the illustrious thinker he differs from; and from Huxley, whose assaults go to the extent of injustice.

What Comte meditated was a systematic classification of our knowledge that might serve in the interpretation of classes of phenomena that hav not been studied in a scientific manner; a lofty idea, worthy of all praise. Comte revived the conception of Bacon (so astonishing at an epoch when knowledge was so little advanced). It contemplated nothing less than an organization of the sciences in a vast system in which social science should appear as a branch of the tree of nature. In the place of a vague, indefinit conception Comte has given a definit, carefully-studied conception of the world. He has displayed a reach, a fertility, and an originality of mind truly great, as well as a rare power of generalization.

Comte's Positiv philosophy was an immense progress; it marks an epoch in the evolution of human intelligence.

They who reject Comte's peculiar doctrins, and adhere to Positivism as it was before Comte, possess in common with him opinions that the past has bequeathed to the present; but such adhesion should not be reckoned in favor of the doctrins peculiar to Comte. Such is the position of Spencer, and of the main body of the scientific philosophers of to-day.

Comte himself always taught that the positiv method in philosophy had been developing for ages, and was an inheritance common to all men of science. The principles that compose this common heritage are the relativity of all knowledge, and its corollary, the principle that forbids recourse to metaphysical entities for the explanation of phenomena, and, finally, the fixedness of the laws of nature.

Good Thunder and Sterling.

Good Thunder, Minn., is named after an Indian chief still living in the Northwest. I gave two lectures here. Several Adventists were out the first night, and after my second lecture, and departure for Sterling, with our Liberal friend Rima, by carriage, the Adventists sent a written acceptance of my challenge to debate. Elder Hill is to be my opponent, or any one he chooses to substitute. Time, November 1st. Question, "Is the Bible a Divine Revelation?" Since they hav lost some of their leading preachers by debate, I hav found them rather shy, but I am in hopes Elder Hill will not fail to meet me in Good Thunder.

On Sunday we held a grove meeting near Sterling Centre, Johnson's Grove; the day cool and rainy; audience not large. Nevertheless, we had a good time. Liberals: G. W. Rima, M. M. Pratt, Wm. Ellis, J. Dobie, Ole Oleson, W. M. Randall, G. B. Lamp, W. A. Grover, Wm. Johnson, R. D. Boyer, and others.

Liberals in Good Thunder are Paul Gloucke, John Graham, P. Barner, A. Handy, A. J. Ziegler, A. F. Billett, L. Cook, and Mr. Austin, the latter-named gentleman the bearer of the Adventist dispatch.

At Amboy, Minn., while waiting at the depot for a train, I received calls from several Liberals, one of whom, Mr. Councilman, was at the time I held my debate with Hull, in Paw Paw, Mich., in, 1862, an Adventist. Mr. Councilman is now a stanch Liberal, and, having heard that I was in town, came down to see me. We all had an enjoyable visit of an hour. I hav promised sometime to visit Amboy, pound the gospel, and expound Freethought.

I visited my printer son, Claude, who is editor and publisher of the Delavan Herald. He is not yet twenty-one, and a thoroughgoing Freethinker. I remained in Delavan one day, then on to Iowa by way of the Illinois Central mail route—the slowest railroad on earth, I believe. At Janesville, Ia., my correspondent, M. W. St. John, met me with a conveyance. A six-mile pleasant drive brought us to his farm, on which he had planted a grove with a space 25x150 feet, over which the arching trees secured us grateful shade.

Our D. M. Bennett saw this lovely Cedar Valley, and declared that in all his trip around the world he had not seen its equal. From "Lookout Mound," as far as the eye could scan, the scene is a vision of natural beauty—scores of groves in every direction, in each grove a farm house neatly tucked away.

Tomorrow I am to hav the privilege of dedicating M. W. St. John's grove to free speech, and in my next will speak particularly of the people of this region.

Before concluding this sketch I will say that Brother St. John was a few years ago a zealous member of the Baptist church. Paine's "Age of Reason" opened his eyes. He has been just as earnest in spreading Freethought literature as he ever was in upholding Christianity. Mrs. St. John is heart and hand with him in his Liberal work, and even his children, to the youngest, are Liberals.

Lake City, Minn. W. F. JAMIESON.

The Tent.

HICKORY CORNERS.—We struck the tent on Monday, July 6th, under the dark clouds threatening rain, and worked very hard to insure getting Tent packed before the deluge descended. The friends not realizing the danger of packing canvas if damp were not on hand so early—4 o'clock, A.M.; we took down and packed up with assistance of one man, and had only got loaded up when the rain descended in torrents. We waited till the heaviest of the storm abated, and then rode on the load (the whole tent and belongings was loaded on a lumber wagon with hay-rack) through rain to Augusta—nearly nine miles.

We left a growing interest at Hickory Corners. A large class of intelligent Jews felt deeply interested in the study of evolution, and safely removed from all liability of ever being influenced by superstition.

We cannot refrain from expressing our appreciation of the uniform kindness and earnest co-operation of Mr. Ed. Flansburg and every member of his family. He is a genuin lover of liberty, a persistent student, and accurate reasoner; and to his enterprise and liberality the good work accomplished at Hickory Corners and vicinity is mainly due; while we feel assured there will be no lagging of interest among the young folks under the lead of so worthy a son of a noble sire as young Mr. Charles Flansburg.

The brave old veteran (on our arrival there the only subscriber to a Liberal paper in the place), Jas. Roughton—over eighty-five years of age—a constant subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, is a genial old gentleman who was always at his post, despite the cold, damp nights. His life has honored his profession of Secularism, and gained for him the respect of the entire community—another proof that open avowal and consistent living up to the principles of Secularism, instead of losing, gain the respect and esteem of the community.

Our experience at Hickory Corners convinced us there is a limit to human endurance, even of enthusiastic workers, and that if we would continue our efforts we must hav a Tent-master. When we shipped Tent at Augusta we were sadly exhausted and went on to Kalamazoo, and found hospital, as well as hospitable reception, at our dear friend Elias H. Gault's, and gladly yielded to his advice to rest a day or two and recuperate.

Our dear colleague and honored friend, S. P. Putnam, the indefatigable, ever on the alert, ever deeply interested in all parts of the field and every branch of the work, had been looking out for our interest, and wrote us of his success in securing the services of Mr. Arthur Tilney, of Toronto, an energetic, devoted Liberal, a splendid singer and good musician, willing to throw himself into the work as Tent-master. Gladly we accepted, and the gentleman joined us at Ithaca on Saturday, and we are jubilant, for we believe we hav found just the right man for the place.

ITHACA.—This is the county-seat of Gratiot county, a real live, enterprising, wide-awake town. We delivered three lectures on Sunday, July 12th, to good audiences. In the evening the Tent was not alone crowded, but there were over one hundred and fifty outside who remained and listened attentivly.

There are a number of live Liberals here. Mr. Isaac Gabrion is an honor to any cause; he is a Liberal Spiritualist, sound, practical, generous-hearted devotee of Liberalism. We had the honor to meet Uncle Lon—Mr. Alonzo Peet—the grand old Liberal and apostle of Greenbackism; and we enjoy the hospitality of his son Frank Peet, proprietor of the Commercial House, a hotel we commend to all travelers, conducted in all things on Liberal principles. We found the music and singing of Mr. Arthur Tilney a great acquisition. The audiences are delighted with his choice and admirably rendered songs.

We are hopeful of continued good reports, and desire now to make our way eastward so as to reach Ballston Spa., N. Y., by the first of September. Let friends between here and there desiring Tent make immediate application.

ITHACA, MICH, July 18th.—We are having grand success here, despite heat and busy season of harvest. We hav large attendance, very great interest, and much excitement among the sectarians.

Our new Tent-master, Mr. Arthur Tilney, from Toronto, Canada, proves a really valuable acquisition; he evinces tact and judgment in distributing Liberal literature, etc, is ready and obliging, and ever on the alert to help. His singing proves a very great attraction, and has made him deservedly popular here. There is nothing of the coarse negro-singer or clown business in any of Mr. Tilney's selections. Many of them are very English, but all are such, alike sentimental or humorous, as would be favorably received in the parlor of the most cultured and fastidious gentleman.

If Mr. Tilney continues in his well-begun endeavors, he will speedily acquire a deservedly great name and become indispensable to our work.

Tent work is mainly pioneer work. It has already afforded hundreds opportunity to hear lectures and thus incited them to read our publications and become versed in the claims and principles of Secularism, who, but for the Tent, would doubtless hav gone to their graves without ever hearing a Liberal lecture.

The Examiner, the organ of the Baptists, says, "Indications are not lacking that the theological conflicts of the next few years are to be waged about this question of the inspiration of the scriptures. The fight may well be fought there. If the Bible is the word of God, an authoritativ revelation of his will, the system known as orthodox Christianity follows as a matter of course. If the Bible is not the word of God, there has been no revelation of his will. All preaching is vain and our faith is vain. The question is fundamental."

This is self-evident truth, yet it is impossible, even with the most kind, loving, and gentle spirit, to point out and expose the fallacies of the Bible, giving, as we invariably do, chapter and verse, and, instead of quoting, turning to and carefully reading it, without engendering fierce hate and vindictiv spite in the hearts of some of its fanatical worshipers.

It is wonderful how this class seem to think the very existence of their God depends on their coming to his defense and executing vengeance for him.

"God ought to burn up the Tent and strike that man dead," said one amiable ancient dame to her spouse. "Well, you see he don't, though," replied the husband. "No, but if I was God I would!" snapped the gentle Xantippe. This spirit, that instituted and continued the horrors of the Inquisition, is the natural consequence of the self-same teaching of the self-same book—called Bible—and this spirit it was doubtless that inspired some Bible devotee with the idea to crawl around the back part of our Tent and pour oil of vitrol on our ropes where they were tied to the stakes. If we had neglected our invariable custom to examin all our stakes every time we go to the Tent, the loving design might hav succeeded; the vitrol would eat the rope without giving any sign, until when the Tent was thronged, a little shaking and down it must fall, and in the scare and fear, trying to escape, many helpless women and children most likely hav been killed. For genuin malignity and diabolical villainy, this feat is unexcelled even in the pious days of the Inquisition. But it was rendered futil—as all such designs must be—by our habit of careful examination. Ammonia stays the corrosiv action of vitrol. We, in a few minutes, remedied the mischief and removed the cause of danger. The same spirit would vitrol us, but such creatures, although claiming they do such dirty work to help their God, are doubtful of his ability to protect them; they are always cowards.

Tent work must always be extra arduous. We go to entire new fields, like this of Ithaca, where heretofore nothing has grown but the noxious weeds of bigotry, fanaticism, and superstition. In clearing up and ploughing such fields, we hav to remove the tangled roots of prejudice, and face the hissing of the venomous serpents, and endure the stealthy attacks of the vermin that hav so long generated unmolested.

But, on the other hand, we are cheered and encouraged by the expressions of gratitude from many honest hearts who hav been benefited by our labor, who start rejoicing along the broad, bright fields of science and freedom.

We are sowing the seed, the harvest will come hereafter; and the way is made easier for all who come after us to continue the good work.

We are advertised for three lectures here on Sunday. Each night some hav come from considerable distances; they go back freighted with new ideas and choice Liberal literature, awaking among their neighbors a desire to learn if these things are so. Large numbers hav expressed intention to be present on Sunday. We look for a gala day for Secularism.

We strike tent Monday morning, 20th, and on Tuesday pitch at Mason, Ingraham Co., Mich., which will be our address until after the 27th instant. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON has now three debates on his hands, and, unless his opponents "back down," they will take place as follows: With a Christadelphian, at Cedar Falls, Iowa; with Moses Hull (no back out to him) at Clinton, Iowa, Camp meeting, Aug. 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th; with an Adventist at Good Thunder, Minn., first week in November. He is, also, engaged to lecture at the Clinton Camp-meeting Sunday, Aug. 16th. For lectures address him at Lake City, Minn.

MR. BURNHAM WARDWELL is still at Vineland, N. J., where he is the guest of Mr. John Gage. The following, which we clip from a report of his speeches in the Vineland Journal, shows that his utterances hav the true ring:

"I do not know of more than one road leading to happiness, and that is the LOVE road. No one can afford to be cruel; no one can afford to be untruthful; no one can afford to get drunk; and so on down to the end of all crimes. Not for the world would I be a hangman, or a whip-master, or a preacher of God's anger."

AFTER Dr. York's first lecture in Sydney, Australia, the News says that a lady was overheard to remark, "Well, this is the first time I ever attended a Freethought lecture, and, do you know, every word Dr. York uttered was common sense." The News devotes a column to a report of the lecture, and among its local brevities records Dr. York's success: "West's Academy last evening was crowded by people anxious to hear Dr. York, the American orator. His logic, humor, and wit evoked storms of applause. Dr. York has made a great hit, and if his future lectures prove as interesting as that on the 'Science of Life,' his success in these colonies is assured. He succeeds in interesting both young and old, and his ideas are those of the nineteenth century." When Dr. York left Auckland, the Bell of that city cheered him on his way like this: "Dr. York, last night at the Opera House, made his last appearance before an Auckland audience prior to commencing a year's tour in Australia. The doctor, last evening, delivered two discourses—one was on 'Father Lambert's Reply to Ingersoll' and the other on 'Inspiration.' His examination of Father Lambert's book was a scathing exposure of the sophistry and misrepresentation that runs through it from title page to finis. Its shallowness and animus was also pointed out, and, while only dealing with three chapters, the doctor said enough to show that no reliance could be placed on the book at all. The second lecture on 'Inspiration' was as full of thought as the proverbial egg is said to be full of meat. There is no doubt in the mind of any thinking man but that the theory the doctor advanced is correct, that man is 'a receiver,' being acted upon and inspired from the outside world, both the seen and the unseen. His lecture was no blasphemous tirade against Biblical inspiration, it was an earnest discourse on a deep subject. His recitation of the 19th Psalm we hav never heard surpassed in any church. The doctor is intense and his ideas trip one another up, almost so quickly does one seem to crowd upon another. He is not an orator, but a thinker. Like Beecher, he is a mimic, and enacts his points, as well as argues them. He, however, never attempts to raise a laugh for the sake of it, but always to impress a thought or idea. The doctor believes man has a soul, and we think he proved it. He leaves for Sydney by the Australia for a year's tour of Australia, but he will call here on his way home to the states."

The Atchison, Kan., Daily Patriot says: "It has been about three years since J. E. Remsburg left the school-room for the lecture field. During this time he has traveled nearly fifty thousand miles, and has delivered from one to twenty lectures in each of the following one hundred and fifty cities and towns: New York, Boston, Mass., Chicago, Ill., Philadelphia, Pa., Montreal, Can., Albany, N. The National Liberal League.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, President.

CHARLES WATTS, First Vice-President. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary, 33 Clinton Pl., New York.

COURTLANDT PALMER, Treas., 850 Broadway, New York.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain. A. C. MACDONALD,

Chairman of the Finance Committee.

33 Clinton Place, New York city.

Albany Convention, Etc.

The following ringing message comes from the president of the Boston Ingersoll Secular Society:

"FRIEND PUTNAM: I shall be present at the Albany Convention and will do whatever lies in my power to make it a glorious success.

"I am delighted that our Boston Liberals take such an interest in it, and I hope the good work will prosper mightily among Liberals everywhere.

"That reason, science, and progress may receive an impetus at Albany that will be felt all over this continent is the ardent wish of Sincerely yours, GEO. N. HILL."

The following is from one of our pioneers in the great West:

"FORT BUFORD, DAK.

"MR. PUTNAM: In our small community of three hundred I am the only Liberal. I hav had many discussions. There is a wide field here for labor, and it givs me great pleasure to do something for our cause.

"If I could become a member of the League or any branch thereof it would giv me encouragement. This place, however, is so far from any Freethought organization that I can only become member by letter.

If in any way I can assist the work of the National League, I shall expect you to call upon me.

"Yours truly, WM. R. COURBET."

S. D. Jeffers, president of the Ingersoll Secular Society of Troy, makes a good suggestion:

"DEAR MR. PUTNAM: Many people hav the idea that Freethinkers hav no principles and no platform. Would it not be a good plan to publish in the Troy and Albany papers and elsewhere the Nine Demands of Liberalism, so that the world can see that what we seek is justice?

"Fraternally yours, S. D. JEFFERS."

I wish all friends would carry out this suggestion, and wherever it is possible hav published in the city or village or county newspaper the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and thus our platform will become more widely known. By a little effort each Liberal may get into his local paper to which he subscribes a notice of the Albany Convention and a publication of the Nine Demands. In this way much can be done to arouse the interest of the people.

HOTEL ACCOMMODATIONS, ETC., AT THE ALBANY CONVENTION.

We hav received the following from T. Roessle, Son & Co, of the Delavan.

"DEAR SIR: Your letter of July 10th duly received. Our house is the largest and best in Albany. We should be glad to hav you make your headquarters with us, and can offer you the rate of $3 per day for single bed, and where two persons occupy the same bed we will charge $2.50 each. This, you will see, is a very low rate, as we charge $4 per day to everybody. We make this rate hoping to get 100 or more persons. We are, Respectfully, T. ROESSLE, SON & CO"

Mr. McCabe, president of Albany Liberal Association, also called upon Mr. Roessle, who said that he would giv to those who attended our Convention the very best rooms in the house that were unoccupied. He also said that September is always a busy month, and he would like to know beforehand or as soon as possible, if there will be as many as 100 who will come.

THE DELAVAN.

As the Delavan offers the most favorable terms of all the leading hotels in Albany, and is unquestionably a first-class hotel, with ample accommodations for the comfort of guests, it will be chosen as the headquarters of the Convention. It will be for the pleasure of all those who attend the Convention to stay at the Delavan if they can afford it, for they will enjoy a delightful and stimulating social life during the progress of the Convention. We shall hav a royal company indeed. It will be well worth straining the pocket a little in order to partake of this exhilarating comradeship beneath the same roof. It will be like having a grand party all the time—a gorgeous dessert to the solidities of the lecture feast.

It will be well for all those who purpose to go to the Delavan to secure their rooms as soon as possible, for the dates of the Convention, September 11th, 12th, and 13th. As it is a busy season, the state fair occurring then, it will be first come first served. Write to T Roessle, Son & Co., The Delavan, or to J. J. McCabe, 35 Van Woort street, Albany, N. Y.

As this is a free country, and everybody is bound to do as he's a mind to, and go where he listeth, I will giv the rates of other hotels that each may follow his own sweet will. Kenmore House, $3 per day. Stanwix Hall, $2.50 for the fifth floor, $3.00 and $3.50 for the floors below. When two persons occupy the same bed the $3.50 will be $3.00. Hotel Brunswick $2.00 single, $1.50 double. Dunlop House $1.50 single, $1.25 double. I presume that those who desire can secure accommodations at $1.00 per day at comfortable, private boarding houses. Such can correspond with J. J. McCabe. The committee will spare no pains to be of service to all our friends who come to the Convention. S. P. PUTNAM.

SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR THE ALBANY CONVENTION.

Previously acknowledged,	$740.00
John E. Remsburg (paid),	10.00

Total,	$751.00

From Mr. Reynolds.

Our indefatigable colleague, Samuel P. Putnam, has done noble and herculean work in securing talent and means to insure a grand success of the Convention at Albany, N. Y., Sept. 11th to 13th.

Beyond all question this will be one of the largest and most interesting and important Conventions ever held in the state. The very best talent in our ranks has been engaged, every arrangement perfected, railroad fare and board secured at greatly reduced rates, tickets admitting to every session of the Convention (except Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on Tuesday evening, Sept. 13th), only $1.00. And remember, positivly no collections. The orthodox custom—"more honored in the breach than the observance"—the begging or passing the hat, is positivly prohibited.

While it will be a New York state meeting, especially designed to advance the cause of Secularism in New York, all are earnestly and cordially iuvited; of course the Eastern states will be very largely represented, and we hav promis of quite a number of delegations from Western states. Such genuin Liberals as Elias H. Gault and wife, L. G. Bragg and wife, of Kalamazoo, Mich., and many others like them, are not to be deterred by distance. They express determination to be present, for they rightly regard the cause of Secularism as universal, and know no North, no South, no East, no West. What advances Liberalism in one section is advantage to all Secularists everywhere, feeling their indebtedness to the brave and noble pioneers who at cost of liberty and life itself purchased for us the privileges we do enjoy. They feel it their imperativ duty to do all in their power to secure a still grander heritage of more perfect freedom to succeeding generations.

The time of abject submission to the arrogant dictation of church prelates, of slavish obedience to the whims of old Mother Orthodoxy and the decrees of Mrs. Grundy, is past.

We should all realize, as did that great model truth seeker, the lamented D. M. Bennett, the necessity and duty to make real, earnest, self-sacrificing efforts to shed abroad the light of truth for the benefit of our fellow-creatures.

The time for practical, united endeavor, for commencing in earnest the aggressiv war for our rights, the secularization of our government, and the redeeming of the grand old Empire state from puritanical phariseeism and bigotry, has arrived.

Only by agitation, by the presentation of facts, awakening thought, and arousing a spirit of investigation can we hope to attain the much-needed thorough and efficient organization necessary to success. United action will insure victory, but united action means individual effort. New York state is leavened with Secularism, and yet remains sunk in the mire of superstition and intolerance, because thousands of her best citizens dare not express their honest convictions, but yield seeming allegiance to religious rites and ceremonies they regard either with contempt or hatred, laboring under the delusion, fostered by the church, that Secularists are too weak in numbers and influence to dare express their convictions or assert their rights.

What are we doing to help these mollusks and impart the needed vertebra? What, dear reader, are you individually doing to enlighten the people in regard to the aims and obligations of Secularism? What hav you accomplished by distribution of Liberal literature? What done as cauvassers for our best books? And, especially, and of first importance, how many subscribers hav you obtained for our best Liberal papers?

We are not doing one-hundredth part of what we might, could, and should do. Think what is being done by the devotees of superstition, the Seventh Day Adventists. A poor despised sect raised in this state last year $25,000 for propagandist work. They religiously devote one-tenth of their increase, and never less than one-fifth of their time to the cause they love. All this for error and fanaticism.

Shall we do nothing for the cause of truth, reason, and humanity? We earnestly hope every Liberal in the state of New York will avail himself of the privileges of the coming Convention at Albany. The most able exponents of Secularism leave other fields of labor to help the state of New York. All who wish to be benefited by their labors must do their part of the work Every school district throughout the whole state should be represented.

What can I do? Resolve to attend. The first important duty to make the meeting a success is to commence at once and get ready; arrange to take your wife, mother, sisters, and children. Let us lay aside home cares just for a few days, and devote the time to the cause we profess to love. Send at once the money for tickets; send by registered letter or post-office order to S. P. Putnam, THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York. Send money for your tickets to-day, and half the difficulties about going will fade away. Having paid for your tickets you are bound to go. Your sending for your tickets will induce others to do likewise. On learning you hav resolved to go, others will make special effort to go also. It is hard times! Yes. Cannot really afford it! Of course not. But what do you liv for? To delve and grind and slave and pinch and save, grow prematurely old and die. If this is all you liv for, the sooner you are dead the better for all concerned, especially your poor wife. What is the use of living unless you get some enjoyment out of life as it passes? Death may come before another year. Now you can go—your wife needs to go. Think of the dull monotony of her life—the weary round of unceasing cares and thankless duties so long, so faithfully, so patiently performed. Giv her a holiday, brighten her life, gladden her heart, let a little of the sunlight of pleasure shine on her pathway; giv her some proof that you hav still some of the dear affection and tender love of long ago. Think of those courting days when, if she would only consent to accompany you on an excursion, you felt so proud and elated; your suspenders could hardly keep you from flying to the moon, you were so loony with pride and joy. Has she not now even greater claims on your love and care? We need the help, the influence, the inspiration of women. You help yourself, you help others by attending the meeting with your wife and family. Cost so much! What do you liv for? Work for? Grind and squeeze and scrape and slave and save for? When are you going to get any good of it all? Here is an opportunity for you, your wife, and family to hav a real social enjoyment—intellectual recreation. Get away from home; break up the dull routin of life; benefit yourself and fellow-creatures. Justice demands your going. Mercy enjoins it; it would be mean and cruel to miss so grand an occasion of doing and receiving good. You wish to secure your own happiness by promoting the happiness of others. Here is your opportunity. For right, truth, and reason's sake, do not, having deserted orthodox Christianity, practice its worst habits, make loud profession of faith, and never liv out your profession. Let none but penurious nothingarians stay away from the Albany Convention. Let all stayaways, save those prevented by sickness or absolute poverty, nevermore claim to be Liberals or Secularists, for Secularism is doing as well as doubting—doing justice, loving mercy, and promoting the happiness of our fellow-creatures.

"You and your wife going or staying, when there will be such an immense gathering, won't make any difference?" Yes, it will. You and your wife going will be talked about by your neighbors; their attention and interest will be aroused in regard to the meeting; your going will induce some friend or neighbor to investigate the principles, the aims and objects of this Secularism, that prompts so close and careful a man as you to take your wife so far to attend the Convention. They will begin to think, to read, to Liberalize. Your presence and that of your wife and family increases the numbers and interest of the meeting. Remember the fifteen or twenty thousand Liberals present will consist of individuals. Numbers giv importance to the meeting in the eyes of newspaper men, and induce them to giv more full and careful reports of the meeting. The respect they pay it givs confidence to many lonely ones. Let every true and honest Liberal rally, make an earnest effort to attend, and the Albany Convention will be an acknowledged power, and Secularism will receive a mighty impetus.

Send for your tickets now, to-day; don't lose a single mail. All-important as we regard every day in Tent labor, we shall leave the Tent to take part in the grandest and most important Convention of Liberals ever held in our state.

Come one, come all. Let us enjoy this grand opportunity to cultivate sociability, and revel in the grand intellectual feast that prince of poets and caterers, the genial, jovial, ever-energetic Putnam, has labored so hard to prepare for us at Albany, September 11th to 13th. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

The Lesson for Christians.

From Light for Thinkers.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is becoming quite proficient in illustrating "old theology." Its latest and best is a full sheet size entitled: "A Short Lesson in History for Christians." It ought to be widely circulated.

MR. BAILEY'S OPINION.

From the Nashville, Tenn., Liberal.

The picture of Christian fire in THE TRUTH SEEKER, burning Bruno, every Christian ought to see. That alone should cause all men to withdraw from a combination that would murder a man for a difference of opinion. The picture should be hung up in the house of every Christian.

YES, BUT IS NOT RELIGION THE PARENT OF ECCLESIASTICISM?

From the Occident (Jewish).

Our esteemed contemporary, THE TRUTH SEEKER, publishes a terrible picture, depicting the burning of men of science by the Inquisition in the name of religion. Religion itself is blameless for all the crimes committed in its name. We recognize Colonel Ingersoll as a religious man, and a preacher of religion. Ecclesiasticism, not religion, played the devil with mankind. Ecclesiasticism engendered superstition and fanaticism. It is illogical to confound religion with church tyranny. Religion itself is an honest spirit.

THE PICTURE SUGGESTIV—AND MORE DEMANDED.

"E. A. H." in the New Thought.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has taken to illustrating. Its issue of July 11th contains a vivid picture contrasting the spirit and fruits of science with the fruits and spirit of Christianity. In one corner, the Salvation Army, with drums, tamborines, bones, bugles, accordions, and banners are marching along close to a crowd of scientists, Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Humbolt and Haeckel. One of the banners bears the following inscription: "We will whip the Devil or Bust!" One can almost hear the clangor and clamor. the shouts of "We're for Jesus," "I am the child of a king," "Hurrah for God." In another place, Galileo, with maps and charts spread out before him, and the sword of the Inquisition raised threateningly above him, is represented as recanting. Next to this is pictured the martyrdom of the immortal Bruno. How patiently he bears his tortures, while the robed priests with crucifix and crosier stand by, wearing smiles of the most complete satisfaction. Over the words, "The last argument of the church," Talmage is leading a diminutiv policeman carrying in his hand a warrant for the arrest of the author of "Which Way?" who stands erect, displaying a ripe, noble manhood. Morse and Stephenson intent upon those inventions that hav revolutionized the world, are unmindful of the frantic ravings of two disciples of Presbyterianism who are shouting, "Thwarting the will of God," "Heralds of Anti-Christ." Altogether the illustration is suggestiv. Let us hav more.

Popery in America.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am glad to know that you are so persistent in warning the thinking people, through your columns, of the danger which threatens us by the rapid growth of Roman Catholicism in America, as nearly, if not all, the other Liberal papers are silent on this all-important subject.

Here is a paragraph which I clipped from one of our daily papers recently, which shows the rapid growth of this pernicious sect in one state of the union, and what is true of Kentucky is also true of every state:

"In 1795, the Roman Catholics in Kentucky had one priest and 1,500 members. Now there are 2 bishops, 4 hospitals, 9 asylums, 57 colleges, 193 priests, 653 churches and stations, 16,344 schools, and 300,000 population."

These figures giv us some idea of the growth and progress of popery in America, but it is only when such statistics are brought to light that we can realize the power which this hydra-headed monster sways in our state and national government.

Sectarianism has been the curse of every nation on earth, and when we consider the fact that the churches, both Protestant and Catholic, are fighting for the supremacy, it behooves every liberty-loving citizen to be on his guard, least we fall prey to the machinations of priestcraft.

From an old magazine, published in 1854, I make the following quotation:

"In 1817, when, Bonaparte being safely stowed away on the island of St. Helena, all the kings, princes, and potentates of Europe, either in person or by their deputies, assembled in Brussels, or some other town in Germany, they assumed the name of the Holy Alliance, their object was to check the growth of republicanism, which threatened to turn their thrones upside down."

The emperor of Austria was represented by Count Metternich; this count was considered one of the most profound, subtle, and Jesuitical politicians of that time. He was chief director and spokesman in that convention. In one of his speeches he said: "As long as a republic exists in America, there will be no stability for any throne in Europe."

He proposed, as the safest, surest, and most expeditious mode of destroying this republic, to plant and support the Roman Catholic faith in every town, village, and hamlet in the country. Said he, "There is no obstacle, all we want is money; all religions are tolerated in America. Our priests, monks, confessors, bishops, cardinals, and Jesuits need no disguise; there they can carry their heads as proud as the most esteemed Protestant bishops. There, too, they hav a vote; their naturalization is a rope of sand; the false oaths, being sworn for the good of Mother Church, are recorded by the priests among the deeds meritorious."

Is it not a fact that, at every annual election, thousands, and ten of thousands, who never learned a letter in their own language, and cannot even speak English so as to be understood, and who know nothing of our laws, yet hav the right of franchise? And their vote is as good as any nativ American.

At that convention of the holy alliance, large sums were subscribed to be paid annually for the support of priests and the building of churches, colleges, monasteries, and nunneries in all the pomp and ostentation of Rome.

Could the effect be traced to the cause, I verily believe that the most of the conversions of Protestant priests, Puseyites, etc., into Catholic bishops, is found in the influence of this bank of faith and gold dust established by the holy alliance.

Money and promotion will turn the half of the bishops in Europe and America into journeymen for the pope, his cardinals, and monkhoods.

I thought last fall, when each of the aspirants for the presidency was courting favors from Catholic voters, how little the American people realize the subtle influence of popish rule in America.

When we see the hordes of wild, ignorant, savage-looking Catholics from the shambles of Europe, vomited on our shores from the holds of every packet-ship, we cannot but feel anxious for the safety of our republican institutions and the welfare of our government.

France has been wading through fields of fire and blood for a hundred years. Mexico is a den of monks and thieves. The revival of Jesuitism in Europe, and of the facts of the unholy leagues of certain despotic powers to subvert and undermine our own republic, ought to arouse every lover of his country, before his hands are tied and his lips sealed by the power of the priests.

The states and churches are ripe for a popish harvest; there is not a Cranmer among the bishops of England or America, nor a Luther among the Protestants. The Episcopal church is half Romanized already; the Catholic is compassing land and sea in making proselytes; soon they will hold the majority, when they can make, mend, alter, or destroy the Constitution according to law.

It must appear to every candid-thinking mind that what the author of the above quotation has charged to the Catholics in 1854 can in our time be truthfully charged to the Protestants in 1885, for we can foresee dangers equally imminent in the movements of Protestant denominations, for if the facts are true as set forth by this writer, the Protestant church would rather unite with the Catholics in crushing out Freethought and so-called Infidelity than to unite with us supporting our governments, and allow Infidelity to maintain its foothold.

The assiduous efforts put forth by the Catholics to get possession of public funds, and to establish sectarian schools, prove that they feel their growing power, and soon will adopt other methods to enforce their demands besides petitioning legislativ bodies.

The following paragraph, clipped from the Radical Review a few months ago, speaks for itself:

"The most formidable opposition against all schemes aiming at the taxation of church property comes from Roman Catholic quarters. We well remember that a few years ago it was Roman Catholic influence that defeated a bill introduced in the Wisconsin legislature by Mr. Arthur Bate, demanding the taxation of church property. A similar bill, just now before the Iowa legislature, is being vigorously opposed by the Roman Catholics of that state. A special dispatch to the Tribune from Dubuque tells us of a second meeting held at the cathedral chapel to protest against the church and school property tax bill. Bishop Hennessy and others addressed the large meeting of 700 persons, and a committee was appointed to go to Des Moines and work against the bill."

It is a well known fact that the bill was defeated, but what are we going to do about it? If the sinister influence of Rome can control our legislativ bodies at the present time, how long will it be before it can control the affairs of the nation. And on this question the Protestants vie with the Catholics in opposing the taxation of church property.

When I see men and women who call themselvs "Reformers" quibbling about trifles, with no unity of purpose, and, on the other hand, the united forces of ignorance, backed up by untold millions, ready to do the bidding of priests and prelates, I am forced to believe that among the so-called Liberals and reformers there is a lack of stability and true manhood. Our forces are divided, and, so far as I can see, there is little hope of uniting them.

Every earnest, sincere Liberal must heartily rejoice to know that an effort is being made by the Liberal League to bring about a better condition of things among the thinking people, and it is to be hoped that the League officers will find that hearty cooperation, support, and encouragement which they deserve, and may the good work prosper until we, as Liberals, stand united as one man, ready to do battle with every form of superstition and error, sustaining the principles established by the immortal Washington, Paine, and Franklin, so that in coming years our children and children's children may enjoy that perfect freedom and imnunity from all forms of bondage and priestcraft for which all great men hav labored so long and earnestly.

Rochester, N. Y., July 17, 1885. H. O. Sommers.

Temperance vs. Legislativ Prohibition.

Among the six articles of mark in The Truth Seeker of July 4th, E. C. Walker's battle-cry indicates the point where liberty is most imperiled.

The church allied with the state power by our Sabbath laws, church property exemption from taxes, and appropriation of school funds, steadily pursues its theocratic policy by a new alliance with the Prohibitionist demagogs. Temperance is but the false pretext of this movement. A certain branch of commerce, at once useful and abuseful, and collateral to temperance, is singled out because it affords a chance for the intervention of the clergy in meddlesome legislation, to the neglect of their proper but less lucrativ social duties of influence over morality.

We cannot too emphatically declare the fact, to which, as I infer from divers communications to The Truth Seeker, Lucifer, etc., many Liberals hav not opened their eyes, notwithstanding the St. John campaign, that Prohibitionism is only a plank of the clerical platform, the entering wedge of the ecclesiastical state party. The Catholics now look on, well contented to see the heretics pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for them. When they hav cooled, the pope may condescend to eat them. Church plus state =papal theocracy. Add to the blazon of God in the Constitution on its party banner, the pathogenic symptom of clericalism, that it identifies itself with authority, compressiv, repressiv, and centralized, against individual liberty. Catholicism is the church. The rest are shams, skirmishers in disguise. Evidently reason is insufficient to meet this case, like that of religious superstition. I note with satisfaction the proposition to anti-institutionize, among the Liberals of New York under Mr. Wakeman's pastorate. It is quite a temptation to turn sheep. The young folks must find in the Liberal fold enjoyment for senses and hearts, if Liberalism is to grow and prosper.

So with the cause of Temperance vs. prohibition by laws confounding uses with abuses, in meddling with a certain class of trade and trampling on the liberties of personal discretion.

The dealer in pure wines or beers is not merely an honorable merchant, but temperance has no better friend than he except the vintner. This is proved by the published testimony of United States consuls in all parts of the world. All the wine-drinking peoples are temperate. Neither the crimes nor diseases characteristic of drunkards prevail among them. The evils of intoxication begin at the boundary line to the north of the vine. Temperance must be socially organized by female intervention. Mrs. Astor has taken an honorable initiativ in her circle. E. C. W. is a popular lecturer; let him woo and win the young ladies to treat legislativ prohibition homeopathically by their social prohibition of insane drinkers. Dipsomania, the drunkard craze, instead of being multiplied by generation, and organized by heredity, should be Shakerized by the courageous No of her who by wedlock becomes particeps criminis and conspires against the unborn.

Socially responsible for drunkenness of the most criminal tendency, and on the largest scale, pressing on the whole proletariat class, are those mill-owners and other capitalists who grind their wealth out of the misery of their hirelings whom they drive to the alcoholic suicide for a few hours' respit from consciousness. Cut off from the dram, they find opium or some other poison that takes precedence of food of food and clothing, so that this class of drunkards is incurable while misery persists, and exploitation is held in honor. Meanwhile, let the drunkard answer for his actions without reservation or excuse. If he offend, measure his offense by its mischief, and don't sentimentalize about guilty intention. He who abdicates his reason is potentially guilty of whatever he may do in its absence. To get drunk is equivalent to malice prepense, and men drink on purpose to commit acts of violence beyond their sober courage. Such murders are of daily occurrence.

Let society reason about drunkards as it reasons about mad dogs or rattlesnakes. Society does not plead in their favor, like General Crooks in behalf of the Apaches, that murder is the natural exercise of their faculties. It neither excuses nor blames them, but it blots them out of being as inconsistent with its welfare. The Apache, in killing, makes clean work, the drunkard makes his family home a den of filth and crime. Criminal acts are less frequent under influence of spirits among the rich, because, their habits being less executiv, thought rather than action is bewildered. Besides, they drink a better quality of liquor, which, like man, is subject to the etiquet of education and acts differentially upon the same nerves. The knowledge of their responsibility would send some into an asylum for medical treatment.

In vain may the scrutiny of facts, such as were adduced last year in The Truth Seeker from the Washington agitator and from Dio Lewis, showing the practical failure of the prohibitory laws in New Hampshire and in Maine to abate the nuisance, and their stimulus to hypocrisy, and the opportunities they afforded to malice. You may as well carry facts and reason into a lunatic asylum to convince maniacs of their crazes, as to combat with them the strong delusion of representation, to which demagogs add the ambitions of power and pelf.

These speculators upon law, these would-be legislators, paid for pretending to relieve individual conscience of its social duties, will persist for the same reasons as the liquor dealers persist, in pandering to a depraved taste and morbid habit. Of the two cases, indeed, the craze of legislation is more dangerous than the alcoholic, and the profits of the legislator greater than the liquor dealer's—honors thrown in gratis, honors peculiar to the legislator, and which in a sane state of public opinion would be infamies.

Futil as a moral suasion propaganda has proved in suppressing intemperance, the influence of woman, concentrated upon liquor dealing, has been more effectiv than legislation. Dio Lewis has proved this. To the conversion of the mischievous publican nothing is opposed except his greed of gain, whereas to this the mischievous legislator adds the prestige of power and fame. The only argument that could hav any weight with him would be the impossible one of higher pay and greater esteem for minding his own business at home, instead of meddling with other people's at the capital.

Now, as the American people are hellbent on subjecting the traffic in drink to majority votes, it behooves us to calculate like politicians on class interests. We can prove to the numerous small farmers that they near the point at which the competition of capital with machinery will render their independence upon arable levels impossible, by the cheaper production of grains, cotton, and tobacco. Fruit and wine, for which the mountains suit, will be the only crops available for market. Their economic interest thus classes them on the temperance side against the Prohibitionists.

Prohibitionist legislation, without the name of it, is already oppressing Texan farmers. We read in the Galveston News:

"Referring to Comptroller Swain's decision that viticulturists must not sell their wine at retail without a license, and must not sell by the gallon or cask without paying the state and county tax as dealers—$450 a year—the German Post takes occasion to remark that the vinyards of Texas are mostly small, and, as it will not pay them as a rule to meet such an exaction, they will, of course, hav to be discontinued. The Post is correct. Here is another subject for reflection for the citizens of this alleged 'freest country on earth.' The farmer is persuaded that he is free, but he cannot sell the wine from his own vinyard without paying the state probably more than the wine is worth."

A general conviction of the folly of legislation, and the fallacy of representation, is not to be expected from argument, but only from the experience of better results from other methods of action. To initiate these we must influence the persons, the live forces, least interested in political schemes. Now, this negativ indication givs the sex excluded from the ballot and from government, and who least inclined to alcoholic forms of intemperance, hav also the strongest personal interest in the temperance of men, as their husbands, their fathers, and their children.

In the natural constitution of life there is such a correlation between faculty and desire, that the possession of facultativ power awakens the desire to exercise it. This we observe in the muscular development of the child and its proportional activity, then in the experimental curiosities and explorativ tendencies which coincide with cerebral development.

Now, the influential faculty of woman has likewise its natural physiological ambitions, which, if confined, in most of them, to household details, transcend these in a goodly number of the stronger-minded.

The restless impulsion of the woman's rights movement, checked for a while in its political ambition, combines with the "higher education" now received by many young ladies to produce a self-conscious force, susceptible of social direction.

It is deplorable to see a fine specimen of woman, like Elizabeth Cady Stanton, pounding away at the doors of the legislativ chamber, closed against her ambition, when her forces, socially directed, could achieve results far superior to the political. The Franco-Prussian war was immediately due to a similar misdirection of the energies of Eugénie. Here is a whole army of live force, undisciplined, but spoiling for a fight with the abuses which are marshaled under a masculin legislation. Here, reformers, is your chance—see, in directly opposing the Prohibitist agitator, we meet the popular prejudice in favor of legislation, and the personal ambitions of the politician. In circumventing him by female influence, we avoid both these obstacles, we avail ourselvs of living interests, of a spontaneous force that only needs guidance and encouragement. In guiding it, we are free to eschew the senseless indiscriminate opposition to pure wines and beers, wholesomer than tea or coffee, and common to the use of both sexes. We concentrate our force against the still, or we relegate this to uses of the arts, while enrolling the vintner and brewer among our partisans. TEMPERANCE.

Fruits of Christianity.

"The civilization of London—would not some of the barbarous tribes whom the English hav been butchering during the last decade be heartily ashamed of it, if foreign travelers were able to convict them of the practices common at the West End? What race has Mr. Stanley in all his journeys through the great Congo Valley discovered that is as cruel and as monstrous in its treatment of the gentler half of humanity as civilized London? Is there no morality in English religion, no mercy in English blood? The Pall Mall Gazette may end by convincing us all that the Caucasian is well nigh played out as a moral agent."

I clip the above from the Tribune of to-day, the 12th of July, 1885, and yet these hypocrits will deny that Christianity is a failure. After nineteen hundred years, this is the outcome of the religion of Christ as a great moral force. They ask, Is there no morality in English religion? and well they may; and not only English religion but American religion also, and French religion, and Italian religion, and, in fact, the religion of all countries where Christianity exists. Is it not too true of our own country in every town and city in the whole continent? Does the expose of the Pall Mall Gazette show up more crime and lust and villainy than we know exists among ourselvs? Don't we know that society is only veneered very slightly with common decency, while it is rotten at the core? People go to church in crowds on Sunday and wallow in filth and the most disgusting immoralities the rest of the week. Only to-day, in this city of Harrisburgh, where I am sojourning for the day, I was resting in the beautiful grounds surrounding the state house, on the same seat with a man who, in answer to my remark that this was a very religious town, judging by the numbers of people on the way to church, said: "Ah, but if you only could know the amount of wickedness continuously going on in this very ward, you would alter your opinion. I was born and raised here, and my business has led me to know something of the ways of both men and women who pass for very good Christians. I hav been out at all times in the night and hav seen them come out after someone had opened the door and look around to see if the road was clear, and one go one way and the other another. My friends put my name on the ticket for constable and elected me, but I would not accept it, knowing as I did that there was no less than nineteen houses of ill fame," or sporting houses, I think he called them, who paid hush money to the officers in that very ward, and he must either go in with them or suffer their enmity. Said he: "It's no use making laws against these things, for the whole mass is tainted, and the very officers you intrust with their execution only use it to increase their own income." And yet these hypocrits will claim that Christianity is a blessing and a great moral engin above all others to make men and women virtuous! Why, even Mormonism is better than this; they perform their wickedness at least under the form of law, and the woman is not blasted for life, as is the case with us, and when once she falls is bound to be a prostitute the remainder of her days, while the man may and does fill the highest offices in the land. Mormonism at least prevents prostitution.

But what can be done to improve this state of things? I can see no way out of this while the people can be led by the nose as they are by organized bands of priests. While they can be made to believe that there is a future happy life in store for them if they only believe in ghosts, I can see no help for them. This belief in future worlds must be eradicated before people will learn to do right in this. It is a mighty work, but it must be done, and done by the young and with the young; and sometimes I almost despair. When I was young I used to think that certainly in twenty-five years, in a free country like this, the people would see the folly of being led by the priests, but now at seventy years I seem to see them bound as fast as ever to their idols; and though we hav forced from them some of their hell-fire doctrins, they still hav the masses fast by the throat, and all that I hav been able to do is to show them that a man can liv an honest, upright life and at the same time be an unbeliever in any of their myths.

JOHN DOWNES.

"Danger from an Atheistic Press."

We hav seen nothing that bears stronger evidence of the spread of Freethought than the testimony of one of our theological enemies, Simeon Gilbert, D.D., of Chicago. In the Independent of July 16th he says:

There is a spirit of Atheism in the air. It comes to us from the Old World; it springs indigenous in the New. It filters down from the airy denials of the Materialistic philosophy; it steams up from the slums. When the mountains are drenched, the hills and valleys will not long escape. When men converse by telephone half-way across the continent, and by telegraph a word flashes still and swift around the world, we may be sure it will not take a great while for the most extreme speculativ tenet of a Spencer, a Haeckel, a Schopenhauer even, to let fall its seed among the people, and then begin to bring forth its fruit after its own kind. Between the great scholars and thinkers on the one hand, and the toiling wage-earners and bread-winners on the other, the intellectual tendency is sorely continuous. The saying is a true one: "He is a fool who thinks nobody else thinks." All men are thinking nowadays. It is no longer a question whether men shall think or not; it is not the question whether there shall be education for the people, or no education for the people. The question is, Of what kind are their thoughts, of what character the popular education?

"If you hav any faith," said Goethe, "giv me the benefit of it. I hav doubts enough of my own." "They bite us," says Emerson, "and we go mad." Has Christianity its missions, its untiring propaganda? So has Atheism; so has Socialism; so has even that most Satanic phase of modern Socialism, the "anarchic revolution." And to-day, in countless forms, in all our leading cities, by means of its own organizations and its own press, the hideous contagion is spreading.

A few mornings ago, entering the rooms where a whole batch of organs of Atheism and of Socialism in Chicago are published, there was noticed on the wall a large and finely-executed engraving, presenting a group of portraits of the leading theorists and propagandists of the new scheme of "anarchy" that is to set men free. On one corner of this eminently speaking picture was a scroll of honor bearing the one name "Darwin."

Mr. Darwin was no Socialist—strictly speaking, no Atheist; only in the practical godlessness of the Materialistic philosophy there was supposed to be hidden any amount of social dynamite. "Philosophy can bake no bread," says Novalis, "but she can procure for us God, freedom, immortality." But, on the contrary, there is a philosophy of Materialism now abroad which is doing its utmost to extinguish the very thought of God, of the spiritual soul, of immortality.

The term Atheism, as here used, does not hav in mind merely those who brazenly lift the face against the skies and shout their denials of God; for all that concerns life and conduct, or the weal of society, Agnosticism is as good as Atheism. It amounts, in the end, to much the same thing. As Mr. Frederic Harrison lately remarked, respecting the "ghostly religion" of Mr. Spencer, "Agnosticism is a mere raft for shipwrecked believers"—"a milder form of the Voltairian hatred of religion that was current in the last century;" "a subterfuge, an excuse for refusing to answer a troublesome question." As certain of the leaders in the anarchic revolution avow, with a horrible bluntness characteristic of them, as if words were clubs and thoughts were daggers and fire-brands: "We are not Atheists," they say; "we are simply done with God. If there be a God, he is no God for us!' It is because there are so many thousands in our cities—not all foreigners either—who are ready to say in their hearts, "We are done with God!" and so many other thousands quick to echo the horrible word, that the dangers to society from an Atheistic press are so real. Always it is in theories and ideas that revolutions hav their genesis. Nor can anyone who pauses a moment to think fail to see what the moral, the social, it may be the political, consequences of all these firebrands of the Atheistic revolt are liable to be.

Then, besides the fact that there are always those who hav their own private reasons for not liking to retain God in their thought, how often the trials of life harden, the wrongs of life madden and exasperate. The era of discoveries and inventions has upset the old order of things, and revolutionized the industries of the world. It is almost as if it were a new world into which we hav come. A multitude of old notions and customs hav vanished before the new spirit of the time. It is a period of tremendous transitions. Enormous populations hav been thrust into overcrowded cities. Wholly new adjustments, both industrial and social, hav to be devised. It is like the resetting of broken limbs or dislocated joints, when awkward hands are blindly fierce with their own several experiments. Strange doors of hope open to many; while, for myriads of others, all doors seem to close, as it were, with a slam in the face.

The acting sense that things are not what they ought to be creates the deepest unrest. As the social chasms widen, the popular exasperation grows reckless. There is much that offers pretexts for disbelief, and tempts to despair.

And thus, side by side, acting and reacting, we behold Atheism—which is Anarchy in the individual soul—and the so-called "Anarchistic Socialism," both plunging headlong and desperate, they know not whither. Nor let anyone imagin that the propagandists of Atheism and Socialism are slow to appreciate the power, as weapons, there is in winged words. We shall be very unwise if we do not wake up to see what they are so busy doing.

The ignorant and hard elements of society, anywhere, it is said, if neglected, go to the bad. But in the cities, at any rate, there are no "neglected" classes; the devil cultivates every neglected field; on every unoccupied corner he builds his own shops and circulates his own literature.

The Congregational "Club," East and West, and other religious organizations, do well to recognize the power of the press; they do well to recognize the fact that its power does not all go one way. The new evangelism will not get on very far in its undertaking without the aid of the press; neither will it hav gone far before being made sharply aware of the fact that just here it will encounter one of its worst antagonists.

There is an Atheistic press; numerous, multiform, and disseminated with a dead-in-earnest assiduity. It is in its way the breath of a pestilence. Because it does not come into your home is no sign that it does not go into other homes.

Here, for instance, lying before me is a big bundle of those more or less influential edicts of the Atheistic press, from a single city; not all equally outspoken and defiant, but all steeped to the lips in the spirit of denial; some of them reeking with the "sweltering venom" of blasphemy; not a few so hot with wrath and rage it almost blisters the hand to hold them!

Nothing is more certain than that alarm, in view of its baleful blight, is most reasonable. The present is an age of power, of freedom of thought; so is it the "era of dynamite." If things are allowed to go on in our leading cities as they hav been going on of late and as they are going on to-day, those who shall come after us will find that it is a fine heritage of dragons' teeth we hav let the enemy sow up and down in our fields. Let but the conditions be favorable, a careless lamp may fire a wire, a spark explode a magazin, a torch consume a city; an Atheistic press let loose and set going its trains of influences in individual hearts, in human society, in cities large and small, so full of blasting and blight, we shall, ere long, wonder at nothing so much as at our heedlessness and apathy in the matter of endeavoring to prevent it.

Much of this, of course, is rant, and some of the rant is not worth reproducing, but it is for all that a cry that shows the churches are hurt. As such it is substantial encouragement to persevere. It is proved that Christianity is a force positivly detrimental to true morality, and it must giv place to a philosophy which shall elevate the character of man by taking his thoughts from a guessed-about future and enabling him to improve the here and now. There is no heaven, but there is an earth, and all of man's energies are needed to make it habitable.

Whipple, Not Wright.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Friend: The correspondent of the Liberator, "C. K. W.," was Charles K. Whipple, of Boston. He was a regular correspondent for several years, and his letters were of the greatest interest to the readers of that paper, because through them we were able to obtain facts connected with the "Christian" work of the churches, not easily arrived at in any other way. Mr. Whipple had been a very orthodox Christian, and was a life member of most of their societies—missionary, Bible, tract, etc. Being a life member, he always made it his special business to attend the annual and business meetings of the same and reported their doings, which doings were often anything but creditable to professed followers of the reputed Christ. Mr. Whipple, like most of the early Abolitionists, found it impossible to remain in an orthodox church, and advocate the immediate emancipation of the slave. He became a member of Theodore Parker's society, and so long as I knew him was a zealous worker in the cause of humanity.

I suppose to be a Christian, as the word has been understood for this century, not to say anything of the earlier ones, means to believe in the nonsense of the Bible and to practice its teachings, but the Abolitionists soon found that an impossibility, and most of us emancipated ourselvs from all connection with Christian organizations. Our worst foes were the ministers, and they scrupled at no word or act to destroy the influence of an antislavery speaker. I was myself mobbed several times, and each time the mob was led by a clergyman. If I were an artist, as skilful as the one who represents so admirably the work of the church in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I should like to giv you a page representing some of the scenes through which I hav passed in this Christian country, but I am not, and perhaps its just as well. The workers of to-day hav enough to contend with; superstition is still activ; it may not believe in the immaculate conception, but it believes in materialization, and all sorts of demonology, which put the witchcraft of former times entirely in the shade. Christians often pray for a baptism of the Holy Ghost. I would pray most fervently, if I only knew any power who could grant the petition, "Oh, send us a baptism of common sense!" LUCY N. COLMAN.

Work to Be Done.

The Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, to be held at Albany, Sept. 11th to 13th, promises to be large in numbers and influence. To let slip the opportunity of emphasizing the demands of Liberals would be very poor generalship. Albany is the home of law. Its people are familiar with lawmaking, and to them a political delegation is the most easily comprehended argument. The managers of the Convention propose, therefore, to utilize the vast influence which it will hav in favor of the following Memorial to the legislature:

To the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York in General Session Convened:

The Constitution of our State guarantees that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this State to all mankind." The general principle of American government is equality of all men before the law. This, as your honorable body is aware, involves the principle, already acknowledged in theory, of the total separation of Church and State. But Church and State are now practically united by the following statutes:

1. The law exempting church property from taxation.

2. The laws appropriating money from the public treasury for the support of institutions founded and managed chiefly by sectarian denominations.

3. The law compelling the observance of Sunday as a religious holy day.

The undersigned, citizens of the State of New York, do therefore respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body to repeal all the laws or parts of laws of this State which are violations of the above principles. Our reasons for asking this are:

1. The churches are voluntary associations properly to be supported by the voluntary contributions of their members. 2. The State is compulsory. Every citizen must pay taxes. And we submit that it is unjust to a large and growing body of voters to be compelled to pay for the support of churches which they cannot conscientiously attend; for the hire of ministers in our legislature and public institutions, in whose doctrins they are unable to believe; and to observe as holy a day to them no more sacred than any other. We also submit that the exemption of churches from taxation, the appropriation of money for hire of ministers and support of sectarian institutions, and the legal observance of Sunday as a holy day, are showing preference to one form of religion, are abridgments of the free exercise of religious preferences, and therefore unconstitutional.

The laws and parts of laws which will hav to be repealed are as follows: Chap. XIII. of Title I., Part I. Revised Statutes, to be amended by striking out of subdivision 3 of section 4 the words, "every building for public worship;" and the whole of subdivision 8. The following sections of the Penal Code should also be repealed: Sections 255 to 267 inclusiv, also sections 269, 270, 276, 277, and subdivision 2 of section 275. Also the whole of Art. VI., chap. 20, Title 8, Part I., of Revised Statutes; also Section 70 of Art. VIII. chap. 20, Title 8, Part I., sections 71 and 72, also the whole of Article IX.

The legislature will meet next January. The Senate will be composed of the same men as the last Senate (which passed the Freedom of Worship bill), but the Assembly will be composed of men to be elected this fall. This Memorial should be pushed this summer, and Freethinkers should agree to use their influence in electing to the Assembly men who will favor it. The petition will be printed separately, and we ask everyone who may receive a copy of it to obtain the greatest possible number of signatures. Let it go to the legislature with a hundred thousand names, and indorsed by a representativ convention, and the legislature will be compelled to act upon it. That the laws will be repealed next winter we are not so politically blind as to expect. But we do expect to force the discussion of these questions, and when the people understand them we hav no fear for the result.

A petition is now being circulated by a body of citizens of this city calling themselvs "The Central Committee for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State." It is a Protestant measure, and calls for an amendment to our state constitution. Its object is to defeat the Catholics in their efforts to obtain equal recognition in our state institutions. Ostensibly the petition is good—but we fear it. The circular which accompanies it explains that the party proposes such amendment as will prohibit the making of laws recognizing the claims of any one sect. But though sects may be ignored, any amendment proposed by these men would still recognize Christianity. The workers for the measure are Henry A. Cram, one of the managers of the House of Refuge, and the organizing secretary is Mr. Charles M. Plumb, 236 East 49th street, this city. Mr. Cram's ideas of the separation of church and state may be known by his works. He claims that the House of Refuge, on Randall's Island, is a model unsectarian institution. It is, however, Christian through and through, and conducted on lines widely divergent from the true theory of secular government. As Adler says, the Manual of Instruction is scarlet with sectarianism. Mr. Cram proposes to perpetuate by constitutional amendment this Christian sectarianism and make Protestantism a part of our organic law.

It is high time, therefore, for the Freethinkers to be up and doing. We might as well hav the Catholics quartered upon the state treasury as the Protestants. We want a constitutional amendment that shall prohibit the payment of a single cent to any institution not managed exclusivly by the state, and forbidding the employment in any state institution of any religious teacher, and forbidding also the teaching of any religion.

The Memorial will be printed immediately. Let every Freethinker exert himself to the utmost to obtain signatures.

The Pope's Poverty.

Appealing for funds for the pope a Catholic paper says:

"Robbed of his rightful revenues, and despoiled of his every possession, the spiritual father in Christendom has no other means but the generosity of the faithful with which to bear the heavy expenses necessarily devolving upon his high station, and to respond to the countless calls upon his charity by the stricken and unfortunate everywhere. Nor shall appeals in aid of the holy father be made in vain. The unnumbered tribes and tongues who bear the sign of the cross on their foreheads will, even in their poverty, make his needs their own. Leo, in his want and loneliness, is dearer, if possible, to Catholic hearts than if the pomp and pageantry of power surrounded his pontifical throne. Whilst faith livs the successor of the fisherman shall not want. In his Vatican prison and personal poverty, Leo XIII. is to-day richer and more powerful than those who sway the scepters of empires."

Undoubtedly the readers of the paper will believe that; but what a despicable lie it is! The Italian people never robbed the pope. They only put an end to his robbing them. If he has no other means than the "generosity of the faithful," that "generosity" is quite sufficient. The whole Catholic church is tributary to Rome, and the whole Catholic populations are tributary to the church. Every Catholic servant girl in the country must pay five or ten cents to attend church; every Catholic merchant is drained to support the priest; every Catholic lady is humbugged into giving all, and more than her means will stand; every Catholic marriage is a source of revenue, and every Catholic funeral is a bonanza for the priest of the parish. Masses for the repose of the dead hav to be paid for all through the year, until it costs as much to get a soul out of purgatory as it did to support the man through his life. The pope can hav as much money as he wants, and he does hav it. Last year the "Peter's Pence" fund ran up into the millions, and this was for the pope's personal use. The revenues of the Catholic church are simply enormous. Sentimental talk about "Leo in his want" is outrageous hypocrisy. He is not a "prisoner" in any sense. He is not lowly, for he maintains a "court" superior in numbers and sham "dignity" to many royal princes; and though he poses in the picturesque attitude of injured piety, he is really a most powerful despot.

From top to bottom, the Catholic church is a brazen lie.

An Older Gospel than Matthew's.

A fragment of a gospel older than that of Matthew has just been discovered. Its dimensions are about one and one-third of an inch by one and two-thirds, making an area of two square inches. On this little bit of papyrus is written seven lines of Greek, containing about 105 words corresponding to Matt. xxvi, 30–34, and Mark xiv, 28–30. The manuscript is assigned to the third century by Dr. Bickell, of the University of Innsbruck, Tyrol. Nine words are undecipherable, and many of the letters besides are obliterated or missing. Here is a translation of the fragment line for line:

1. "But after supper, as they went out . . .
2. "You will take offense this night . . .
3. "According to the scriptures, 'I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered'
4. "Then Peter spake . . .
5. "And if all not I . . .
6. "He said to him . . .
7. "The cock will crow twice, and before that thou shalt deny me thrice."

By comparing this with Matthew and Mark, which agree almost verbatim, it will be seen that there are two important omissions, to wit:

"And when they had sung a hymn."

"But after I am risen I will go before you into Galilee."

The doctors of divinity are chagrined to find that the writer of this early gospel has "left out the most striking and important passage in our Lord's conversation with his disciples." As if, because a later scribe recorded it, there should be no doubt that Jesus said, "After I am risen I will go before you into Galilee." This prophecy of Jesus is found only in Matthew and Luke? Was it fulfilled? Mark says nothing about the fulfilment, but Matthew makes an angel at the sepulcher say to the two Marys:

"He is not here; for he is risen as he said. Come and see the place where the Lord lay.

"And go quickly and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead, and behold he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him. Lo, I hav told you" . . .

"Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them.

"And when they saw him they worshiped him, but some doubted."

But Matthew says nothing about an ascension. Nor does Mark say a word about the risen Jesus meeting his disciples in Galilee; on the contrary he is made to appear first to the women, then to two of the disciples as they walked into the country, and lastly to the eleven as they sat at meat. And even this part of Mark's gospel relating to the appearance to the disciples is not found in the two oldest Greek codices, the Sinaitic and the Vatican; so that the gospel really ends with the flight of the women from the sepulcher, who went away trembling and amazed, "neither said they anything to any man."

If, therefore, we eliminate this addition to Mark, namely, the last twelve verses of chapter xvi, the fact of the ascension of Jesus rests entirely on the testimony of Luke, who describes it more particularly in Acts.

And in regard to the resurrection, we hav in the four gospels the following contradictions:

Only one woman came to the sepulcher (John).

Two women came (Matt.).

Three women came (Mark).

More than three came (Luke).

It was sunrise (Mark).

It was sometime before sunrise (John).

Two angels were seen standing up (Luke).

But one angel was seen, and he was sitting down (Matt.).

Two angels were seen within the sepulcher (John).

But one angel was seen within the sepulcher (Mark).

The one angel seen was without the sepulcher (Matt.).

The women went and told the disciples of the resurrection (Matt.; Luke).

The women did not go and tell the disciples (Mark).

The angels appeared after Peter and John visited the sepulcher (John).

The angels appeared before Peter alone visited the sepulcher (Luke).

Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene only (Mark; John).

Jesus appeared first to the two Marys (Matt.).

He appeared to neither of the Marys (Luke).

Jesus first appeared to the eleven disciples in a room at Jerusalem (Luke; John).

He first appeared to them on a mountain in Galilee (Matt.).

Jesus ascended from Mount Olivet (Acts).

He ascended from Bethany (Luke).

Did he ascend from either place? (Mark.)

Did he ascend at all? (John.)

These palpable and striking self-contradictions of the so-called inspired word of God cannot be reconciled by any ingenuity of interpretation, said the late Wm. Lloyd Garrison, excepting that which can prove white to be black and black to be white. And now from time to time, as fragments of early manuscripts or copies of them come to light they only add to the perplexity of the priesthood. Already a distinguished Roman Catholic divine, Dr. Harnack, frankly admits that the discovery of this little fragment of an earlier gospel than that of Matthew "goes far toward suggesting a doubt as to whether the gospels ascribed to Matthew and Mark were, in the form in which we know them now, composed by those disciples." In other words, our present gospels hav been altered and tampered with by priests of the first, second, third, and fourth centuries, until we are unable to tell how much of the scriptures is the inspired word of God.

As regards the alleged resurrection and ascension of Jesus there is much more historical probability in the story as told in the "Toldoth Jeshu." Jesus having been stoned to death, hanged and buried:

"About the middle of the night his disciples came and sat down by the grave and wept and mourned for him.

"Judas seeing this, took away the body and hid it in his garden under a brook. Diverting the water elsewhere, he buried the body in the channel and then brought the water back.

"On the morrow when the disciples came again and sat down to weep Judas said to them, Why do ye weep? Look and see if the buried man is there.

"And when they looked and found he was not there, the miserable crowd cried out, He is not in the grave, but hath ascended to heaven.

"For he foretold this himself when alive."

This was in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about 75 B.C. The queen summoned the wise men to account for the disappearance of the body, and the result was that Judas was compelled to produce it. The body was brought before her majesty tied to the tail of a horse, and the wise men said, "Behold the man of whom thou hast said, He hath gone up to heaven."

Catholicism in Politics.

Religion and politics are getting mixed in this state. The effort of the Republican party last fall to capture Catholic votes because Mr. Blaine's mother was a member of the Catholic church; Mr. Burchard's famous speech, in which he accused the Democracy of being the party of rum, Romanism, and rebellion; the subsequent attempts of the Republicans in our state Senate and the Democrats in the state Assembly to win suffrages by passing the "Freedom of Worship" bill, hav all contributed to this mixing. But the chief cause is that Tammany Hall is almost entirely Catholic, and John Kelly, the "boss," is a nephew of Cardinal McCloskey. For several years, through Kelly, and from him through McCloskey, the Catholic church has run this city, and its stealings from our city treasury hav been simply enormous. They hav, in fact, been limited only by the church's needs and the available amount of money on hand.

When Edward Cooper, son of Peter Cooper, was mayor of this city in 1879 and 1880, a resolution was passed by the board of aldermen exempting the Roman Catholic orphan asylums at No. 32 Prince street, and on Fifth and Madison avenues, between 51st and 52d streets, from the payments of all taxes or rents for the use of Croton water. This exemption amounted to about $1,500 per year.

On legal grounds Mr. Cooper vetoed this bill. He was sustained by Corporation-counsel Whitney, now secretary of the navy, who gave it as his opinion that until the debt created for the introduction of water into the city should hav been extinguished the revenue from the use of Croton could not be diverted from the sinking fund.

Mr. Cooper's name has been recently mentioned in connection with the candidature for governor. Mr. Cooper may be or may not be a good man for that office. At any rate, there is very little chance that his party will nominate him. But the Catholic church has made haste, through Mr. Joseph J. O'Donahue, to avow her eternal opposition to him because he vetoed the resolution giving two Catholic institutions free water forever. Mr. O'Donahue is a man high in the councils of Tammany Hall, and he says he will defeat Mr. Cooper if it is possible to do so. O'Donahue means Tammany, and Tammany means the Catholic church.

It is a pitiful condition to which the Empire state and the metropolis of the western continent hav sunk, when the selection of the chief officers is dictated by a hierarchy of despotic tyrants, who hav nothing whatever in common with American traditions and principles.

To the Beecher Kind of Preachers.

Is a spade a spade, or is it an argument, "when rightly understood," for the divine origin of Christianity?

Editorial Notes.

THE Freethinkers at Chapel Hill, Texas, are building a hall.

COLONEL KELSO, the genial author of "Bible Analyzed," is visiting Colorado, lecturing occasionally as he finds opportunity.

THE London Republican is republishing the portraits from our ANNUAL. The July number contains the portrait of Thomas Paine, embellished with a sketch of his life.

SOUTH ORANGE, N. J., is excited over the refusal of Merchant George D. Hankins to discontinue the playing of lawn tenis on Sunday. The church authorities threaten to hav him arrested, but he defies them.

AT Barcelona, Spain, there is a Union of Freethinkers, who publish an Infidel journal. It is called La Tronada. Surely there is reason for congratulation when in priest-ridden Spain Infidelity can be advocated.

A TOWN has been discovered near the state line of Massachusetts of some two hundred inhabitants in which has never been a physician, lawyer, minister, or liquor saloon. The people are healthy, peaceful, moral, and sober. Efforts are being made to start a church there, and soon the other evils may also be found. Why can't the church let well enough alone?

WE hav received the first number of George Chainey and Anna Kimball's Gnostic. It is well printed, and the cover is particularly gorgeous, being black paper with silvered letters and Theosophical symbols. The principal articles are Mr. Chainey's lecture upon Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," "The Idyl of the White Lotus," and a defense of Mesdames Blavatsky and Kimball. The general drift of the magazine is Theosophical, and those interested will find it entertaining reading. The price is ten cents. Published at 1003 1-2 Broadway, Oakland, Cal. We are obliged to Mr. Chainey for his courtesy in advertising THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DYNAMITER GORSUCH has been arrested for inciting to riot. A meeting of the English, Scotch, and Welch strikers was called in the town hall of Newburg, near Cleveland, and Mr. Gorsuch addressed them. In the course of his remarks he is reported to hav said:

"Men, you are battling in a noble cause, and I hope you will succeed. I trust that your efforts against the mill bosses will result in either the destruction of their property or the raising of your wages. You ought to fight. Destroy everything, unless your aims are accomplished. You were not born to starve. Society and wealth make war upon you, and you should declare war upon wealth. Down with the aristocrats! That resounded throughout Europe once, and made the rich and oppressors of the poor tremble with terror. Up in Chicago we hav just gone through a strike and been successful, but it was only by force and war that we were able to wring anything from the rich and bloated bondholders. Employ everything in your power. Dynamite is the greatest and most effectiv friend of the poor. Place cartridges under the buildings, and blow them up. I bav here a small and seemingly harmless little instrument [holding up a small glass bottle]. In this little bottle enough dynamite can be placed to blow to pieces the strongest building. Now, what I want you to do is to take a number of these little instruments, fill them with dynamite, and place them upon the street car track. When the wheels of the cars touch them they will explode and blow the car to pieces. This will interrupt travel, and people will begin to dread you."

At this juncture several police officers who were in the crowd, dressed in citizens' clothes, made a dash for the speaker and placed him under arrest. He was taken through the crowd, no effort of any kind being made to rescue him. He was then shackled and put aboard a Broadway car, crowded with police officers, and brought to the Central Station. The Times correspondent says that papers charging him with inciting a riot and with conspiracy are already prepared, but as there was no riot, and as it is extremely unlikely that he engaged in any conspiracy, we do not see how he can justly be punished by being sent to the penitentiary, as is threatened. This is supposed to be a free country, in which men are punished only for what they do, not for what they say. If any of Mr. Gorsuch's listeners had been so influenced by his words as to hav proceeded to destroy property, the orator might then properly be held accountable. As nothing of the kind occurred, the arrest of Mr. Gorsuch is an outrage which his conviction could only deepen. It is better that the right of free speech should be a thousand times abused than once destroyed.

WE congratulate the Independent upon this advance toward Freethought: "It strikes us as supersensitivness, as being righteous over much, that the Grand Master, so-called, of the Masonic lodges of Canada has decided that an Agnostic cannot enter that mystical order, and that the expulsion of one Harrison from a Toronto lodge for the offense of Agnosticism was justifiable. 'No person,' says the Grand Master, 'can be initiated who does not believe in the true God, the great architect of the universe.' We hav always believed in allowing even Atheists the full privileges of all citizens to testify in our courts; and we see no justice in shutting them out of our insurance companies."

IN the Wanganui, New Zealand, Freethought Review for June we find the following hearty praise of our ANNUAL: "We are indebted to Dr. York for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1885. It is, without exception, the best Freethought annual we hav seen. Besides containing an almanac for the year, it has a history of the past year's work in the United States, an account of the National Liberal League, a description of the Bennett Memorial, well-written articles by eminent American Freethinkers, and last, not by any means least, excellent portraits of all the leading workers in the field. It starts with Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, Bennett, Leland, Wakeman, Remsburg, Watts, Putnam, Seaver, Dr. York, Mendum, Macdonald, H. L. Green, Denton, 'Elmina,' Susan Wixon, and others. We can cordially recommend it to Freethinkers everywhere."

THE New York correspondent of the Providence Telegram writes about Mr. Beecher, Talmage, and Colonel Ingersoll: "While Beecher is thinking away in Plymouth church, Talmage is not idle in the Tabernacle. As the boys say, 'Talmage is a corker.' He draws a much larger crowd than Beecher, but it is a different crowd. It is the crowd without brains—the crowd that likes to be amused and finds Talmage a cheap man to amuse them. He is sensational, and so is Beecher, but they do not conflict. Beecher's sensationalism consists in presenting startling facts about education, or religion, or politics. Talmage's sensationalism consists in a monkey show, gyrating on the platform like a clown, and by raking up old and disputed topics for discussion, and in reopening old sores. The cornetist who leads the singing helps to attract the crowd, and Talmage knows the cords of the human heart, for he plays on them unceasingly. He does not seek to educate in religious matters. He selects a text and around that he weaves a garland of words, and here and there he interspersed odd anecdotes and stories that sometimes cause a smile or a tear. Beecher does none of this. He is above it, and there are some things that he will not boldly plunge into. Talmage will undertake anything for notoriety. He would write a Bible if he were asked to. Both Beecher and Talmage hav had their tussles with Bob Ingersoll, but havn't you noticed that Beecher has not had much to say against Royal Bob lately? Talmage, however, seldom misses a chance to hit the great orator. His blow is a blow of sandbag, though. He doesn't sharpen a delicate stilletto and stick it into his opponent's heart as Beecher does. Talmage exhausts himself at one swoop, and then Ingersoll jumps on him, and if one man ever gave another a drubbing on the platform, Ingersoll certainly did Talmage. A few years ago Ingersoll wrote a paper on 'The Christian Religion' that was published in the North American Review. It was a very able article, and attracted great attention. It was nothing more than the old views that Ingersoll had so often expressed in public, but each sentence was effectiv, and having been published in so prominent a magazine, they were given more weight than they really deserved. Thorndyke Rice, editor of the Review, had engaged Judge Jere Black, of Pennsylvania, to reply to the article. Black had given the subject much thought and study. He was the ablest constitutional lawyer in the country. He was a splendid speaker, a man of rare attainments, a clear logician; he was just the man to reply to Ingersoll, and to smash into atoms the indictment that Ingersoll had drawn up. The church people were confident. They believed their knight would slay the Infidel. Well, the article was published, and candor compels the admission that it was a lamentable failure. Black seemed to hav lost his grip, but he severely denounced Ingersoll as a charlatan, and in a general way scoffed at his unbelief. To this Ingersoll replied, and Black admitted that for once he had been worsted. The great Infidel did not spare his man. He took off his hair and hide at the same time, and left his victim without a word to say. It was at this juncture that Beecher came to the front, and this will establish the point that I hav made—that there are some contracts too big for him to enter into. Editor Rice called on Beecher. 'Hav you read the discussion between Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Black?' he asked him. 'Yes, very carefully,' was Beecher's reply. 'Which do you think has the best of it?' 'Ingersoll, decidedly.' 'But the argument is not finished, Mr. Beecher, and I came to ask you to take up the case against Ingersoll and refute his statements.' 'I should like to very much.' 'Then, why not do it? I will giv you $5,000 for a paper on "The Christian Religion" that will dispose of this Atheistic question once and forever.' 'Yes, I guess you would,' concluded Beecher, 'but I won't undertake it. I can't do it. No man can do it. It is an impossibility. We may believe that Ingersoll is wrong, but we can't giv positiv proof of it.' That was manly, anyhow."

Letters from Friends.

WILKESBARRE, PA., July 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: While hundreds are going by my window to listen to the various subjects preached on at the churches, I will ask permission to amuse your correspondent J. Burgess, of Zanesville, Ohio, in issue of July 11th, who sends out a challenge on the subject of spirits.

If the gentleman is not one of the T. Winter order of men, whose emphatic say-so admits of no contradiction, and who will ignore all facts and phenomena, I may be able to amuse him, at least, by calling his attention to what nature is doing in the way of spiritual things. It seems to me that Ohio is a little suspicious to begin with, because T. Winter resides in Cincinnati, but then there is nothing like trying. Mr. Burgess starts out with two assumptions, and unfortunately decides the very questions in dispute by presuming that "it cannot be disputed—when dead it ends all and ends the individuality of the person." Again: "The elements of which the body is composed separate and are eliminated into other forms and things, and are absorbed into and become a part of the fountain-head." Then he says, "I presume this view will not or cannot be denied successfully, and is the sum and substance of all we know or hav the proof." The above embraces the exact points in dispute between the Materialists and Spiritualists, and why presume that they cannot be disputed, when they are disputed all the time? Mr. Burgess should not start out by begging the questions in dispute. The Spiritualist does dispute it from the start. He denies that elements ever change; forms of matter change, but the nature of the element never does. The Spiritualist argues that matter never had a creator and of necessity has no destroyer. There is do "fountain-head" to matter; it does not go to any fountain-head, as is assumed, while the atoms that compose the material body at death pass away into other combinations, so far as the body is concerned, all the refined particles which are eliminated go into a form to be reorganized into a temple for the residence of the spirit, just as naturally as the original germ was formed into a human organism, to develop the human mind in. Now, to prove that such is the case, and that there is such a spirit body, which retains all there is of the mind or soul of any particular person, we hav to establish it by appealing to certain phenomena which giv out the intelligence of particular persons, who are known to hav lived within a human body, and who hav died. This established, it would argue the doctrin of the conservation of force in its entirety, and thus only can it be done. To argue the conservation of force while admitting or contending that all human force could die or pass into nothing, is breaking the main link in the chain of the argument, as every man of sense admits that all the force which any being can exert comes from his mind, and on this hypothesis all nature is a mind force, governed by inherent laws of motion, which are external, and always manifest in an orderly way, the observation of which by man gives him all his intelligence. Hence nature's manifestations are all intelligent. To contend that man's body by the laws of its desires and appetites was constantly governing him in all that he did would simply make an automatic machine for the play of material forces, and reduce the grandeur of the human mind to the meanest possible conception. What would become of the grand works of humanity for humanity's good? What of all the mental labor and study for the advancement of science and philosophy? What of mathematics and metaphysics? What, in fact, of everything that makes man the crowning work of natural force? If nature has anywhere developed a greater thing on earth than man, with his conscious spirit to retain and develop in the direction of immortality, I hav no conception of it. Now, it follows that as the force that has brought about all this manhood is intelligent force—I do not say personal, but universal—so is man, the result, an intelligent force, equally eternal. And as this force has constantly inspired him to labor for the higher achievements and objects of life, and for immortality, so must he be immortal in his very essence. "Well," says Mr. Burgess, "that is a finely spun theory, but now prove it." This shall be the object of the balance of this article. Spiritual phenomena—what are they? If there is such a thing as a spirit it is perfectly natural that it should do something to show it, by coming in contact with humanity, and in some way do something that human beings cannot do, and thereby manifest its presence and its peculiar mental characteristics. This we claim is being done over the whole world by spirits and is bringing one Materialist after another into a belief in immortality. As a case in point, I may refer to the communication from Liberal, Mo., a week or so ago, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which it is clearly demonstrated that something purporting itself to be a spirit did write communications upon a slate, which was placed within a closet, and absolutely not in any way in contact with the medium. I was introduced to Mr. Walser at the Watkins Convention a few years ago, and from his statements, and non-belief in Spiritualism at the time, while making his appeal for assistance to build up schools, etc., in Liberal, was induced to inquire whether by his statement any Spiritualists would be tolerated in that place. And yet we find by the above article, sworn to, is the name of Mr. Walser. No one should doubt the sincerity of an honest Materialist who admits that intelligent communications come upon slates, untouched by any mortal hand. The writing was the most characteristic of D. M. Bennett that I hav yet seen, and is most likely because of the independent manner in which it was done. It is characteristic, because if he has the choice of doing a thing he will surely always do it in the least impeachable way.

When Mr. Burgess makes the wholesale statement that all such phenomena are fraud, he is shutting himself and his class of thinkers outside of the pale of argument and reason, and is doing himself a great injury by excluding himself from the light which natural phenomena are bringing to establish the conservation of mental as well as physical force, or, still better, that in a sense all force is a mental force, using materiality only as a mechanic uses his tools to bring about the perfection of his ideas. These are the proofs you call for, Mr. Burgess, and if you accept them, must lead to a belief in the soul doctrin of humanity as of nature.

I hav seen in broad daylight, and in full gas-light, under the most convincing circumstances and conditions, phenomena that claim to be spiritual, and the observation of which leads me to think it more reasonable to believe it to be spirits than anything else. Why? Because the things that take place agree with intelligence akin to humanity, and as all the arguments point to a spirit, it seems that the Materialist ought to show us how to account for this intelligence by some other method, instead of crying fraud about things they cannot explain and do not understand.

Mr. Burgess calls for proof, and when we refer him to natural phenomena, giving forth works that speak out an intelligence that, by the nature of things, cannot belong to anybody but that of some certain spirit claimed, he simply says "fraud," and rejects the proof.

I hav seen in daylight, material objects, such as bells, accordions, and musical instruments of various kinds played upon and carried around the room, hav held the accordion while it played all sorts of tunes, and hav taken the instrument apart and examined it to see if anything but the reeds and bellows was there to do it, and I hav been a manufacturer of reed instruments for more than twenty years, and ought to know what belongs to them—am selling and handling them in my store every day, and I never found one that would play away from the rooms of a medium. I and wife hav sat at a table and laid a slate upon it with a bit of slate pencil between, and received communications from dear friends, characteristic of what we know of them, when not a soul in that room touched the slate from the time we laid it there. No fraud and no humbug here, but I hav also had humbug played at me. A Mr. Briggs attempted it, and by adroitly substituting a slate which he drew from his hip pocket and exchanged for the one I had cleaned, gave me a long letter from Dr. Rush, written in a plain, ronnd, school-boy's hand, but I had (accidently on purpose) hit the slate with three pencil marks in the corner, which were not on the slate having the communication. I said, "This is not the slate I cleaned," and asked him how many he carried in his hip pocket, etc. Oh, yes, I hav had all kinds of tricks played, and paid for them, too; but I hav been able to distinguish between tricks and fraud by the only sure comparison that can be made, which is, sifting the characteristic intelligence of the spirits.

Mr. Burgess asserts that Spiritualism is the outgrowth of creeds. If he means that it is the result of a belief in creeds, he is very much mistaken; it is the outgrowth of creeds only in the sense that it is growing away from all creeds. The spirits teach the absurdity of all the creeds usually drawn from the Bible. While they do not wish to destroy anything good in any book, it is not worshiped by them, nor held in any other respect than a history of the progress of humanity, or the evolution of ideas. They usually oppose all creeds and will not, and hav not to this day organized to any form of creed.

So far as the challenge of five hundred dollars is concerned, Mr. Burgess puts it on pretty safe grounds. He wants it done by a medium sitting ten feet away; he might as well ask for a telegraph operator to send his message by keeping the connecting wire ten feet away from the battery. Now, I hav not seen twenty-five pounds raised ten feet away from the medium, nor heavy stones tossed about, but I hav seen chairs moved at least eight or ten feet away from the medium in broad daylight, and if Mr. Burgess will bring his five hundred dollars along and agree to go to Onset Bay for a few weeks, I will be there to try and relieve him of his mony, for the benefit of some medium. Perhaps he had better bring the larger amount he names, as there may be various things to accomplish, although I am doubtful about the raising of a pebble from the palm of his hand, although there would be no trouble to hav it rise from the palm of some other hand, in his presence, and in broad day light.

Mr. Burgess winds up with the following: "All we are is nature; all we can be, before and after death, so far as proven by facts, ends in nature. Nothing, through all ages, has ever produced something, and something cannot be made out of nothing."

The last two propositions are substantially the same statement—that nothing can come from nothing. Spiritualists agree to this, and argue from the very fact that, as something cannot come from nothing, therefore, something cannot go into nothing. The human mind is something, exerts a force, in fact, in all human force, and being a something, it must hav come from something, and something cannot, under any conditions, be made to get into nothing. We may add as many nothings together as we like, the result will be nothing. We may add somethings together and the result will always be something, whether of a purely physical or mental force. We came from something, we always were something, and will be forever something, augmented by the addition of something. Therefore the Spiritualist is perfectly logical, and his faith in immortality perfectly natural, which the facts of mediumship prove and which no material philosophy disputes.

MOUNT FOREST, CANADA, July 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.00, for which giv me credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER, per your offer in circular.

I do not see how so many of your subscribers get so far behind in paying for their paper. I think that it must be either mismanagement, carelessness, or stinginess. Now, many of them spend from six to ten times the amount in tobacco, segars, or firewater, that would pay for their paper and help along the good cause. But, no! they cannot afford to pay for their paper—times are hard. They cannot afford to pay for a good Liberal paper, but still they can afford to pay for a pew in the church; giv to the missionary; help to make up a purse for some sky-pilot, and such like, but would let their printers go to the dogs, or some other place of worship. Now, Liberals, if you claim to be such, just show it by making a little exertion, and do not hav the space in our valuable TRUTH SEEKER taken up dunning you, but let it be used to better advantage. Here is a start; who will follow? WM. LEWIS.

DEADWOOD, DAK, July 3, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I am here in Deadwood, after so long a time, and I take pleasure in inclosing to you the two dollars, balance on my subscription to the adorable old TRUTH SEEKER. I love it; but it is needless for me to praise—it speaks for itself to all intelligent men and women who read it. Oh, that it were in every family in the land, and that all would read and appreciate it. Religionists can avoid or evade by cavil, sophistry, prevarication, or a resort to miracle, all except ridicule; and as it is farcical, absurd, and ridiculous, let's ridicule them, and their scheme and system.

Success to you and your paper, world without end!

H. M. EASTMAN.

BROOKVILLE, KAN., July 5, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday I attended, near this place, a little old-fashioned country gathering in honor of our country's natal day. The meeting was held at the home of Daniel Hurford, who is one of our subscribers, and a very outspoken Freethinker, too. T. H. Terry and A. S. Hall, whose names are on your roll, were there also. The regular orator for the day was a very worthy clergyman by the name of Wright. He talked very fair and quite Liberal for a minister. When he had spoken, I, at the request of some of my friends, offered a few remarks, which were given to show the friends there present that some of us, at least, still held the name of Thomas Paine in grateful remembrance.

This brought the minister out once more. He admitted that I had spoken the truth in regard to Paine, also that Dr. Franklin was a friend of Paine's. Then he told us that Paine conferred with Franklin in regard to the publication of the "Age of Reason," and that Dr. Franklin said to him, "Don't unchain the tiger." I soon got the attention of the audience, and told them that Franklin was in his grave before the "Age of Reason" was written. The reverend then with some warmth said that he didn't believe it, and away he starts for home.

Now, the question is, am I mistaken or not? I hope you will giv us a pointer on that tiger story. I send twenty-five cents. Please send one copy of the "Age of Reason."

NEWTON MITCHELL.

P.S.—If my memory is not at fault, Paine, in the "Age of Reason," mentions Franklin as "the late Dr. Franklin."

N. M.

[You are right. The tiger story is a barefaced Christian fabrication. Franklin would hav had to speak from the grave to tell it.—ED. T. S.]

ODESSA, MO., July 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not seen THE TRUTH SEEKER for a month. I left California about four weeks ago, and hav been unsettled since. I am a stranger here. I think that as soon as I can get a little acquainted I shall be able to get a few subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please don't neglect to send my next paper to this place. I am getting hungry for it.

WM. L. WORLEY.

MILWAUKEE, OR., July 2, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just found another dollar greenback to apply on my TRUTH SEEKER account. Perhaps this will be the last—at least, until I return from my gold island, for I am arranging my matters for a start. But if so, I will let you know in time. so that you shall not lose a cent by me, for that is the way I deal with my fellow-man. I intend to hav my matters so straight that when I arrive at the gate Saint Peter will not say, "Get out, you old liar, thief, and swindler; you can't come in."

E. W. CRESSEY.

AUBURN, N. Y., July 12, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Your grand paper of July 11th at hand just on my return home, two full pages of which are given up to "Lessons for Christians."

Whatever credit has already been given to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its artist for bringing out previous caricatures in ridiculing a ridiculous and barbarous religion, greater and more praiseworthy credit must now be accorded to both in this last effort, in placing before its many readers this "Lesson for Christians," which in itself is more instrumental in the destruction of superstition than whole volumes of printed matter would be. It is refreshing to hav these caricatures brought out occasionally, and no one will complain of "correspondence being crowded out," especially when the work is done so well, and speaks so very much. Everything THE TRUTH SEEKER undertakes seems to be a grand success in all of its departments, and such successes as these are but encomiums for what is now being recognized as the greatest weapon with which Christianity has to contend—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We all bid you godspeed in your great work, and feel that in and through the grand paper we hav an anchor to which we can hold fast, and through its weekly teachings become strong and influential in bringing about one of the greatest revolutions known in the world's history in behalf of the edification of the human race. I hope to see more "Modern Balaams" and "Lessons for Christians," three of which each please send me by return mail.

L. DE WITT GRISWOLD.

TURNER'S FALLS, MASS., June 28, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I was at Northampton Friday evening, and heard Colonel Ingersoll for the first time. I had heard S. P. Putnam, C. B. Reynolds, and other good speakers, but Ingersoll goes away ahead of my imagination even. I am glad thousands do, and wish everyone could hear, him at least once on "Liberty." I had the pleasure of shaking hands with the colonel, and invited him to Lake Pleasant or Turner's Falls, and hope he will come. I expect to see you this fall.

GEORGE E. HARTLEY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 1, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: No doubt it seems very strange to you that I do not get any subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are a great number of persons in this town, and at Oakland, who know more or less about THE TRUTH SEEKER. But they are all continually cautioned in all the several church, the Young Men's Christian Associations, and the Salvation Armies, against being in possession of that style of literature, or perusing any kind of Infidel books or works. The tables in the hotels, saloons, and restaurants are crowded with local and other papers of various kinds, but none of these dangerously misleading and soul-destroying papers. And the clergy, while warning their congregations against reading Infidel literature, rarely forget to tell their congregations that Voltaire, Tom Paine, and other Infidels who hav alarmed the Christian world, are probably in hell. Even when they came to die they would become Christians, but they had no power; the holy spirit was withdrawn from them. If they could liv but a year longer they would gladly undo all that they had done. But no; they were past redemption. Such is the awful nature and consequence of Infidelity.

I've heard this same kind of talk many times in the churches in England, where I was born and raised. The Catholics, it seems, provided they attend mass regularly, can get drunk and fight as much as they please afterwards, as far as they are concerned with their church, and they very often do. The policemen frequently giv them a night's lodging, and charge them five dollars each for the accommodation the next morning.

It's true here, as at other places, the more churches and more religious devotion, the more crime. The Catholics are not hostil to me, but they use dreadfully low and insulting language against Mr. Ingersoll, and those of his stamp, his followers, as they call them. Yet many educated and enlightened pulpiteers say his equal in one man does not exist. Thousands more would hav said the same had it not been for their bread and butter. We hav lively times here occasionally with the Catholics. They say Ingersoll is nothing but a lawyer, and the idea of an honest lawyer! I tell them that there are honest men in every position. No doubt there are honest priests, though they are ignorant of the correct history of the Romish church, but the pope, cardinals, and the educated priests are well aware that the superstructure on which the church is built is a big lie. They are practically all professional liars.

TOMY BEESON SMITH.

POMONA, CAL., July 6, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: On a recent trip to the city and county of San Diego, I visited the celebrated hot sulphur springs (Agua Calienta) located on Warner's Ranch. At this point there are some three hundred Indians who still maintain their tribal relations, and are under the protecting wing of Uncle Sam. A school is there supported at the expense of the government, and a female teacher at a salary of seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum has been employed. She has been in charge of this school for the past four years. This teacher is of Teutonic extraction, full of the (Catholic) Holy Ghost, and is instilling into the minds of these already superstitious people more superstition in their school days than science will be able to remove in fifty years of after life—and this, too, at the expense of the government, the taxpayer. Her school rooms are often turned into courts of inquisition that would put to shame any of former times; she is council, advocate, and law; her religious influence over her pupils is supreme, above that of parent or law. A sentence locked up in their brains with the key of the cross through her manipulation, could not be extracted under penalty of death. Her will is law, and is implicitly obeyed, as the following incident will illustrate.

Some few days prior to my visit at the springs, this teacher, this "heavenly dove with all her quickening power," in collusion with one of her pet priests, caused all the married Indians, through her holy command, to appear at her schoolhouse on a certain appointed day for the purpose of attending to religious rites and ceremonies. Of course they were all on hand, to the exclusion of all other business or wants. All things being ready, the priest made his appearance, with cross in hand, and an expression on his holy countenance that would hav paralyzed any one of the sixteen crucified saviors of yore, had they been present to witness the exhibition. The business which he wished to make known to these poor dupes was that he (the priest) was in possession of the knowledge (just got in from above) that all the Indians there who were living together as man and wife, married according to the Indian custom (which all their ancestors had lived and died under), must get remarried right there and then, else all their children would be pronounced illegitimate, and they assigned to hell at once; that the devil had been imported for the special business of wafting the entire outfit to his red-hot griddle; that he (old split-foot) was then in their immediate vicinity, and that nothing short of compliance with the priest's demand would be sufficient to induce his satanic majesty to retire from behind each and all of them. The scare worked like a charm, and all the poor ignorant dupes walked up to the priestly rack and took the "fodder"—remarried to the tune of only nine dollars per pair, the priest and the schoolmarm raking in the shekels to the grand total of four hundred and fifty dollars. All for the glory of God and the replenishing of the priestly exchequer. "Praise God from whom all blessings flow"—to the priest.

Ah, you godly rascals, it is apparent why you fight so persistently our public schools and the enlightenment of the masses. It is equally apparent why you cultivate the superstition that is so prevalent among the uneducated. It is the modus operandi of your illegitimate gains, thefts, and robberies. It gets away with the "grab-bag," or any of the many gambling methods yet devised by the cunning but none the more scrupulous Protestant. We are made to exclaim in the language of the good-natured Dutchman, "The longer we liv the more we find by Jesus Christ out"—about his many hypocritical and rascally agents, of whatever religious denomination they may be.

How sensible business men and women can longer giv aid or comfort to these every-day frauds, mystifies my conception of their mental compound. The frauds of the skies seem to hav more weight with church educated people than all the solid facts of earth combined, and the only way to break down this barrier is for every freethinking man to continually use his best efforts to eliminate from the minds of others their reverence for these phantoms called gods and devils. Then, and not till then, will the light of science radiate and reflect its power upon the brain of mankind.

I would suggest to any Liberal who may contemplate removing to the Pacific Coast, that San Diego county affords splendid inducements in the shape of cheap lands that are fertil, and a climate that is not surpassed on the globe. I found the majority of the citizens Freethinkers, consequently "spook-houses" are few and far between. On the other hand, the school-house is numerous.

Since my arrival home, I found that the "meek and lowly followers" hav bought out one of the papers here (the Inlex), and that the present editor wears the collar of Jesus, which excludes from its columns anything pertaining to this world's affairs that does not furnish coin and comfort for the Lord. Our articles increased the circulation of the paper fifty per cent, which so frightened the phantom dealers that they bought the press. Glory enough for Freethought!

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 55 cents, for which please send one dozen cartoons of "The Modern Balaam" and the "Crimes of Preachers." I find a great many who are very fond of drawing my attention to the immoral tendency of Liberalism, and I want to be able to answer them from the record by comparison.

I am a stranger comparativly in Bradford. There are a good many real Liberal people here. I am acquainted with a few —Mr. Wheeler, Carter, Zane, and a few others. I believe they hav a Liberal League here, although they hav no meetings. They seem to be indifferent, and heedless of the great questions commanding the attention of the religious world to-day. They seem to view with indifference the persistent and systematic efforts of the religious denominations to secure in our national legislation amendments and supplemental laws to perfect a complete union of church and state. These hav it pretty well now, having pretty much the control of all things, the making of all laws, and the execution of the same, the control of the education of the people, the making of all of the books used in the various institutions of learning, and the officering of the same. They also hav nearly the control of the public press, and when they can put God into the Constitution, and place Christ as the only legitimate ruler of the nations, and the Bible acknowledged as the only source and fountain of law, Liberals will hav a sweet time, I can assure you. There is not an infamous law, a cruel law, an abhorrent law, a vindictiv law, a tyrannical law, an unjust law, but what must claim the Christian Bible for its parentage. Nor is there a humane law, a merciful law, a just law, nor a progressiv law, but what can be traced to a different origin. I am an old man, but I intend to spend the balance of my days in battling the enemy of all human progress, the church.

THOSE IMPRESSIV PICTURES.

WEISSNICHTWO, N. J., July 15, 1885.

"Sounds falling on the ear are lost, and die
In one short hour; but those that meet the eye
Dwell long upon the mind. The faithful sight
Engraves the knowledge with a beam of light."

Those readers who recollect what impressiv cartoons appeared, a few years ago, in some of the New York city papers, concerning the far-famed ring that embezzled so many million dollars out of the treasury of New York city, may also remember how the ridiculous caricatures hurt. The illustrious Tweed remarked, concerning some of the caricatures of himself: "I don't care what the papers print about me, for many of my constituents can't read; and a great many that know how to read cannot understand the language. But those infernal pictures! They hurt! If a man don't know how to read, he can understand the lessons to be taught by such pictures."

So with that picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d. I hav often heard people remark that "Christians were priest-ridden." I understood the import of the language; but I was never so thoroughly impressed with the facts in the case as when I first saw that cartoon representing a donkey-man ridden by a priest. I exclaimed, audibly, "That is me to a life-like representation!" My mind ran back to early manhood, and all along through life, and I saw how exactly I was like a donkey-man, with a Presbyterian priest on my back, directing all my ways and actions. I would distribute a large number of them among my relations, but they would burn every one before examining the contents. They are exactly such pack-mules as I used to be before I drifted beyond the pale of the church.

We were all taught to believe that all there is, ever was, or ever will be worth knowing in morals, history, science, or literature, may be found within the pale of the church. Allow me to pen briefly only a paragraph in my priest-ridden experience, when I played the part of a submissiv donkey. My father gave me a few acres of poor land, which had been worked on shares, and impoverished until it was too poor to pay the expense of cultivation. He also gave me a span of horses, and an old plow-harness. He refused to allow mother to sign the deed, so that I could not sell the land.

By judicious management, I raised grass, hay, straw, and oats barely enough to keep my horses. I was obliged to work two days per week for my father, to pay for my board. There was only an old, little barn on the place. I was obliged to borrow money to pay current expenses. As soon as I could erect a small building for a workshop (as I was a carpenter and knew how to work at wagons and sleighs) I married a blue Presbyterian wife, and we lived in my workshop for several years. We were poor enough. But our relentless priest preached and talked, "More pay." My wife iterated and reiterated: "Pay more. The Lord will bless us." So they induced the submissiv donkey to go and borrow, and pay seven per cent interest on it for a number of years, to help pay the salary of this miserable donkey-rider, when we had no way to earn any money to purchase the necessaries of domestic life. We were fifteen miles from the county seat, the nearest railroad station, and the nearest lumber market. For a number of years we lived in my little workshop. As I had no money to pay for lumber, we could not build a house. For two years I was putting forth all the efforts in my power to get timber and boards to build a house. When I was not at work on the farm, cultivating or securing the crops, I was directing the energies of every available day to get stone for the foundation, which I was obliged to buy, and haul over two miles, and sand, that was purchased four miles from home, and lumber and timber out of my own woods. As I had no money to pay a man to help me saw trees into logs, I was obliged to change work with some neighbor. Then I was obliged to haul every log over four miles, and a rough road, to the saw-mill. As I had no money, I was obliged to giv half the lumber to pay for sawing. After working three winters in such a slow and disadvantageous manner, I had got roof boards, floor boards, siding, and studdings enough to build a new house, all at home, piled up under the shed. The church then wanted to build a parsonage for the donkey-driver. By the goadings from the pulpit, the urging of the deacons, and the irrepressible badgering of my good Presbyterian wife to pay more, I reluctantly gave away all my lumber to build a parsonage, and then commenced again to get another supply of lumber (without money) to build a house. Thus it was for more than forty years, until I began to kick. Glory to THE TRUTH SEEKER for enabling me to become a

KICKING DONKEY.

FORT MADISON, IA., July 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for one year's subscription for myself and a new subscriber. I was just thinking of writing when Mr. Somerby's circular came to hand announcing "time up."

We hav quite a number of intelligent Liberal people here, and a large society could be built up if we only had a "starter." Among our best Liberal minds are many Germans. Our city contains between 5,000 and 6,000 people, and has a healthy and beautiful location on the west bank of the Mississippi, 250 miles above St. Louis.

I am very much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER in its progressiv course under your administration, and shall undoubtedly giv it my continued support. Although we may not agree on all points, we are certainly in accord for "universal mental liberty." I am not prepared to giv solid, convincing proofs to all minds for the views I entertain, though quite clear to me. But, being conscious of an individualized existence; knowing that all are offspring (mentally as well as physically) of parents; believing that the body is built up on the food we eat and the surrounding atmosphere; that the spirit, commencing in an embryo state, like the body, is built up on the sublimated portion of food eaten and the surrounding elements, and possesses a power that cannot be destroyed, here I rest in peace, with perfect love, casting out all fear of a personal God or devil, or physical punishment for spiritual sins.

Everything in nature is to me as a finger-board pointing to a continued existence; still I hav no desire to quarrel with any one who has not arrived at these conclusions preferring to believe that "death ends all." And I take great pleasure in looking around upon the world of mind and matter, firmly believing that it will yet be well with every being upon the universe.

Giving every form of religion its just due, and every honest devotee credit for all the reformatory good they do, I still look upon Freethought as the highest phase of mental development.

I am glad that Colonel Ingersoll is at the head of the column, and am willing to march with him and all such up through the gates of death, and face "the great hereafter!"

Ever yours fraternally, for an eternal progressiv development,

J. R. TEWKSBURY.

MR. EDITOR: Of the two great religious movements of the day, viz., Protestantism and Catholicism, it can be readily seen that the former is by far the more liberal Although Protestants seem to be more aggressiv towards unbelievers than Catholics, yet it is only like the common adage, "Barking dogs seldom bite."

The Roman Catholic church is a crawling, slimy serpent. When it does not wield power you can caress it, and it seems as docil as "Mary's little lamb." But let it obtain supreme authority, and once more it would be audacious enough to trample out free inquiry, punish heretics, and fan the flames of religious persecution. This church is also becoming a powerful factor in party politics. It was not long since that we saw America's greatest statesman bow his head to this papal hierarchy for nothing else than political preferment and the anxious hope to assume the dignity of president of this great republic.

It is also thought by a great many that Monsignor Capel is in this country for the sole purpose of endeavoring to add wealth and influence to the "holy church," and also secure a better abode for "his holiness" the pope in this "land of th free and the home of the brave." Now, "his holiness" is quite welcome to our shores, and should he not desire to take a homestead on the frontier, he might locate in the state of Delaware.

Upside Down.

If all the world were upside down.
Our lilies would be stars so gay,
Our brooks would make the milky way,
And roses of the richest dye
Would be the pretty sunset sky;
Instead of blue, the sky be brown—
If all the world were upside down.

If all the world were upside down,
The moon would take the ocean's place,
And stars the fields and gardens grace.
The ground, of course, would be sky-blue;
Another change would be quite new—
We'd wear our shoes upon our crown
If all the world were upside down. —Selected.

Elizabeth Zane.

This dauntless pioneer maiden's name
Is inscribed in gold on the scroll of Fame;
She was the lassie who knew no fear
When the tomahawk gleamed on the far frontier.
If deeds of daring should win renown,
Let us honor this damsel of Wheeling town,
Who braved the savage with deep disdain—
Bright-eyed, buxom, Elizabeth Zane.

'Twas more than a hundred years ago,
They were close beset by the dusky foe;
They had spent of powder their scanty store,
And who the gantlet should run for more?
She sprang to the portal and shouted, "I;
'Tis better a girl than a man should die!
My loss would be but the garrison's gain.
Unbar the gate!" said Elizabeth Zane.

The powder was sixty yards away,
Around her the foemen in ambush lay;
As she darted from shelter they gazed with awe,
Then wildly shouted, "A squaw!" "a squaw!"
She neither swerved to the left or right,
Swift as an antelope's was her flight.
"Quick! Open the door!" she cried amain,
"For a hope forlorn! 'Tis Elizabeth Zane!"

No time had she to waver or wait,
Back she must go ere it be too late;
She snatched from the table its cloth in haste
And knotted it deftly about her waist,
Then filled it with powder—never, I ween,
Had powder so lovely a magazine;
Then, scorning the bullets, a deadly rain,
Like a startled fawn, fled Elizabeth Zane.

She gained the fort with her precious freight;
Strong bands unfastened the oaken gate;
Brave men's eyes were suffused with tears
That had there been strangers for many years.
From flint-lock rifles again there sped
'Gainst the skulking redskins a storm of lead,
And the war-whoop sounded that day in vain,
Thanks to the deed of Elizabeth Zane.

Talk not to me of Paul Revere,
A man, on horseback, with naught to fear;
Nor of old John Burns, with his bell-crowned hat—
He'd an army to back him, so what of that?
Here's to the heroin, plump and brown,
Who ran the gantlet in Wheeling town!
Her's is a record without a stain—
Beautiful, buxom, Elizabeth Zane.

A Sail on the Bay

It was about 4 P.M. when Bertha and Helen embarked on the doctor's boat for a short sail on the bay. The day had been disagreeably hot, and the breeze on the water was as agreeably cool and delicious. The doctor, who is an intimate friend of the girls, was chatty and witty. He pointed out all the lovely bits of scenery around, and on Wickett island, that rises like a gem of emerald beauty high up from the blue waters of the bay. On its summit is a cozy hotel open for summer visitors. But who would like to liv on such a small island all summer? The trio in the boat thought it would not be so very nice for either of them.

They sailed around the island on the right, past the long strip of land known as Burgess Point, but which, in the time gone by, rejoiced in no other cognomen than the not very romantic one of Hog Neck, while in front and on the left might be seen the high bluffs of Onset, clothed in the deep-green drapery of pine and oak, back of which cuddled the gayly painted cottages, "Veu d' l'eau," "Bayside," "Robbins' Nest," "Rest," "Bay View," "Shell Point," "Woodbine," and many others whose names are not discernible from the water side, but all sheltered amid bright flowers and greenest shrubbery, while at various points could be seen the tops of hotels and other buildings, with the American flag flying in the breeze.

A short distance from Wickett is another smaller strip of land known as Onset island, famed for its berries, clams, and woodticks. Very pretty it appeared in the afternoon sunlight, with the waves dashing gently against its sandy beaches, and the birds singing soft, sweet lullabies to their babies tucked snugly in downy nests amid the glossy, green leaves.

Beyond Onset island Hog island rears its head, and Monument beach, dotted with many little cottages, is only a short distance beyond. But the cunning sailboat was turned another way past a lovely grove of fine trees on a knoll that seemed to gradually ascend from the very water's edge, and farther on they landed where a point of land made out into the bay, and is a part of the Pond Lily farm.

Helen and Bertha were delighted with the wild beauty of the place, and gathered beautiful wild flowers, odd grasses, strange-looking leaves, and soft, velvety mosses. And oh! the promis of huckleberries, blackberries, cranberries, and beech plums in the season in just that sheltered spot!

After walking about awhile, they embarked for a sail homeward, just as the sun was going down in the west, bright, red, and glorious. Its last rays fell sparkling on the water in farewell blessing and good-night kisses. The wind had all gone down, and the twilight stillness crept slowly over the bay, and one by one the shadows crept stealthily along, while, like the eyes of watchful angels, the stars shone in the sky overhead.

It was growing late, and the little sailboat made slow headway, for the wind was dead ahead. Bertha advocated scratching the mast to raise a breeze, as she said that was the way old sailors did, though how she knew it nobody could tell.

Finally they all began to whistle, or tried to; but it made no difference, for there was scarcely a ripple on the waves. The lights gleamed out from the cottages on the bluffs, and twinkled amid the trees, while the doctor "tacked" and tacked again, but the boat scarcely moved at all. The night was coming on, and Bertha and Helen thought they would hav to stay on the water all night. But after awhile there was a faint little wind, that sprang up and just fanned the sail ever so slightly, but it was very welcome.

The night, with its bright stars scattered thickly amid flecks of floating cumuli, that, ere the sunlight had faded, had seemed to assume all sorts of fanciful shapes, grew more and more lovely, and the phosphorescent lights in the water flashed and gleamed in many brilliant jets.

The doctor thought it best not to try to land at the wharf, if, indeed, they could ever get there, but tried to reach the bluff, which feat after many a struggle, and tacking this way and that, was accomplished.

There is no wharf at the bluff, so, after coming as close to the shore as possible with the boat, the doctor hopped over the side, and pulled the boat as far as he could on the beach, and that was not very far.

"I don't know," said he, dubiously, "how you two are to get ashore."

"I guess," said Helen, "we shall hav to wade ashore."

"You aren't afraid," and the doctor spoke very low. "I must keep the boat from drifting off, you know. If you are not afraid," he continued, "take off your shoes and stockings."

So off came the shoes and stockings, and the latter were tucked into the boots and passed to the doctor, who placed them on a rock. Then Bertha jumped into the water with a big splash, followed by Helen with another splash. The water was warm and not unpleasant. Reaching the shore they found shoes and stockings, and with many a laugh and jovial remark they started barefoot for home, walking in the soft sand along the shore.

"But it was a pleasant sail, if we did hav to wade ashore," remarked Helen. "And we gathered in such bits of beauty, so much calm loveliness, that I am more in love with nature than ever before."

"I was awfully afraid we would get stranded on the flat as we came across," said Bertha. "But we didn't, and I shall dream of sunlight and starlight, singing birds and lovely flowers. But I thought I should just scream, though, when you asked the doctor what kind of a bird note that creaking sound was, and he told you that 'bird note' was the croak of a frog!"

"I just betrayed my city breeding then," said Helen. "But it sounded like a bird in the twilight. It just teaches me that we do not know everything, even if we think we do."

A Story of Jefferson.

Colonel Wintersmith, of Kentucky, tells the following good story of Thomas Jefferson.

Said he: "One day when Thomas Jefferson was riding through Virginia, on his way from Washington to Monticello, he came upon a boy trudging along with his clothes in a satchel, which hung on a stick from his shoulder. He stopped his gig and asked the youth if he did not want to ride. The young man looked at him a moment in a bold way, and finally said yes. He was motioned to get in, and in a moment he was sitting by the side of the president, who opened the conversation by asking him who he was, and where he was going. He replied that his name was Morgan, and that he was going home from school, and continued by putting the same questions to the president, saying, "I beg your pardon, stranger, but what might your name be?"

"The president replied, 'My name is Thomas Jefferson.'

"The boy looked up astonished, and asked, 'Not Tom Jefferson, president of the United States?'

"'Yes,' replied Jefferson; and as he did so, the boy jumped from the gig and into the road, saying, 'I hav heard of you, Tom Jefferson. My father says you are a rascal, and wouldn't he thrash me if he caught me a-ridin' with you. Father knows you, and he thinks you are the biggest scoundrel in the country!'

"'No, he doesn't,' replied the president. 'I know him very well. We are good friends personally, though not politically. He won't care if you ride with me. I am not a bad fellow; get in.'

"Still the young man refused to get in. He reiterated the statement that he believed Jefferson to be a rascal, but finally was persuaded, and again took his seat in the gig.

"During the conversation which followed, Jefferson succeeded in making a friend of him, and on parting told him that if he would come to Washington he would giv him an office to prove to him that he was his friend.

"'No, you won't,' said the boy; 'you will forget me.'

"'No, I will not,' answered Jefferson. And with that the two parted.

"Some months afterward young Morgan, becoming disgusted with things about home, concluded to run off and go to Washington after his office. He stole out one night with his clothes in a bundle on a stick over his shoulder, and walked to Washington. When he got to the city—it was nothing but a muddy village then—he was covered with dust, and his boots were the color of clay. He went, however, just as he was, up to the White House, and, finding the door open, walked boldly into a room where he saw Jefferson writing, bending over a table. He went up to him, and, laying his hand on his shoulder, said:

"'Hello, Tom Jefferson; I've come after that office.'

"The president looked up, but could not remember the boy. Noting his amazed look, the young Morgan continued:

"'There, I told you you would not remember me when I came here.'

"Jefferson replied that his face was familiar, and on Morgan telling who he was, the president greeted him kindly, and asked him to be seated. He then called a servant, and sent the boy off to be brushed up, asking him if he had another suit of clothes, to which he replied he had. He was then given a room in the White House, and the president told him to look about for a few days, and see what kind of an office he wanted. This young Morgan did; and at the end of the first day told Jefferson he believed he would take a colonelcy in the army.

"President Jefferson laughed, and told him that the colonels were always old men. He must take something else, but not to be in a hurry—to look around and see the city. He then sent a midshipman with him to make things pleasant for him, and in a day or two young Morgan decided that he would rather be a midshipman than anything else. Jefferson at once gave him the appointment, and he went on a ship immediately. He made a splendid naval officer, and he died a commodore."—Ex.

1.—RIDDLE.

I once was king and warrior bold,
In the olden days gone by,
And all the years in which I lived,
A perfect heart had I.

The work of art my mother made
I stamped it to the ground;
To show the Lord that he had chose
The wisest man around.

When with my braves I went to war
Against the dreadful host,
I captured all the sheep I could
To make the Lord a roast.

But when my warlike days were gone,
My feet grew awful sore;
And when I called the doctor in
The Lord's help came no more.

When God had called my soul away,
They laid me in the tomb,
And round my form the people spread
Sweet spice and rich perfume.

ANSWERS TO PRIZE PROBLEMS.

E. M. Been gives the distance traveled by the general, in Mr. Pool's Army Problem, as fifty-four and sixteen-one-hundredths miles. Mr. Been adds: "Now for that book, Brother Pool!'

In answer to the same problem Isaac A. Pool, of Escanaba, Mich., says:

"The miles he rides are fifty-four;
Adding of rods forty-nine more,
Eight feet besides, and inches seven,
With still a fraction to be given."

	m.	rods	ft.	in.
The Gen. rides	19	184	12	6.78
The army moves	5	135	3	11·22

The Numerical Puzzle of W. J. Burns in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 4th Mr. Pool answers as follows:

If the times of slowing occur before meeting with both trains, they meet at 10h., 26m., 52.348sec. P.M., 243.51503 miles from Philadelphia, 109.58496 miles from Pittsburgh.

If the slowing is after the meeting, then

$$\frac{253.1}{49.1 \textit{ plus } 44.5} = \text{time},$$ and time multiplied by velocity = distance.

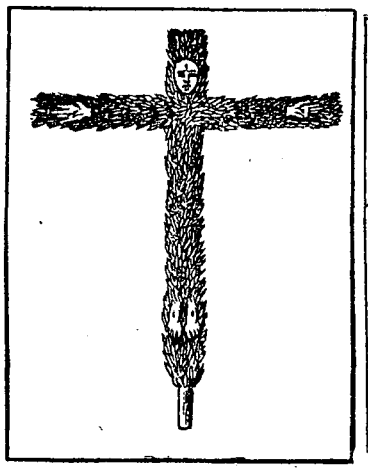
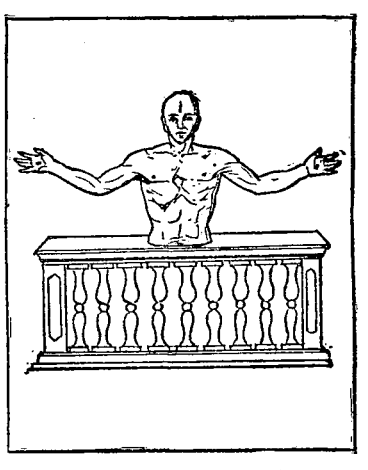
THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:



BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

"The volume, 'Bible Myths, and their Parallels in Other Religions,' is clearly the result of years of patient and plodding research made over a vast field of reading. The aim of the book is to show not only that nothing of the miraculous which is to be found in the Old Testament can be considered of Hebrew origin, but also that nothing of the same sort which is to be found in the New Testament can be considered of Christian origin. The author, by an overwhelming amount of evidence, proves his point. We cannot see how his positions are to be gainsaid. It is useless, in the light thrown upon the matter throughout the pages of this book, to argue that the Bible must be of special divine origin because of its contents, for here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. If the existence of such and such things in the Bible is to be accepted as proof that the Bible is of special divine origin, then the existence of the like things in other ancient books of the world must be accepted as proof that they also are of special divine origin. If not, why not? Like effects must everywhere, and at all times, come from like causes. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."—Boston Commonwealth.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent Biblical students that the Hebrew Scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly attempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification. The work is the result of a vast amount of intelligent and indefatigable research, and cannot be overlooked by any one engaged in theological study; since it is of too much acumen and authority to be ignored, even by those who most strenuously oppose the conclusions at which the author arrives."—Boston Courier.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Poetry.

On the Death of a Friend.

One man the less to look upon the sun,
  One man the more to lie beneath the ground;
  This is the sum of all the empty round
That men call life; and when the strife is done
Let only this be written of each one:
  Victor and vanquished, thus we all are crowned.
  And fitter epitaph could not be found
For Cæsar's self, his last fight lost and won.

And as for others, so, my friend, for thee
  We hav none hopefuller. Above thy name
We trace it, and all bitter though it be,
  At least it hath not any hue of shame.
And turning from thy tomb unfalteringly,
  We do not weep, for ours shall be the same.

A Lesson to Lovers.

She, with a milk pail on her arm,
  Turns aside, with her young cheeks glowing,
And sees down the lane the slow, dull tread
  Of the drove of cows that are homeward going.
"Bessie," he said; at the sound she turned,
  Her blue eyes full of childish wonder;
"My mother is feeble, and lame, and old—
  I need a wife at my farmhouse yonder.

"My heart is lonely, my home is drear,
  I need your presence ever near me;
Will you be my guardian angel, dear,
  Queen of my household, to guide and cheer me!"

"It has a pleasant sound," she said,
  "A household queen, a guiding spirit,
To warm your heart and cheer your home,
  And keep the sunshine ever near it.
But I am only a simple child,
  So my mother says, in her daily chiding,
And what must a guardian angel do,
  When she first begins her work of guiding?"

"Well, first, dear Bessie, a smiling face
  Is dearer far than the rarest beauty,
And my mother, fretful, lame, and old,
  Will require a daughter's loving duty.
You will see to her flannels, drops, and tea,
  And talk with her of lungs and liver;
Giv her your cheerful service, dear,
  'The Lord he loveth a cheerful giver.'

"You will see that my breakfast is piping hot,
  And rub the clothes to a snowy whiteness;
Make golden butter and snowy rolls,
  And polish things to a shining brightness;
Will darn my stockings and mend my coats,
  And see that the buttons are sewed on tightly,
You will keep things cheerful, and neat, and sweet,
  That home's altar fires may still burn brightly.

"You will read me, at evening, the daily news,
  The tedious winter nights beguiling,
And never forget that the sweetest face
  Is a cheerful face that is always smiling;
In short, you'll arrange in a general way
  For a sort of sublunary heaven;
For home, dear Bessie, say what we may,
  Is the highest sphere to a woman given."

The lark sang out to the bending sky,
  The bobolink piped in the nodding rushes,
And out of the tossing clover blooms
  Came the sweet, clear song of the meadow thrushes.
And Bessie, listening, paused a while,
  Then said, with a sly glance at her neighbor,
"But, John—do you mean—that is to say,
  What shall I get for all this labor?

"To be nurse, companion, and ser vant girl,
  To make home's altar fires burn brightly;
To wash, and iron, and scrub, and cook,
  And always be cheerful, neat, and sprightly;
To giv up liberty, home, and friends;
  Nay, even the name of a mother's giving;
To do all this for one's board and clothes;
  Why, the life of an angel isn't worth living."

And Bessie gayly went her way
  Down through the fields of scented clover,
But never again since that summer day
  Has she won a glance from her rustic lover.
The lark sings out to the bending sky,
  The clouds sail on as white as ever;
The clovers toss in the summer wind,
  But Bessie has lost that chance forever.

A Valuable Annual.

Elizabeth B. Myers in the Investigator.

Please allow me a little space in the Investigator to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1885.

I am delighted with it, and would like to suggest to the Liberal public that all who hav not already supplied themselvs with one, be sure to do so. It is well worth the price, which is twenty-five cents.

Several years' publications bound g ether in book form would make a desirable addition to one's center table, also a valuable book for the library.

A Good Story Book.

E. Anne Hinman in the Investigator.

Will you allow me space in your columns for a few words of commendation of Miss Susan H. Wixon's book entitled "Story Hour," for children? I hav been favored with the perusal of this book, and wish to giv it my unqualified approval. It contains something over two hundred pages, clear type, splendid paper, and numerous pretty illustrations. The stories are not fables or fairy tales, but are drawn from life and real character, and are made up of just such incidents as are daily occurring in families, and among children, showing a moral that cannot fail to impress a child's mind for good.

Among the best stories the book contains are "Cressbrook Cottage," showing how by industry, sobriety, and economy, a pleasant home from small beginnings as well as a competency for old age may be obtained; and "Meddlesome Molly," showing the trouble which children bring not only on themselvs, but upon the entire household, by meddling with what they should not touch.

"Alone in an Unfurnished House," is the title of a little story used to illustrate what it is to liv in a body with an uncultivated mind, and that without study and application the mind may be as blank and cheerless as the walls of an unfurnished house.

The book from its opening to its closing is full of beautiful and useful lessons for the young, and too much cannot be said in its praise. I hav one for a gift for a little girl in whom I am interested, and whoever invests money in like manner will not throw it away.

ELEMENTS

UNIVERSAL HISTORY
FOR HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS
AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

Freethinkers will find this, for an outline, history the best for their use, as Professor Cottinger is a Freethinker, and in his reports of the church's actions has stated facts with a truthful freedom not found in ordinary histories. He dates his work from the beginning of historical certainty and not from the mythical Eden, as do most "universal" historians, and brings it down to 1883, with a brief mention of subsequent important inventions and discoveries.

THE RISE OF
INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

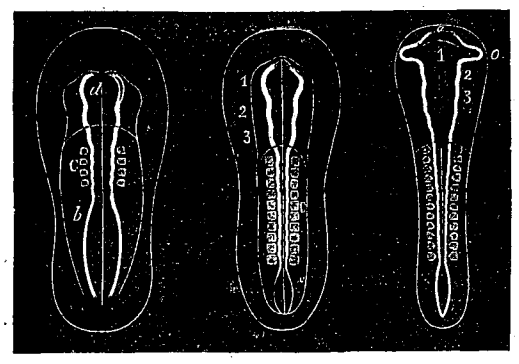
SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE;

OR, THE MYSTERIES OF MAN.

By R. T. TRALL, M. D.,

Carefully Revised and Enlarged Edition. Fully Illustrated.



This work was first published in 1866. Its success has been very great, and it has had a sale in every part of the world where the English language is read. It has become an authority on the subjects of which it treats. In England, in Australia, in New Zealand, in this country, it has been in constant demand since it was first published.

The advance in knowledge has made it desirable to revise the work and incorporate in it new discoverics made during the last 20 years. To this end it has been carefully revised, most of it re-written, several new chapters and a large number of fresh illustrations added, so that it is to-day practically a new book, and far the best of its kind which has yet appeared. It may be relied upon to give most complete knowledge of Sexual Physiology in all it departments.

Among the new chapters may be specially mentioned the one entitled, The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female. In no work is this subject so fully and interestingly treated. The subject matter has been drawn from a great variety of sources. This chapter alone will fully repay for the entire work.

There may be those who think the subject of Sexual Physiology one which should not be studied. There was a time when the subject of anatomy was considered improper, and it was considered unsafe for a man to devote his life to it. That day is past, and the benefits to the world from a knowledge of anatomy have been immense; and the benefits to the race from a perfect knowledge of Sexual Physiology will be far greater; and while we may respect the feelings of those who would never read on this subject, yet we must insist that it is one of the noblest studies, and brings one nearer than any other to the Creative Power, and one which, thoughtfully investigated, tends to make man wiser and better.

The illustrations in this work are 111 in number, and will greatly aid the reader by making everything plain and clear. No work of its kind has ever been so profusely illustrated; see samples in this adverisement.

The following are some the titles of the chapters: The Origin of Life; The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female; Pregnancy: Embryology; Parturition; Lactat on; The Law of Sex; Regulation of the Number of Offspring; Hereditary Transmission; Sexual Hygiene, etc., etc.

The price of the work is $2.00 by mail, post paid.

Something for Invalids to read and study over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT more dost thou want, when thou hast done a man a service; art thou not content that thou hast done something conformable to thy nature, and dost not seek to be paid for it? Just as if the eye demanded a recompense for seeing, or the feet for walking. For as these members are formed for a particular purpose, and by working according to their several constitutions obtain what is their own; so also as man is formed by nature to acts of benevolence, when he has done anything benevolent or, in any other way, conducive to the common interest, he has acted conformably to his constitution, and he gets what is his own.—M. A. Antoninus.

AND as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise. For if ye love them which love you, what thanks have ye? For sinners also love those that love them. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thanks have ye? for sinners also do the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the highest, for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. Be ye therefore merciful, as your father also is merciful.—Jesus.

TSZE-KUNG asked, saying, "Is there one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life?" The master (Confucius, b. B C 551) said. "Is not reciprocity such a word?" "What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others." On a kindred topic he thus delivered his opinion. Some one said, "What do you say concerning the principle that injury should be recompensed with kindness?" The master said: "With what, then, will you recompense kindness? Recompense injury with justice, and recompense kindness with kindness."—Amherley's Analysis.

OUR friend asks, "What can comfort and cheer like the doctrin that 'Our Father's at the Helm?'" We fail to see here anything of importance. When we, for instance, preserve our health, or do a good deed—that is, when we help some poor traveler on the journey of life—we are rewarded in the doing of the act, and never think of looking up to the sky and asking "Our Father at the Helm" to giv us credit in the "book of life" for the performance of the act. Not at all. It would spoil all the pleasure of the deed by divesting it of generosity, and making it a mere mercenary affair to be paid for, as if it were a job of hard and distasteful work.—Boston Investigator (Nov. 17, 1880).

CHRIST'S MIRACLES NO BETTER THAN THOSE OF SIMON MAGUS.—Dr. McCosh sees an essential difference in character between the miracles of Jesus and those of Simon Magus, for example: The latter is said to hav flown through the air, rolled himself unhurt upon burning coals, caused statues to talk, etc. In as much as Jesus is reported to hav walked upon the water, conjured money into a fish's mouth, passed through closed doors, and done numerous other similar acts, I fail to discern Dr. McCosh's distinction.—The Case Against the Church.

THE question of miracles may be said to be settled, and it is hardly fair, at this time of day, to call upon any sincere and competent student to giv a moment's consideration to the subject. Still we ask our readers to turn to Luke xx, 26, where we read, "Then came Jesus—the doors being shut—and stood in the midst." Here it is insinuated that Christ came into the house when there was no visible means of entry, but, in dealing with Thomas, he appeals to the natural attributes of matter. In entering the house the law of the impenetrability of matter—a law which tells us that no two particles can occupy the same place—is quietly set aside, and then it is immediately resumed to convince the doubter, Thomas. If Jesus could come before the apostles with no possible means of entrance, then his body must hav been a shadow, and, indeed, it is possible that this is what Thomas meant when he cried out, "My Lord and my God!" There is a blunder somewhere.

ONCE let it be admitted that the publication of any book or pamphlet is in good faith, meant for the public good, entirely free from corrupt motivs, and it cannot be suppressed without violation of the fundamental principles of liberty. This would appear at once if such suppression were equitably applied to all works which are liable to the charge of offending the conventional moral sentiment. Goethe, being once in Kiel, was invited to attend a meeting called by some clergymen for the suppression of obscene literature. He attended, and proposed that they should begin with the Bible. That ended the conference, and it was never heard of again. And that will end all these attempts to suppress books called immoral by prurient imaginations just as soon as the same measure is meted out to Freethinkers and to Bible societies.—M. D. Conway.

IT argues a narrow and corrupt nature to lose sight of the general and lasting consequences of rare and virtuous energy in the brief accidents which accompany its first movements to set lightly by the emancipation of human reason from a legion of devils, in our complaints and lamentations over the loss of a herd of swine.—Coleridge.

THERE are those in our time who stand honestly and openly outside of all that can properly be called Christian, and even outside of all beliefs that hav hitherto been called religious. They find no help in the teachings of Jesus; they believe in no God; they hope for no immortal life, and yet they claim (and there are Theists and Christians who admit the claim) that, because they are still truthful, loving, reverent, and desirous of knowing what is true and doing what is right, they hav not lost anything essential to religion.—Christian Register.

OUR life is nothing but a winter's day;
Some only break their fast and so away.
Others stay dinner and depart full fed,
The deepest age but sups and goes to bed.
He's most in debt that lingers out the day;
Who dies by times has less and less to pay.
—An Old Poet.

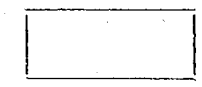
Odds and Ends.

CHERRY ripe, cherry red;
Little boy, doctor, bed.

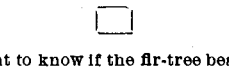
IN the civil service lists of Britain Mr. Bradlaugh is known as a decidedly offensiv partisan.—Philadelphia Times.

A VASSAR graduate being out in the country went into the stable of a farm-house. "Dear me, how close the poor cows are crowded together!" she remarked. "Yes, mum; but we hav to do that." "Why so?" "So they will giv condensed milk."



DURING the visit of the Mexican editors to St. Louis, one of the enterprising reporters for a large daily paper interviewed them, pencil in hand, and wanted to know if any one of the Halls of the Montezumas was present. He was politely informed that Mr. Hall was not in the editorial business, but would probably be found in the brass band.

"BELOVED brethren," remarked a country minister at the close of his sermon, "among the pennies and two-cent pieces of last Sabbath's collection I was surprised to find a gold coin of considerable value. As there were no strangers in the congregation it was evidently put there by mistake. By applying to the treasurer and proving property the owner can recover his money. Let us unite in prayer."



AMONG all these sweet girl graduates who are turned loose on the world this summer how many are fitted for wives and mothers? How many, with all the prizes and honors they hav won, can cook a meal fit for a human being to eat?—Nashville Union. Great Scott! this is narrowness. Girls are not expected to be wives or mothers this fall, or all at once. It is not a part of their business. Moreover, there are many things for women to do that are better than cooking, or even washing and ironing. When they must cook, a seminary education will not prevent them from learning how.—New Orleans Picayune.

SIGNS OF THE SEASONS.
From the Evansville Argus.

When winds are cold and chill and wet
The iceman ne'er your house will miss;
The piece of ice you always get
Is large and shapely, just like this:

But when 'tis awful, burning hot,
And sultry winds the parched earth kiss,
In case you are not clean forgot,
You get a little chunk like this:

So you want to know if the fir-tree bears fruit, eh? Of course it does, Julia, of course it does. And what kind of fruit does it bear? Why, seal-skin sacques and fur-lined circulars, to be sure. But you should be careful not to pluck them before they are ripe. You don't see what difference it could possibly make, eh? Well, did you ever pluck a chicken before it was ripe? You did, did you? Well, how did you pluck it? Oh, you plucked it off a perch, did you? What kind of a perch? Oh, a brindled perch, eh? Did you ever hear the fable of the brindled perch and the brindled bulldog? Did, eh? Well, you are just about the most prevaricating, falsifying, equivocating, lying falsehooder we know of, because there is no such fable, Julia. You had now better step out under the most convenient fir-tree, and watch the tippets and muffs ripen in the summer sun.—Puck.

THE First Baptist Church of Pawnticket, R. I., has been fighting the devil with his own weapons. Numbered commutation tickets, good for ten admissions to its prayer-meetings, were prepared and issued gratuitously to the young people of its flock. The deacons took turns at the door, and punched out one number for each person admitted. When the ten numbers had been thus canceled, the punched ticket was exchanged for a ticket to the skating-rink, and a new one issued in its place. This scheme worked admirably, from a spiritual point of view, giving odds of ten to one against the devil, and, regarded as a purely business scheme, resulted in full houses. Last Friday night, however, certain unscrupulous members of the congregation put into effect a plan to break the bank, as it were. Deacon Fatling was on the door that night. The deacon was the proprietor of the skating-rink, and the inspired author of the above scheme. He was also near-sighted to a degree. Consequently he punched away at the commutation tickets as they were presented without penetrating the identity of the bearers. The doors had been opened at seven o'clock, and at eight the deacon was still wearily punching. The church only held about three hundred people, and yet "a steady stream of humanity" had been pouring into "the sacred edifice" for a good hour. The deacon figured that if they were corded up inside—and he could see no other way of disposing of them—they must fill the room up about even with the chandelier. The unwonted success of his plan surprised him somewhat, but flattered him still more, and so he went on blindly punching and peddling out skating-rink tickets, mentally figuring up the probable amount of the collection he proposed to spring upon this large and no doubt enthusiastic assemblage later. At quarter past eight the steady stream that still flowed past the door began to wear upon the deacon's patience. At eight-thirty his patience and his skating-rink tickets gave out together. He had had five hundred of these at seven o'clock and now they were all gone. The temporal aspect of this unwonted boom rather worried the skating-rink proprietor, but its spiritual side filled the deacon with joy. Leaving another man on the door, he started off for a fresh supply of tickets. As he rounded the corner of the church he had a revelation. It consisted of a procession of shadowy figures emerging in an unbroken sequence from a side window. The deacon returned sadly to the door, and passed into the body of the church. It was barely filled. The devil had won against odds.

Of the signers of the antislavery declaration in 1833, only Elizur Wright, John G. Whittier, and Robert Purcis are alive.

A woman called at a Rutland, Vt., store, the other day, and sold her set of false teeth for one dollar. She explained that she was working for the Lord, and wanted to raise money to giv to convert the heathen in China.

The California Chinaman hit it plumb-center when he said, "Your churches spend millions of dollars to teach us the gospel, and then your Christians use us like dogs if we seek homes among you."—Detroit Free Press.

It is being whispered that the Italian ministry resigned on account of an attempt to tax macaroni and hand-organs. A few days ago a small boy drew a mule on a wall of the Vatican with a lump of mud, and was immediately excommunicated by the pope. Leo will work the incident into his next lamentation about imprisonment and persecution.

When a Liberty Hill squire got to that passage in the marriage ceremony wherein the groom pledges himself to do the square thing by his bride, the old darky who was being tied up exclaimed: "Hole on dar, boss; 'slong es she treat me right en 'tend ter her own business, I will; en ef she don't, I quits her. Go 'head, boss."—Macon (Ga.) Telegraph.

A syndicate composed mainly of English capitalists has bought up all the black walnut timber it could find in this country. Its operations were quietly conducted for a year past. Some of the tracts in Indiana will be stripped as Ohio has already been, and the lumber shipped to Europe. Farmers now find they could get far more for the timber if they had not sold it.

A Boston girl was showing her rural cousin the Christmas presents she received, and the latter particularly admired a gold watch set with pearls. "But here is a gift," said the Boston girl, taking up a book, "that I value more highly than all the other presents combined." The rural cousin took the book and read the title, "The Dissection of the Atomic Theory in its Relation to Evolution."

A clergyman and a professional gambler had a bicycle race in Arizona. The pastor's congregation brought a charge of unseemly conduct against him, and he has indignantly resigned. He says that it is folly to erect too high a standard of dignity in a border community; and, moreover, he doesn't believe that the brethren would hav complained but for the unfortunate fact that he lost the race.

For a month past a man carrying an accordion, paint pot, and brush, has traveled through Rockland county, New York, and Bergen county, New Jersey. He plays his instrument of torture at hotels and public places and then takes up a collection. The rocks and buildings in many public places hav been defaced by his clumsy lettering of the words, "Prepare to meet thy God; repent or go to hell." There is a presumption that the crank belongs to the Salvation Army.

The practice of retiring to "cyclone pits" during a storm has led to a schism in a Georgia church. A majority of the brethren considered such a means of safety an evidence of distrust in God. The minority replied that they trusted in God as much as anybody, but when they saw an able-bodied cyclone coming they were going to get out of the way. All efforts to bridge over the schism hav failed, and the church is now divided under the heads of Cyclone Primitivs and Anticyclone Primitivs.

Of all the cool things in this world the passage cited from the sentence of death passed by a Wyoming territorial judge upon a condemned murderer is certainly the coolest. After reviewing the trial, he said to the prisoner: "I am by no means satisfied with the evidence in the case, and am not sure whether you killed John Forbes or whether he died by the visitation of God, but my sentence is that you be hanged on the third Friday of June; and should you know of your own innocence, you will hav the comforting thought that it is doubted by some of the wisest thinkers of the age whether life is in any circumstance worth living."

According to an English paper, the London street Arab is a fatalist like the Turk. "Do you ever wonder why you are so miserable?" was asked one of the fraternity. "Well," he said, "it's all the Lord's doing this way: you are grand like and dress well and livs in a big house, and you hav a pianner an' a sofy; so the Lord sees as how you are a gentleman and thinks lots of you. But we are very poor, we are. Mother pawns the blankets, and father beats mother and swears awful. We hain't got no Sunday things; we're all ragety, so the Lord don't take much notice on us."

A "layman" writing the Rutland Herald says: "That the pulpit is a waning power is an undeniable and lamentable fact, of which many of its occupants are too painfully conscious. This is equally true in city and country. For some reason the larger part of all classes absent themselvs from the church services of the Sabbath. The day itself has lost much of the sanctity with which it was in former years invested, and is rapidly degenerating to the low level of pleasure-seeking Paris. And all this in spite of the great expense to render the places and services of public worship attractiv. It is a grave question whether all this glittering paraphernalia has not, in its excessiv splendor, damaged the cause it sought to support. Nor can it be doubted that the materialistic spirit of the age has overridden and, to a large degree, submerged the less ostentatious and more self-denying requirements of Christianity. It may also be conceded that the formulated creeds of our churches hav been overloaded with minuteness of detail on speculativ points of doctrin about which the wisest men differ, and the masses are in a condition of utter confusion."

The New York correspondent of the Galveston News writes to his paper: "A man of forty-five, with curly black hair and full beard, an acquiline nose, bright, eager eyes, and an expression of business shrewdness. Why do I describe him? Oh, because something over $1,000 has been paid to save his soul. He was a Jew; now his religion is Christianity. He is one of the seven converts made in a year by the Rev. Jacob Freshman, an evangelist among the Hebrews of New York. This mission has cost more than $7,000, and is sustained by voluntary contributions, chiefly from Methodists. The expense of making ostensible Christians out of Chinaman in New York is only about $4 apiece; the three specimens of Arab converts whom I hav found did not entail, according to the estimate of the good woman who got them, more than $6 each; and I suppose it is fair to say that, on the whole, the accessions to the churches from the ranks of unbelievers are equally cheap in money, notwithstanding the earnest labor often involved; but Jews come high, and for the soul of the man I hav mentioned as much money was expended as would, in slavery days, hav bought the body of a stalwart black man or woman."

A minister in one of our orthodox churches, while on his way to preach a funeral sermon in the country, called to see one of his members, an old lady, who had just been making sausages, and, as she felt very proud of them, insisted on the minister taking some home to his family. After wrapping the sausages in a cloth, the minister carefully placed the bundle in the pocket of his great coat. Thus equipped he started for the funeral. While attending the solemn ceremonies of the grave some hungry dogs scented the sausages, and were not long in tracking them to the pocket of the good man's overcoat. Of course this was a great annoyance, and he was several times under the necessity of kicking the whelps away. The obsequies of the grave completed, the minister and the congregation repaired to the church, where the funeral discourse was to be preached. After the sermon was finished the minister halted to make some remarks to his congregation, when a brother, who wished to hav an appointment given out, ascended the stairs of the pulpit and gave the minister's coat a hitch to get his attention. The divine, thinking it a dog having designs on his pocket, raised his foot, gave a sudden kick, and sent the good brother sprawling down the steps. "You will excuse me, brethren and sisters," said the minister confusedly, and without looking at the work he had just done, "for I could not avoid it. I hav sausages in my pocket, and that dog has been trying to grab them ever since he came upon the premises."

Mary Flynn, of Cincinnati, has waked up to find herself famous through the attractions of esoteric Buddhism. It is just a month ago since Miss Flynn was admitted into the Buddhist communion at the nativ college, Colombo, Ceylon. The recorder, describing the rite of reception, says the neophyte took her seat among a circle of yellow-capped priests, who questioned her as to her reasons for abjuring the error of Christianity and embracing the true faith. The novice, with nativ modesty, explained that, having thoroughly studied the various religious systems of the world (over 2,000), she found Buddhism alone in accordance with her reason and common sense. On this the Ulema anointed her forehead with the consecrated spittle in token of acceptance, and Mary became a member of the largest church in the world. The interest of her curious translation lies in the fact that Miss Flynn is an Irish girl by race, as he name proclaims, for it is poetic lore that "the Raffertys and Bralaghans, the Flynns and the Hallaghans are sprigs and boughs and branches of the true shillelah tree," and few of them ever forsake the old faith. Other still more distinguished Americans hav gone Mary's way. The late accomplished and kind-hearted Sam Ward was a professed disciple of Buddhism and on his way to its center in India when death stood on the road.

The bitter enmity of Catholicism to Freethought was thus voiced by the Catholic Universe when Colonel Ingersoll lectured in Cleveland last May: "Last Sunday evening the Opera House, Cleveland, was filled from top to bottom with an audience that paid fifty cents a head to hear the now noted Ingersoll insult every sentiment of Christian faith. The wonder is not that Ingersoll insults the Christian religion. It pays Ingersoll better than it did Judas; yet Judas is not the less Judas, nor Ingersoll the less a standing infamy to Christian society. The wonder is that Christian men and Christian women will pay to hav their God and their religion insulted and their faith outraged. Here we hav an audience of supposed Christians paying to hav their God insulted, Jesus Christ mocked, and the holiest sentiments of religion ridiculed. Were the possibility of such an audience confined to Cleveland, we might suppose the cause was peculiar to local training. But this infamous blasphemer is greeted with just such applauding and crowded audiences wherever he goes. The cause is in the audiences and not in the lecturer. It is folly to say these audiences do not sympathize with Ingersoll. Their applause and laughter at his sneers and mockery of Christ and churches, and the holiest dogmas of religion, show that Christian faith has no place in their hearts. Ingersoll but brings to light the irreligious condition of American society. No man will permit what he reveres to be insulted. No man would allow his mother to be insulted, far less pay a man to insult her. Yet here in Cleveland, and throughout the whole country, wherever this blaspheming insulter of God and religion goes, he not only can get, and does get, the largest audiences to listen to him insulting God, but they pay him to do it. But will any man pretend that his mother is more sacred than his God? The man who would not strike down the insulter of his mother is no man. Yet here in Cleveland supposed Christian men pay to hav their God insulted. It shows full well where we are, and whither we are going. It shows, further, what our godless schools and godless education are producing; whither Protestantism is drifting and where ending. At the rate American society is drifting we will soon be a people without God, and in morals little better than pagans—if as good."

An anti-vaccination congress met at Charleroi, France, last Monday. Herbert Spencer, Haeckel, and Buchner sent approving letters.

Nearly one hundred thousand people went sailing down the bay from New York to Rockaway and Coney Island last Sunday to escape the heat of the city.

Boston has a murder mystery. Portions of a woman's body hav been found in the Charles river, and the police are unable to either identify the remains or discover the criminals in the case.

Queen Victoria's daughter Beatrice was married July 23d to Mr. Battenberg, of Germany. The event was celebrated after the manner in which Americans observe the Fourth of July.

The Rev. John Simpson, a Baptist minister of Fredericton, New Brunswick, was arrested last Saturday for horse stealing. He had two horses with him. He drew a revolver and tried to shoot the officer, but was overpowered. Simpson's reputation has been very poor for some years.

Mr. Lonsdale and Mr. Chetwynd, two noble lords of England, battered and slugged each other in Rotten Row, London, the other day until separated by the police. Mrs. Langtry was the cause of it. Lonsdale is the man who sent Edmund Yates, of the London World, to jail for intimating in his paper that Lonsdale had eloped.

A commission has been appointed, or has appointed itself, to investigate the current charges of immorality against London's nobility, and see whether they hav done altogether according to the cry of it. The commission is composed largely of church dignitaries. They will probably report this week. The Berlingske Tidende and Dagsanen, newspapers published at Copenhagen, Denmark, refer to a public scandal involving a professor in the university of that city, the president of a leading scientific society, a most eminent author, several wealthy merchants, and some members of the magistracy. These are accused of crimes similar to those mentioned in the Pall Mall Gazette's charges.

General Ulysses S. Grant died at 8:8 o'clock on the morning of Thursday, July 23d. His last word was "Water," indicating thirst. There was no priest or minister at his bedside. General Grant was born April 27, 1822, and was therefore 63 years of age. The principal events in his career are as follows: He was graduated at the West Point Military Academy in 1843; engaged in the Mexican war; married in 1848 Julia, daughter of Frederick Dent, of St Louis, Mo.; August 7, 1861, he was commissioned brigadier-general, and March 17, 1864, he assumed command of all the armies of the United States; and April 9, 1865, defeated Lee at Appomatox Court-house, which practically ended the civil war. In 1868 he was elected president, and in 1872 was re-elected with a larger majority than any other candidate for president ever received. At the close of his second term he made a tour around the world, and was everywhere received with distinguished marks of respect. His subsequent career as a business man, and his failure through the rascality of his partner, Ward, are still fresh in the memory of all. He leaves his family well provided for, the advance orders for his "Memoirs" already having amounted to over $300,000. He will be buried in Riverside Park, New York city.

Facts and Fallacies of the New Testament.

HEAVEN.

Heaven is the hope of the Christian. But for belief that it is an abode of perfect love, peace, and happiness, people would not deprive themselvs of needed comforts and innocent pleasures, and giv of their earnings to build grand, gorgeous, and costly churches and cathedrals, used only for an hour or two one day in the week, too grand, too sumptuously upholstered for poor folks to sit in. But for the hope of heaven and its supposed joys, people would not stint themselvs and children so as to pay fat salaries to priests and parsons, enabling these to revel in luxury, dress in broadcloth, and look down in sovereign contempt upon the poor workers who help to keep them so fine and dainty.

The exactions of the priesthood hav been onerous and heavy. They hav never been a producing class in any sense of the word, but always lived and flourished upon the toils and labors of others. The fat of the land and the fattest of yellow-legged chickens hav always been theirs. In return they claim to care for our poor souls; tell us all about heaven and how to get there, and threaten, if we fail to submit to their dictation and exactions, we shall go to sheol (hell is now voted obsolete, old style, and vulgar).

But what do priests or parsons know about heaven? They declare that all they tell us is revealed in the Bible; that no other book can tell us anything about heaven; that the blessed Bible is God's revealed will—"a lamp to our feet and a light to our path."

Then, why cannot we read it for ourselvs, and understand it, without a priest to tell us what it means? The Bible tells us, "The holy scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation" (2 Tim. iii, 15). If heaven is now the abode of God, where did he exist before creation? Christians declare God created the heavens and the earth, and all that in them is, about six thousand years ago, but that God always existed. Where?

Where was this all-wise, omnipotent God during all eternity, before he created heaven to dwell in? The Bible says that on the first day, after creating heaven and earth, he made light, "and God saw the light, that it was good." When? When he first made it, six thousand years ago. Then for all eternity this all-powerful, all-wise God was in utter darkness—was blind. Think of it. An almighty God going it blind for all eternity!

Did he create for himself eyes at the time of the creation? It is alleged he could see in the dark just as well as in the light. We demand the proof. What could he see? Gazing into darkness, he could not see, for there was not anything to see—no heaven, no earth, no stars, no sun—nothing, neither living nor dead. "Darkness was upon the face of the deep."

Could an all-wise God grow in knowledge? The the Bible God did:

"And the Lord came down to see the city, and the tower which the children of men builded" (Gen. xi, 5).

At this time the "all-seeing eye," which we now hear so much about, had not been invented. God had to come down to earth to get a view of the tower, and see if there was immediate danger of men building it close up to heaven. God came down from where? Down from heaven. How many miles is it from heaven, God's dwelling-place, to the earth?

Ministers all unite in asserting that heaven is beyond space. Every Sunday they inform us that "at death the immortal soul of the righteous takes its flight beyond the realms of time and space, and goes to God, who gave it."

We know heaven (God's dwelling-place) is not within space. Herschel, with his wonderful telescope, has scanned the space; he has discovered nebula within space so far away that its light takes two million years to reach the earth. If God had so far to come, although he came with the rapidity of light, the tower must not only hav been built, but moldered away with the ravages of time, hundreds of thousands of years before God could hav got to it.

Again, we ask, could an all-wise God increase in knowledge? The Bible God does; for no God in our day would say of people who imagined they could build a tower that should reach to heaven, "Nothing will be restrained from them which they hav imagined to do (Gen. xi, 6). Any kind of a God to-day ought to know there was no need to restrain them; that, let the people do their best, they never could build a tower as high as the peaks of the loftiest mountain—and they were building on the plain. The Bible God did not at that time know that as they ascended, the air being more and more rarefied, they would be unable to liv. There was no need to confound their language to prevent their building a brick tower to heaven.

Then, too, think what a journey all the Gods had; for he said to the other Gods, "Let us go down." Heaven must be far beyond the farthest planet, millions of millions of miles from earth. What a journey for a lot of all-wise Gods to take for so pitiable a small foolish matter!

The Bible very positivly declares its God did not know anything about the present—still less about the future. We read:

"And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous,

"I will go down now, and see whether they hav done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not I will know" (Gen. xviii, 20, 21).

God had to come down to see; couldn't tell until he got there and made an investigation. This is not man's say-so, but God's own declaration.

In this chapter he proves he had no knowledge of the future and was a very poor prophet, for, speaking of his chosen people, the Jews, the descendants of Abraham, he claimed to know what subsequently he admits he did not know:

"For I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment" (Gen. xviii, 19).

Nothing could be further from the facts; they did nothing of the kind. But although the Bible abounds with absurdities, and its God is but a barbarous reflection of a degraded, ignorant people, we hav all our lives been taught to revere it by priests and ministers, and they hav assured us the Bible taught virtues, truths, and morals vastly superior to all other books. They hav made us believe this world is all a fleeting show, a wilderness of woe, and bid us be regardless of the here and now, but seek for perfect love, peace, and happiness in heaven.

What is the Christian heaven? Where is it situated? In what part of the holy Bible can we find a clear, intelligible account or description of heaven, this promised land of never-ending pleasures?

Christ when on earth promised to send the comforter, "the spirit of truth, who would guide us into all truth" (John xvi, 13), so that all would come to the unity of the faith. That promis was made over eighteen hundred years ago, but that holy spirit has not materialized yet. Conditions never proved favorable.

Is it not evidence of some mistake, somewhere, about the Bible being the revealed will of God and teaching a religion of love and unity of faith when honest people cannot agree as to its meaning, but hate each other most fiercely because they honestly differ? Why don't that Holy Ghost bring all to unity of the faith in bonds of peace?

For lack of any scripture that describes heaven, or even intimates that it is in any sense a desirable abode for saints, priests and parsons quote 1 Cor. ii, 9:

"But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hav entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

This text they "wrest, as they do also the other scripture," perverting it from its plain and obvious purport so as to make it seem to sustain the dogmas of their church creed. Reading the context will convince anyone that there is not even an allusion made to heaven. Both Paul and Isaiah, whom he quotes, refer only to the advantages resulting from faith in this present life. The very next sentence proves this.

The first approach to anything like a description of heaven is found in Heb. viii, 1–5, and we propose to avoid the possibility of any mistake by confining ourselvs to the Bible, giving the chapter and verse, so all may know just exactly what the Bible does teach about heaven:

"Now of the things which we hav spoken this is the sum: We hav such a high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens: a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man. For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices; wherefore it is of necessity that this man hav somewhat also to offer. For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount" (Heb. viii, 1–5).

"The Holy Ghost this signifying, That the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present. But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these, but the heavenly things themselvs with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. ix—read the whole chapter).

The New Testament declares Christ is now in heaven acting as our high priest in the original tabernacle existing in heaven (Heb. viii, 2). The Mosaic tabernacle was made an exact copy (Heb. viii, 5).

To understand this tabernacle and the priestly work of Christ in heaven, and learn just what kind of a place heaven is, we must examin Bible teaching in regard to this tabernacle. In Exodus we read:

"And let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them.

"According to all that I shew thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it" (Exodus, xxv, 8, 9).

First we read in this chapter that there was an ark 45 inches long, 27 inches broad, and 27 inches high, made of accacia or shittim wood.

Many people hav wondered why Jesus chose the trade of a carpenter, but since so much carpenter and joiner's work had to be done in heaven—and it is claimed Christ was there from the very beginning—"All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made" (John, i, 3)—it is easy to understand why Christ chose a trade with which he had long been familiar in heaven. It is strange, and much to be regretted, that the savior and benefactor of men, who spoke as never man spoke, never said a word about a circular saw or a planing machine. Too busy preaching. Preachers, following his example, never do anything useful.

Over the ark was a mercy seat of pure gold, 3x9 long, 2x3 broad, with two cherubim, one at each end; a table, 3 feet long, 18 inches broad, and 27 inches high, with rings and staves to carry it about (verse 23); "dishes, spoons, covers, and bowls, of pure gold shalt thou make them" (verse 29).

Doubtless many hav wondered that heaven should be surrounded by a mighty wall, compared with which that of China sinks into insignificance (Rev. xxi, 17).

Since all the wicked are cast into a lake of fire, there could be no need of "a wall great and high" (Rev. xxi, 12) to keep out the sinners. The wall and gates must therefore be to keep the saints in and prevent their escape. What troubled us was, why should saints wish to escape from heaven and get away from Paradise? But this mystery is now fully explained.

God had in the beginning, in his great grief of heart, repented he had ever made man, because every imagination of the thoughts of man's hearts was evil continually" (Gen. vi, 5, 6). So, when he made heaven, he built this wall great and high, and stationed angels at each gate, perhaps to prevent the missionaries, Sunday-school superintendents, and other pillars of the church stealing the gold spoons and skedaddling to Canada. How plain and easy to be understood are many of the mysteries of godliness, if men would but search the scriptures and believe "all scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable" (2 Tim. iii. 16).

On the table is the shew-bread (Ex. xxv. 30), then there are candlesticks, lamps, tongs, and snuffers (verse 38). What! all these things in heaven? The Bible says so. There is no other reliable source of information as to what is in heaven (Ex. xxv, 40; Heb. viii, 4, 5; Heb. ix, 8, 11).

The twenty-sixth chapter of Exodus givs an account of curtains in heaven (10), of fine twined linen, blue, purple, and scarlet, 42 feet long, 6 feet wide; 11 of goats' hair (Ex. xxvi, 7). It is to be regretted that Jesus, when on earth, did not bless mankind with the secret of making alpaca, a most useful fabric. Only recently has the genius of men succeeded in manufacturing it to perfection.

Rams' skins, dyed red, and badger skins—"And thou shalt make a covering for the tent of rams' skins, dyed red, and a covering above of badger skins" (Ex. xxvi, 14). Rams and badgers killed in heaven, and their skins dyed fancy colors and made into curtains!

So the Bible, book divine, declares:

"And look that thou make them after their pattern which was shewed thee in the mount" (Ex. xxv, 40).

"We hav such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man: who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount" (Heb. viii, 1–5).

We read of about fifty boards in heaven, 27 inches wide, 15 feet long—each board with two tenons (Ex. xxvi, 15–25).

Yet Jesus, working at carpenter-work four thousand years in heaven and about twenty on earth, never told us how to make a mortising machine. What strange forgetfulness on his part! We might think he had not time. But suppose he had used the time and same number of words in describing useful inventions that he did use in wild, fierce denunciations of those who differed with him, calling them hypocrits, vipers, and other hard names, wouldn't it hav been more in character with the blessed redeemer and savior of men? Did calling hard names ever do any good? ever reform anyone? ever prove anything save the lack of judgment on the part of the person doing so? You say you will call names and use harsh words when people make you angry. Yes, but how about denunciations by one who "was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth" (Isa. liii, 7); who, Peter declared, "when he was reviled, reviled not again?" (1 Peter ii, 23).

Gentle reader, please ask your minister to explain why the Holy Ghost ruled Christ out of the kingdom of God. He most certainly did, for we read:

"Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselvs with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi, 9, 10).

Christ reviled the Pharisees, called them fools, hypocrits, whited sepulchers, murderers, serpents, vipers, and sent them to the damnation of hell (Matt.

xxiii). So if the Bible is true, if Paul wrote by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, Christ will be expelled from heaven. C. B. Reynolds.

What the State Should Do for the Workingman.

In the first place, it should not tax him too much. Taxes must be levied, but they should fall on the useless class rather than on the useful. There is a kind of chess-board made for traveling, which carries the men attached, each to a separate square. They can be moved to and fro, but they cannot be taken off without danger of loss. If you want to get all the men off from your side of the board, you must put them on your opponents'. If you want to get taxes off of that property which is acquired by labor, you must put them on that which is not acquired by labor, but by bequest.

Property owes its origin to labor, either manual or mental; but some property has been gained by the labor of the owner, while other property was not worked for by the present owner, but by some former owner, from whom it has been inherited. We hav made a great advance on the old system of exempting the so-called nobility, who lived on the acquisitions of their ancestors, from taxation, and in consequence crushing the laboring classes. We should do well to take still another step forward, that of encouraging industry, economy, and enterprise by letting the property they create bear less of the burden of taxation than falls on the property which is handed down to the possessor simply on account of his birth. We all know that the men who inherit large fortunes are not, as a rule, those most able to use them for the public good. Suppose that a manufacturing village is built up by the joint exertions of the operativs and their employer. He owns one-half of the assessed property, and pays one-half of the taxes. This seems to me a just arrangement. His death hands over the property to young men who hav done nothing for the community that has not been already amply recompensed. There is no hardship or injustice in making them pay a legacy fee equal to all the taxes which would otherwise hav been levied that year, and letting every holder of property, which he has earned, be relieved accordingly.

What would be better still for the latter class, of course, would be to hav their taxes permanently and regularly diminished by a tax on all bequests and inheritances all over the state. Thus they would be better paid for their labor, and more encouraged to work and save.

An important move in this direction has recently been made in New York by the passage of a law imposing a tax of five per cent on collateral inheritances of over $500. This is to bring $1,000,000 into the treasury annually, and all other taxes will be less in consequence. Now is the time to propose an extension of this principle to the property inherited directly. The poor man's earnings should pass unhindered to his children; but anyone who inherits $5,000 or over from his parents might justly be required to pay one per cent to the state, and this rate might be increased gradually. If the people ask for this, they can hav it. F. M. Holland.

How Minister's Travel.

Frank Wilkeson in the Sun.

A few days ago I went West over the New York, Lake Erie, and Western Railroad. When I entered the sleeping car at Jersey City, the Pullman car porter, an old acquaintance, greeted me cheerily. In reply to my inquiry as to the progress of his material prosperity and the welfare of his family, he replied that travel was light, that people seemed to be poor, that his last two trips had been almost dead failures financially, that his room rent was almost due, and that if business in his line did not speedily revive, there was one Pullman porter who would become a bankrupt. At this direful prospect he smiled brightly, as is the wont of his race when contemplating disasters that are obscured in the shades of the future.

When we arrived at Marion I was busily engaged with a box of matches and an alleged cigar, and consequently failed to observe the people on the platform. Soon after the train left Marion the porter came into the smoking room. He rubbed his hands together. He smiled cheerfully. He nodded respectfully to me, and then said, joyfully: "Colonel" (passengers out of whose pockets half a dollar is to be coaxed are always addressed by Pullman car porters as colonel), "Colonel," he said, "I picked up eight Chicago passengers at Marion. That will make a good trip for me. The luck has turned. No bankruptcy for me." Then, having dropped into the smoking room in a friendly way, and solely to impart reassuring information to an acquaintance, he hurried off whisk-broom in hand.

Entering the body of the car I was greatly pleased to see eight well-dressed gentlemen occupying seats in the hitherto almost empty car. One, who occupied the section opposit mine, was a tall, slender, red-headed man. His mouth was crooked. His nose was dished. His eyes were small and black, I had almost written piglike. He smiled continually. His black coat was buttoned to his chin. I turned in my seat and looked at the seven other men. They were clad in black. They sat erect. They all smiled continually, through excess of cheerfulness, I supposed. I hav had one or two disastrous experiences with men who smiled in and out of season, and I am a little shy of them at present. So I abandoned my intention of making acquaintances, and turned to look out of the window. The red-headed man, who sat opposit me, arose and crossed over to my seat, and, after settling himself comfortably, opened conversation by asking where I was going. "To Kansas," I replied. He brightened visibly at my reply, and exclaimed, enthusiastically, "Ah, to the prohibition state! A grand state! A grand state!" he repeated, and then he inquired into the practical working of the prohibition laws. I courteously explained to him the perjury, the lying, the frauds, the meannesses that are called into life by the prohibition laws, and that troop around the Kansas courts. When I had finished my explanation he wasn't so enthusiastic, but he was crafty, even foxy, in manner. It was evident that he suspected that I was a Kansas druggist, and consequently heavily interested in the liquor business. He smiled a smile indicativ of superior wisdom, and left my section. He joined the seven apostles who were sitting behind me.

From fragments of conversation that all the occupants of the car were at liberty to overhear, I gathered that the eight from Marion were country clergymen, bound for the Rocky Mountains, where they were to travel for a couple of months, and that the red-headed minister was their guide, their Moses, He had evidently boasted in rural places that he could travel cheaply, that he could circumvent the wiles of the wicked Western men, that he possessed highly desirable economic knowledge of cheap hotels, cheap eating houses, cheap lines of travel, and, presumably, of cheap and valuable silver mines that lie on the pine-clad flanks of the Rocky Mountains in Colorado.

The newsboy entered the car, carrying late Chicago papers for sale. He offered them to the eight apostles. They declined to buy. Then Moses, in a loud tone, asked him if he had the revised Old Testament for sale. Courteously the newsboy replied: "No; I carry only such books and papers as will sell readily. The Erie's passengers do not ask for the revised Old Testament," and he passed on. The apostles were silent. Apparently they were absorbed in inward contemplation of the wickedness of the Erie's passengers. I saw the porter standing by the door of the drawing room. He had overheard the question of Moses and the newsboy's answer. The light, the joy, had faded from his black face. He gazed down the car with a far-away look, as though intently watching the legal process of grinding a Pullman car porter to dust between the upper and nether millstones of a bankruptcy court. I arose and walked back to the smoking room. Soon the porter followed me. He leaned wearily against the door frame and said plaintivly and lowly:

"Colonel, are they all ministers?" "Yes, porter, all," I replied. He looked at me solemnly for an instant, and then said sadly: "I am ruined. Clergymen are worse than women. Women, even if they do not giv freely to a porter, do not cut down our receipts from the other passengers. Clergymen do. They exasperate the men who may be traveling in the car, and a man will not giv a porter much if he is irritated." The porter ceased talking. He gazed at me intently. He rubbed his chin reflectivly with his hand, and leaned more wearily than ever against the door frame. Then he plaintivly wailed, "I wish they would stay at home." I tried to cheer him. I prophesied that the eight men from Marion would probably pan out better than he expected. Without a smile he shook his head negativly, and said: "They can easily do that. It would trouble them to do worse than I expect." Then, subdued in spirit and with dejected manner, he turned his attention to lamp cleaning and marble rubbing.

Dinner time came. The apostles were hungry. They formed column behind Moses, and in Indian file stalked solemnly into the dining room of a wayside eating station. I heard Moses try to bargain with the eating-house keeper, a sallow and lank young man, whose temper had been tried by fever and ague and five-grain doses of quinine, for eight dinners for fifty cents each, instead of seventy-five cents each, which was the regular price. The sallow and lank young man refused to cut rates to clergymen. He insisted that they ate as much as laymen, and that they should pay the same price. The seven followers of the red-headed man gazed reproachfully at him. His prestige was impaired. It was evident that there would be a rebellion in the apostolic ranks if this thing continued. After eight dinners had been eaten Moses again endeavored to hav the price reduced on the ground of underdone roast beef. The attempt failed, and, with great reluctance, he paid the obdurate and sallow and lank young man $6. I stood on the platform by the open window talking to the young man. As the last of the clergymen filed into the sleeping car he winked irreverently at me and said, as he dropped the money into the till, "I am on to the clergyman racket." I was sorry that youth's temper had been sharpened by fever and ague and quinine. I felt that he would hav done justice to the occasion if he had been stronger and in better humor.

As the train drew nigh to Chicago the porter bustled around, whisk-broom in hand, and invited man after man to come into the rear room of the car to be brushed and to cross his palm with silver. Assiduously he brushed the eight from Marion. Then he came to me with outstretched hand and said: "See what the eight clergymen gave me! It puts me in mind of the days I ran between Denver and Leadville on the Rio Grande." His left hand was half full of cents, three-cent pieces, and nickels. With the dusky index finger of his right hand he pushed three blackened cents to one side of his left palm and said: "The leader, the red-headed one, gave those to me. They almost pay for the blacking I used on his big boots." A three-cent piece followed after the blackened cents. "That," he said, "was the gift of the little fat preacher, the one who snored so loud last night"—this simply to identify him, and not in the least disrespectfully. A battered and disreputable looking nickel joined the three blackened cents and three-cent piece. "That," said the porter, "was given to me by the bald-headed one who chewed tobacco. Well," he added, as he put the collection into his pocket, "I got fifty-three cents from the eight of them." He stood looking at me for an instant. Then he revolved his dusky palms one above the other to represent the millstones of a bankruptcy court. He blew away a pile of suppositious dust, and shot a smile at me as he turned to enter the body of the car. I saw him no more.

At Chicago the apostles marched in column of twos out of the depot. I was delayed for an instant. When I reached the omnibus stand Moses was talking with a square-jawed, black-moustached man, who had charge of Parmeeter's stages. Moses was trying to hav the fare of his party reduced from fifty cents to twenty-five cents. The manager of the stages was a hardened wretch, probably a nativ of the wicked city of Chicago. At any rate, he refused to carry clergymen for half price, and dryly suggested to Moses that he and his party had best "hoof it" to the Burlington depot. The apostles looked scornfully at Moses. They openly murmured against him. They sulkily straggled up the street, heavily laden with gripsacks. Moses was not in the lead. He had been deposed. The hollowness of his profession to be able to travel cheaply had been promptly exposed, and exposed before the West had been reached.

Oh, the humiliation, the shame, the mortification, that await the apostles in the Rocky Mountains! And await them simply because their congregations are too mean to pay them fair salaries for the arduous work they perform. Their meanness forced these gentlemen to practice economies when traveling that drew forth the scorn of the unthinking, and caused the cheeks of unbelievers to bulge with derision.

How Did Thomas Paine Die?

In 1877 the editor of the New York Observer said:

"We hav published the testimony, and the witnesses are on hand to prove that Tom Paine died a drunken, cowardly, and beastly death."

The testimony upon which the Rev. Sam. Prime relied was nearly all to be found in a letter purporting to hav been written by the Right Rev. Benedict Joseph Fenwick, bishop of Boston, to his brother, a Jesuit priest, in Georgetown, D. C., who died in 1827. The first appearance of the letter was after the death of Bishop Fenwick in 1846, where it was published in several Catholic organs. In 1872 it reappeared in the lives of "Deceased Bishops." If the letter is truthful as well as genuin, then it must be admitted that Paine did die a drunken, cowardly, and beastly death.

But the letter is a fabrication. If Bishop Fenwick wrote it, he was as big a liar as Baron Munchausen and as wicked a sinner as Judas Iscariot. It was doubtless the work of a Jesuit priest in 1846, palmed off upon the deceased bishop. In 1883 a full exposure of the fraud was made in The Truth Seeker and Investigator, and a pamphlet edition was printed by both offices, price five cents. Copies hav been sent to the principal Catholic papers and to many priests, but they are all mum about it. Not one of them dares now to assert the authenticity of that "Roman Catholic Canard;" nor will the New York Observer again dare to allege, on such fabricated testimony, that "Paine died a drunken, cowardly, and beastly death."

When the Rev. Editor Prime crawfished in his controversy with Colonel Ingersoll in 1877, his last assertion was:

"We hav never stated in any form, nor hav we ever supposed, that Paine actually renounced his Infidelity. The accounts agree in stating that he died a blaspheming Infidel."

That fabricated account of a scene at the death-bed of the dying Deist is the only basis for the charge that "Paine died a blaspheming Infidel." There was a single Catholic church in New York in 1809, and the priests in charge of it were Fenwick and Kohlman; but neither of them ever saw Paine on his death-bed. Next to a Scotch Tory, Paine hated a Catholic priest. Antiquary.

The Darwin Memorial.

It is not often that the unveiling of a statue is attended with an interest at all comparable with that which characterized this ceremony as performed last Tuesday [June 9th] in the great hall of the Natural History Museum. If the greatness of a man is to be estimated by the measure in which he has influenced the thoughts of men, it is scarcely open to question that the greatest man of our century is Charles Darwin. As Professor Huxley remarked in the course of his singularly judicious and well-balanced address, Mr. Darwin's work has not only reconstructed the science of biology, but has spread with an organizing influence through almost every department of philosophical thought. Yet it was not merely the greatness of the naturalist which invested the proceedings in the Natural History Museum with an interest so unique. It was known to the whole assembly that the man whom they delighted to honor was one whose moral nature had been cast in the same lines of simple grandeur as those which belonged to his intellectual nature. It therefore only needed a passing allusion from Professor Huxley to enable the whole assembly to reflect that it was due as much to massivness of character as to massivness of work that within three years of his death Mr. Darwin's name should constitute a new center of gravity in every system of thought. And it was this reflection which gave to the ceremony so unusual a measure of interest. Around the statue were congregated the most representativ men of every branch of culture, from the Prince of Wales and the Archbishop of Canterbury to the opposit extremes of radicalism and Freethought. Indeed, it is not too much to say that there can scarcely ever hav been such an occasion on which so many illustrious men of opposit ways of thinking hav met to express a common agreement upon a man to whom they hav felt that honor is due. The international memorial could not in any nation hav found a more worthy site than the one in which it has been placed; but, if anything could hav added to the "solemn gladness" with which the personal friends of Mr. Darwin witnessed the presentation of this memorial, it must hav been the evidence which the assembly yielded that, among the innumerable differences of opinion which it represented, his memory must henceforth be always and universally regarded as a changeless monument of all that is greatest in human nature, as well as of all that is greatest in human achievement.

Concerning the statue itself, we hav only to speak in terms of almost unqualified praise. It is, in the truest sense of the phrase, a noble work of art. The attitude is not only easy and dignified, but also natural and characteristic; the modeling of the head and face is unexceptionable, and the portrait is admirable. The only criticism we hav to advance has reference to the hands, which not only do not bear the smallest resemblance to those of Mr. Darwin, but are of a kind which, had they been possessed by him, would hav rendered impossible the accomplishment of much of his work. Although this misrepresentation is a matter to be deplored, it is not one for which the artist can be justly held responsible. Never having had the advantage of seeing Mr. Darwin, Mr. Boehm has only to be congratulated upon the wonderful success which has attended his portraiture of the face and figure; the hands were no doubt supplied by guess-work, and therefore we hav only to regret that the guess did not happen to be more fortunate.

The following is the address made by Professor Huxley, in the name of the Darwin Memorial Committee, on handing over the statue to the Prince of Wales, as representativ of the trustees of the British Museum:

YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS: It is now three years since the announcement of the death of our famous countryman, Charles Darwin, gave rise to a manifestation of public feeling, not only in these realms, but throughout the civilized world, which, if I mistake not, is without precedent in the modest annals of scientific biography.

The causes of this deep and wide outburst of emotion are not far to seek. We had lost one of those rare ministers and interpreters of nature whose names mark epochs in the advance of natural knowledge. For, whatever be the ultimate verdict of posterity upon this or that opinion which Mr. Darwin had propounded; whatever adumbrations or anticipations of his doctrins may be found in the writings of his predecessors; the broad fact remains that since the publication, and by reason of the publication, of the "Origin of Species," the fundamental conceptions and the aims of the students of living nature hav been completely changed. From that work has sprung a great renewal, a true "instauratio magna" of the zoological and botanical sciences.

But the impulse thus given to scientific thought rapidly spread beyond the ordinarily recognized limits of biology. Psychology, Ethics, Cosmology were stirred to their foundations, and the "Origin of Species" proved itself to be the fixed point which the general doctrin of evolution needed in order to move the world. "Darwinism," in one form or another, sometimes strangely distorted and mutilated, became an everyday topic of men's speech, the object of an abundance both of vituperation and of praise, more often than of serious study.

It is curious now to remember how largely, at first, the objectors predominated; but, considering the usual fate of new views, it is still more curious to consider for how short a time the phase of vehement opposition lasted. Before twenty years had passed, not only had the importance of Mr. Darwin's work been fully recognized, but the world had discerned the simple, earnest, generous character of the man that shone through every page of his writings.

I imagin that reflections such as these swept through the minds alike of loving friends and of honorable antagonists when Mr. Darwin died; and that they were at one in the desire to honor the memory of the man who, without fear and without reproach, had successfully fought the hardest intellectual battle of these days.

It was in satisfaction of these just and generous impulses that our great naturalist's remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey; and that, immediately afterward, a public meeting, presided over by my lamented predecessor, Mr. Spottiswoode, was held in the rooms of the Royal Society, for the purpose of considering what further steps should be taken toward the same end.

It was resolved to invite subscriptions, with the view of erecting a statue of Mr. Darwin in some suitable locality; and to devote any surplus to the advancement of the biological sciences.

Contributions at once flowed in from Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United States, and the British colonies, no less than from all parts of the three kingdoms; and they came from all classes of the community. To mention one interesting case, Sweden sent in 2,296 subscriptions "from all sorts of people," as the distinguished man of science who transmitted them wrote, "from the bishop to the seamstress, and in sums from five pounds to two pence."

The executiv committee has thus been enabled to carry out the objects proposed. A "Darwin Fund" has been created, which is to be held in trust by the Royal Society, and is to be employed in the promotion of biological research.

The execution of the statue was intrusted to Mr. Boehm; and I think that those who had the good fortune to know Mr. Darwin personally will admire the power of artistic divination which has enabled the sculptor to place before us so very characteristic a likeness of one whom he had not seen.

It appeared to the committee that, whether they regarded Mr. Darwin's career or the requirements of a work of art, no site could be so appropriate as this great hall, and they applied to the trustees of the British Museum for permission to erect it in its present position.

That permission was most cordially granted, and I am desired to tender the best thanks of the committee to the trustees for their willingness to accede to our wishes.

I also beg leave to offer the expression of our gratitude to your royal highness for kindly consenting to represent the trustees to-day.

It only remains for me, your royal highness, my lords and gentlemen, trustees of the British Museum, in the name of the Darwin Memorial Committee, to request you to accept this statue of Charles Darwin.

We do not make this request for the mere sake of perpetuating a memory; for, so long as men occupy themselvs with the pursuit of truth, the name of Darwin runs no more risk of oblivion than does that of Copernicus or that of Harvey.

Nor, most assuredly, do we ask you to preserve the statue in its cynosural position in this entrance-hall of our National Museum of Natural History as evidence that Mr. Darwin's views hav received your official sanction; for science does not recognize such sanctions, and commits suicide when it adopts a creed.

No; we beg you to cherish this memorial as a symbol by which, as generation after generation of students of Nature enter yonder door, they shall be reminded of the ideal according to which they must shape their lives, if they would turn to the best account the opportunities offered by the great institution under your charge.

The following reply was made by his royal highness the Prince of Wales:

PROFESSOR HUXLEY AND GENTLEMEN: I consider it to be a high privilege to hav been deputed by the unanimous wish of my colleagues, the trustees of the British Museum, to accept, in their name, the gift which you hav offered us on behalf of the Committee of the Darwin Memorial. The committee and subscribers may rest assured that we hav most willingly assigned this honorable place to the statue of the great Englishman who has exerted so vast an influence upon the progress of those branches of natural knowledge the advancement of which is the object of the vast collections gathered here. It has given me much pleasure to learn that the memorial has received so much support in foreign countries that it may be regarded as cosmopolitan rather than as simply national; while the fact that persons of every condition of life hav contributed to it affords remarkable evidence of the popular interest in the discussion of scientific problems. A memorial to which all nations and all classes of society hav contributed can not be more fitly lodged than in our museum, which, though national, is open to all the world, and the resources of which are at the disposal of every student of nature, whatever his condition or his country, who enters our doors.—London Nature.

Miss Wixon Investigating Spiritualism.

E. M. MACDONALD, Dear Friend: Through the kindness of A. S. Hayward, of Boston, a magnetic physician of excellent ability, as has been demontrated in my own case, as well as hundreds of others, I am witnessing the "phenomena of Spiritualism" through some of its most noted media. I shall carefully and honestly investigate and report things as they appear to me.

Yesterday I had a seance with J. V. Mansfield, the well-known writing medium. I wrote two letters, one to my father, who has been in spirit-life thirteen years, and one to a friend recently deceased, carefully folding and pasting the edges, and across the folded page. Mr. Mansfield, a pleasant-faced gentleman of seventy years or thereabouts—too old to stoop to humbug, we should say—took the letters, one at a time, and, in my presence, commenced writing below the folded slips. The letters were answered, but not the questions that I asked. Had they been, I should hav felt the evidence important. I asked my father to name some of the members of our family, either living or deceased, but he either would not or could not. It was not the custom of my father to refuse any request of mine, especially so simple a one as the above. I will say, however, that the signature at the bottom of the reply bore a close resemblance to the way my father was in the habit of writing his name when living. I addressed him by name in the beginning of my letter to him, and addressed him as my father, in accordance with Mr. Mansfield's request.

In the other letter I called for one single word, but one word which would at once establish the identity of my friend, but it was not forthcoming. While I concede that the letters were replied to by Mr. Mansfield's hand, without his reading the letters, according to the best of my knowledge—and I was watching him all the time, neither the letters nor himself leaving my presence all the time—yet they were not fully answered, and, consequently, I cannot accept the letter-writing as a proof of spirit power. Perhaps another might hav been more successful. Today I expect to hav an interview with Henry Slade, and will report you the result.

Yours always in the investigation of truth,

SUSAN H. WIXON.

The Let Alone Doctrin.

A friend in Canada who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER writes the following:

"Your ideas would likely be a great improvement on the present state of things, still the mills grind slowly. Buckle, in his 'History of Civilization,' shows and proves that whenever government tries to help it always does an injury. What is wanted is to let people alone. Canada is cursed with a paternal government at present. In 1878 John A. McDonald promised to help in every direction, to make all rich and happy. The people believed, and put him in power. Now the country is going to the dogs as fast as it can. The policy of the government has been one vast blunder. The fact is, we are not yet a civilized people."

I wish to giv the above extract because I am anxious to indorse it in the most emphatic manner. We are governed too much.

Progress is impeded and civilization nearly strangled even in this country by bad laws. Herbert Spencer says the best laws ever passed by any legislators hav been those repealing bad laws. They hav passed laws in the state of Michigan which hav enabled rich men to buy up and hold out of production 28,000,000 acres out of the 36,000,000 acres of the lands of that state. In this state we find the same condition of things, thousands of acres of valuable lands lying in idleness from year to year and from decade to decade. Hundreds of vacant lots in every village unoccupied and unused. It is law that is doing this. Any poor man may prove this by going and building on these vacant lots, or cultivating this vacant land. The strong arm of the law will soon be invoked to eject him into the street. It is not more laws we want, but just laws. We want laws which shall make it impossible for one man to turn another off of land he is not using, and never has used. We want laws making it impossible for rich men to hold three-fourths of the land of a state out of production. We do not want more law about land, but less, and we want it so that no person can be deprived of the use of land. The North American Indians had less law about land than we hav, and they all had equal rights to the soil. As a result there was no such wretched class among them as the poor in all our great cities.

"What is wanted is to let people alone." Yes, if government would only do that! But instead of this it has been selling our natural rights; it has been arming one class with the power to drive the other class off the earth, or at least into the streets, and from thence into the sea.

When the government sells land to one person, it takes it away from all others. Already it has sold nearly all the best lands in the country, and I notice it stated in the Bible Banner of Philadelphia that there are nearly two million landowners in this country. If this is the correct statement (and surely the Bible Banner would not lie), then we hav more than fifty million people who hav no land; that is, we hav twenty-five who hav not for every one who has. In Rhode Island the next inevitable step has been taken. All who hav not a certain amount of property are deprived of the right to vote, and there more than one-half of the males over twenty-one hav no votes.

Now, if selling land is right at all, then it is wholly right. Suppose, then, that on achieving our independence, the government had sold the whole country to one man, say to the highest bidder. Suppose that General Washington had been the buyer. Suppose he had had the country surveyed out as fast as needed, and suppose he had just rented the land to those wishing to use it for just as high rent as he could get, and continued to rent it, and his heirs should hav continued to do the same. Would there be anything wrong in this system? Or suppose each state should hav been sold to the highest bidder, and the purchaser should hav rented the lands to others, would that be right? If it would not hav been right to sell the land all to one, or all to forty, how can it be right to sell it to 2,000,000? The difference is merely one of degree. The 1,500,000 tenant farmers now in this country would be no worse off if they were paying all their rent to one man than they are now. Nor would they be so bad off, for rents would not then be so high as now.

Renting land is either right or it is wrong. If it is right, there is no reason why the government should not rent to all and put all on an equal footing, and keep them so, so far as natural opportunities are concerned. If it is wrong to rent land, then the government should not allow private citizens to do it.

J. G. MALCOLM.

The Tent.

ITHACA, MICH.—We struck tent on Monday, July 20th. Sunday, the 19th, was a gala day, never to be forgotten in Ithaca. Early in the morning it poured of rain, laid the dust, cooled the air, and at nine the air was beautiful, clear, and pleasant, and we had a most interesting meeting.

We hav had large attendance every lecture, and steadily increasing interest. A goodly number of the best and most intelligent ladies of the place attended every lecture. Many declare they never before imagined the Bible was so bad a book, or that Secularism was so admirable in its teachings, and so adapted to the wants and capable of elevating and promoting the best happiness of the human race. They had always supposed Infidelity meant contempt for every pure and ennobling principle. Prejudice has been removed, and a very large number hav begun to think and investigate for themselvs. The ministers declare that "it is the most awful, wicked, cruel thing that ever occurred—so many of the best people hav had their minds filled with doubt and distrust; quite a number will forsake Christianity and be lost." They declare there should be a law to prevent the open proclamation of such horrible, God-dishonoring doctrins, ruining and breaking up the church.

An immense assembly listened to our "Defense of the Devil" on Sunday afternoon, and on motion of Uncle Alonzo Peet, seconded by County Treasurer S. Haverlo, Mr. F. S. Kelly acted as foreman of the jury, and took viva voce verdict that the evidence most fully proved that the charge against the devil of being a liar from the beginning, and a murderer, was false and utterly without foundation; that according to the prosecutor's own witnesses the devil had never done aught to injure, but very much to benefit mankind.

The verdict was affirmed by a most vigorous and unanimous vote.

In the evening, having had the devil for a subject in the afternoon, we naturally got to "Heaven" at night. Wonder seemed to fill the minds of all present. Even those well posted in the Bible declared they had never imagined the Bible heaven could be so clearly brought to view, and the facts made to tell such crushing blows against orthodoxy.

To Messrs. Alonzo and Frank Peet, to Mr. S. Haverlo and Mr. F. S. Kelly, we are under obligations for kind help and encouragement. But to Isaac Gabrion, a man poor in the world's goods, but rich in intelligence, sterling worth, energy, and devotion to the cause of Secularism, and a Spiritualist of the right royal, Liberal, Elias Gault type, Ithaca is mainly indebted for the good work accomplished. His self-sacrifice, zeal, and devotion to the work are only equaled by the grand, good, irreproachable life he livs, and his example is a power for good. He is an enthusiastic solicitor for subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. May he and his good family reap the deserved reward of their devotion by seeing large numbers released from the chains and terrors of superstition.

We hav just arrived at Mason, to remain here over Sunday, the 26th. We open at Owosso on Wednesday, the 29th, and Henderson, August 6th. Then over the lake, and only a few stands before Albany.

We expect to make Bradford, Pa., en route. Will friends in that vicinity rally and write encouragement to Brother O. H. Wheeler?

Mr. Arthur Tilney proves a really valuable acquisition. His singing is a great attraction, and his suavity and geniality make him hosts of friends.

The weather here is fearfully hot—109° in the shade. Taking down and putting up the tent is quite a picnic, especially after three lectures on Sunday. Encouraged by the good results of our labor, and the earnest kind words and practical sympathy and aid of friends, we are determined to do and to endure.

A DESCRIPTION.

From the German-American.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 11th contained a double sheet pictorial caricature contrast of science and theology, an enterprise worthy that excellent advocate of advanced thought. The artist has done himself credit. The palmy days of the church witnesses the burning at the stake of Bruno, the pope and priests witnessing the burning of the heretic with expressions of joy. Galileo is represented sitting in his study, the pope holding the sword of inquisition over his head, and to save his life be forced to recant his philosophy. Martin Luther is represented tacking up his "Right of Private Judgment." Behind him stands the pope with the bull of excommunication drawn, and beside him the headsman's block and ax of infallibility. In their study are Morse and Stephenson applying their inventions to practical tests, and in the rear of them the Presbyterian pulpits are filled by two of the broadcloth gentlemen denouncing the inventions as "Thwarting the will of God," and branding these men and their inventions as "Heralds of Antichrist." Ingersoll stands on a platform apparently delivering his lecture "Which Way?" which he holds in his hand. Talmage approaches the platform at the colonel's back, pulling after him, by the arm, the chief of police, who holds in his hand the warrant of arrest for blasphemy. The colonel seems to take no notice of the spleeny, cadaverous form ascending the platform at his rear. Then comes the modern teachers of salvation, the Salvation Army, with their drums, bones, tambourines, and streamers (and screamers too), almost a facsimile of our crazy army. A group of likenesses of the teachers of science, Haeckel, Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, and Huxley, is also shown. The likenesses throughout are remarkably correct. As a pictorial history the caricatures contain volumes.

From the Freethinkers' Magazine.

"A Short Lesson in History for Christians" is the title of a two-page illustration in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 11th. It is a splendid design, and entitles the artist who drew it to great credit. We hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav this valuable production printed on heavy paper, suitable for framing. It would make an interesting ornament to adorn the walls of a Freethought home. THE TRUTH SEEKER is entitled to great credit for bringing out so good an illustration of what Freethought has had to contend with in the past, and is also contending with at the present time. And the best thing about the illustration is that it represents nothing but what is the truth.

The National Liberal League.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, President.

CHARLES WATTS, First Vice-President. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary, 33 Clinton Pl., New York.

COURTLANDT PALMER, Treas., 850 Broadway, New York.

Annual and Life Memberships.

Every Freethinker should become an Annual or Life Member of the National Liberal League. Life-membership certificates are issued at $25 each; annual membership, $1. These certificates are adapted to framing, and bear the signatures of the president of the League, Robert G. Ingersoll, and of its secretary, Samuel P. Putnam; they are therefore an ornament to any place and a memorial of great value. They should adorn the walls of ten thousand homes before the close of the year. The support thus given to the League would make its success certain.

News and Notes.

Our valiant friend, E. A. Stevens, is not idle, as the following interview, published in the Detroit Evening News, will show:

"E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, chairman last year of the executiv committee of the National Liberal League, and president for several years of the Chicago society, now in Detroit on business, was found in the Griswold House this morning, and questioned concerning the strength and prospects of the League.

"'I hav no means of knowing the strength of the Freethought sentiment of the country,' he remarked, 'except that it runs into the hundreds of thousands. We hav about three hundred societies, principally in the West and North, but the great majority of Freethinkers are constrained to conceal their opinions for business and social reasons.'

"'Do the Liberals lay any particular stress on the fact that church property is not taxed?'

"'That is one of our particular grievances. There is over $700,000,000 of church property in the United States that never pays a cent toward the support of the government that protects it. This increases the burdens of those who do not believe in churches. It is taxation without representation, and is in direct contradiction to the basis on which our government is founded, which is a purely secular one.'

"'And your idea of Christianity is——'

"'Their chief sign, "I. H. S.," expresses it: Ignorance, hypocrisy, superstition.'

"'How about God?'

"'God implies a personality. I, in common with Liberals, do not deny the existence of a God, because I cannot deny the existence of something I know nothing about. I am an Atheist—that is, a non-Theist.' This is also the position taken by Bradlaugh and Annie Besant.'

"'Do you ever expect to succeed in winning a majority of the people to your way of thinking?'

"'Most certainly; but it is a work of time. We are determined to secularize the state, and to do this the church God idea must be educated out of the people. We cannot all the time see our ideas growing, but neither can we see an oak grow; yet both events are constantly taking place. Government has no right to encourage or support religion, and religious institutions hav no right to ask or receive government support.'

"'When is your next Convention?'

"'It meets at Cleveland in October, when the League's name will be changed to the American Secular Union, and the Canadian Liberal societies, some of whom are very large and flourishing, will send delegates and be admitted. There has been great activity since Ingersoll became president last year. Charles Watts, formerly editor of the London Secular Review, and Samuel P. Putnam, a celebrated poet and writer in the Liberal cause, hav been constantly in the lecture-field for the past six months, for which object a considerable sum of money has been subscribed.'

"Mr. Stevens was in the lecture-field himself for a year, but now he givs his services whenever he stays long enough in a place to do so. Last week he lectured in Grand Rapids before the Evolution, the Spencer, and several other Liberal clubs."

This comes from one of the noble working women of the West:

"My best wishes are with you and all the Liberals. Inclosed please find $5 for a life-membership payable by installments. Yours very truly, HELEN CELLER."

I would say to those friends that desire life-memberships, the fee for which is $25, that they can pay by installments of $5 or more if they are not able to pay the $25 at once. Credit will be given for each payment, and when the $25 is paid the certificate of life-membership, with Colonel Ingersoll's signature, will be forwarded. We hope that many will do the best they can to become life-members of the League.

The following from Topeka, Kansas, is good news from the rising generation. Along with the wisdom of age we hav the bright dreams of youth:

"DEAR SIR: Please use the inclosed $1 for the help of the Liberal cause, to which you hav devoted your attention so earnestly. I read the Investigator, and note your progress with pleasure. With best wishes for your efforts, and to you personally, I am, A YOUNG FRIEND."

I suppose all hav read the leading editorial of last week's TRUTH SEEKER. Its clarion notes summon us to the tug of war. It is no easy crusade upon which we hav entered. We expect to hav years of conflict; but the time has come for action—to enter the halls of legislation and hav our protest heard and considered. Nothing is settled until it is settled rightly. There is injustice upon our statute books. It is time that this injustice was removed and the principles of liberty enthroned. These petitions will be circulated all over the state, and I hope that every friend of freedom will use his utmost efforts to get all the names possible to this petition. Send at once to THE TRUTH SEEKER office and procure copies and circulate all over the state of New York. Let us hav several thousand names attached before the meeting of the great Albany Convention in order that, in and through that Convention, we can prepare our forces for legislativ action this winter. Our Massachusetts friends are fighting persistently on the oath question, and are doing grand, practical work. Let the New York column swing into line on the three points of battle presented: the taxation of churches, the abolition of chaplaincies, and Sabbatarian laws. We hav here a fighting chance. Even some Christians are broad-minded enough to see the justice of our claim. Win here and our foes will be immensely weakened, and we can press on to greater victories. We believe that it is best to concentrate on these points and push the campaign vigorously, and we will not stop until the end is attained.

I hav received the following from Judge Brewer. Where are the five hundred good and true Liberals throughout the empire state who will do likewise without delay, and so make assurance doubly sure for this great Convention?

"ITHACA, N. Y., July 24, 1885.

"MR. S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: I inclose one dollar in currency for ticket to the Albany Freethinkers' Convention. I may not be able to attend, but want a ticket all the same. Please send it to me. Fraternally yours, S. BREWER."

Long Island Out-door Meeting.

On Sunday, July 26th, we began a series of out-door meetings at Merrick, Long Island, in Hyatt's Grove. Mr. E. Hyatt is well known as a Liberal worker. For several years he has had more or less out-door meetings in his grove, which adjoins the Methodist camping-grounds; and for this reason, I suppose, the Christians consider that he is "the wickedest man on Long Island." He always contrives, by lectures, distribution of Liberal literature, etc., to keep Christians upon the anxious seat.

The weather was hot on Sunday, indeed, the thermometer running up into the nineties. The musketoes were plenty and of massiv proportions. However, we had a good audience, and I spoke of the "New Heaven and Earth."

Mr. E. Hyatt, Mr. Nelson Smith, Mr. Merritt Smith, Mr. Carman, and others, are faithful laborers in the ranks of Freethought in Long Island.

Next Sunday I shall lecture at Uniondale, Long Island, in Carman's Grove. Horace Greeley said that Long Island was ahead of all the world on two things, "ignorance and musketoes." I don't expect to get rid of the musketoes—they seem to hav an unalienable right to this sandy soil. But I do expect to get rid of the ignorance. There are plenty of brains in Long Island to offset the efforts of superstition. The Christians cannot hav it all their own way. S. P. PUTNAM.

THE July number of Mr. Green's Freethinkers' Magazine is out. It contains an article by Oliver Johnson on "The Church and Slavery," copied from the Boston Commonwealth; "Mrs. Stanton Criticised," by A. B. Bradford, reprinted from THE TRUTH SEEKER; "Education," by James Beeson; "The Past and Present," by J. J. McCabe; "Free Religious Festival," by F. M. Holland; "Who Are Freethinkers?" by Charles Weil, M.D.; a Poem by J. D. Curtis, and several editorials by Mr. Green himself. Altogether, the issue is interesting reading and worth the 25 cents asked for it.

THE following notice of the North American Review for August is from the publishers: "The American nation has a double birthright—liberty and land. Its liberty it has guarded jealousy, but until very recent years it seems to hav been indifferent to the loss of its landed estate, and ignorant of the methods by which it has been diminished. A veteran legislator, the Hon. George W. Julian, who has given special attention to the acts disposing of our public lands, tells the story in brief in a contribution to the North American Review for August. In the same number five medical authorities discuss the question, 'Can Cholera be Averted?' Felix L. Oswald contributes a suggestiv article on 'The Animal Soul,' and the Rev. M. J. Savage, in 'A Profane View of the Sanctum,' brings an indictment against the daily press. The other articles are one on 'The Price of Gas,' by Charles H. Botsford, one on 'Temperance Reform Statistics,' by Prof. W. J. Beecher, and the chapter of 'Comments,' by various writers, on articles in previous numbers."

PUBLIC PRAYER.—Is it not a little extraordinary that in Leviticus and Deuteronomy there is not a single formula of public worship? It seems as if the Levites were fully employed in dividing among themselvs the viands that were offered to them. We do not even see a single prayer instituted for their great festivals of the Passover and Pentecost, the Trumpets, the Tabernacles, and general expiation or the new moon. The learned are almost unanimously agreed that there were no regular prayers among the Jews, except when, during their captivity in Babylon, they adopted somewhat of the manners, and acquired some of the sciences, of that civilized and powerful people. They borrowed all from the Chaldaic Persians, even to their very language, characters, and numerals, and joining some new customs to their old Egyptian rites, they became a new people. . . . Esdras ordained two prayers for every day, and added a third for the Sabbath.—Voltaire.

Dr. York in New Zealand.

DEAR EUGENE AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: You will doubtless be glad to know something more of our mission in this far-off land in the South Sea. We left our home in California with much fear that our radical gospel might be too strong for the mental stomachs of the colonials; but I am glad to say that our eighteen lectures in Auckland hav quite dispelled all fear on that score, and shown that the Freethought field is ripe for the harvest, and that the good seed sown by Wm. Denton, Mrs. Britton, and others, has found a deep lodgment in the minds of the people. The sale of Freethought literature, as also the large and eager attendance at lectures, attest to the rapid growth of mental freedom among the people.

Since my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 2d, I hav filled an engagement of six weeks at Dunedin, a most beautiful city of forty-five thousand population, founded by a Scotch colony, and there still remains prominent a strong Scotch Presbyterian element of the old stubborn, Calvinistic sort. But I am glad to say that, when Freethought does get hold of these people, they make warm-hearted and sterling workers in our cause.

The Freethought association of Dunedin, with Robert Stout, the premier of the present government, as its president, owns a splendid lyceum hall seating about twelve hundred, and sustains a well-conducted young people's progressiv lyceum.

My audiences were large and appreciativ, and I will long remember the hearty response and cordiality of the Dunedin Liberals, and promised to visit them again after my work in Australia.

The city of Dunedin is situated partly on flats, and hillsides and tops, presenting a picturesque and commanding outlook and appearance. It has many magnificent churches, halls, theaters, gardens, and public parks, as well as most extensiv suburbs, reached by both horse and cable cars, the latter a new feature in New Zealand, and recently introduced by an enterprising Yank from San Francisco.

The passage from Auckland to Dunedin, a distance of twelve hundred miles by steamer and rail, is a pleasant trip, but doubly expensiv compared with travel in America. The steamers are good, but the cars and railroad are decidely slow, stiff, and bungling, and the only good thing in the rail travel was that the miserable cars were hauled by engins built in Uncle Sam's dominions, and that gave me some comfort. On our way back to Auckland we made a short stop at Christchurch, a fine city of thirty thousand population, situated in a large fine valley about two hundred miles in extent, called the Canterbury district, devoted to agriculture and grazing cattle and sheep, the finest I hav ever seen, of which many ship loads of frozen meat are sent to England every year—and such fine, fat, juicy beef and mutton I hav never seen in California. There is green grass all the year round in this country.

The city of Christchurch is built on flat ground, and is not so sightly as Auckland and Dunedin, and yet has a beauty all its own, and contains a grand museum of natural collections of bugs, beasts, birds, minerals, woods, ferns, and many other things useful for man's sake, as well as many fine churches and a most gorgeous cathedral for Christ's sake. Here, too, superstition finds its natural antidote in a Freethought society, which hold forth in a German church with a full chime of bells. Our time being limited, we gave only two lectures here, with a promis to do so again at some future time. The association here also maintain a splendid lyceum for the young under the conductorship of Miss Button, which would be a credit to San Francisco or Boston. And here, as also at Dunedin, our people hav a fine orchestra of music at all of their meetings. Brother Parker's band of fifteen pieces evince in their performance great proficiency for young people, and reflect much credit upon Brother Parker as teacher and leader, and I could only wish that the same musical spirit would inspire our American lyceum schools.

On our way from Christchurch to Auckland our steamer touched at Wellington, a city of twenty-five thousand population, and the seat of the New Zealand government, which is a small and somewhat diluted copy of the home government, and yet, on the whole, the government and country make a brighter Britain than the old mother country, as there is more freedom, less royal humbug, better paid labor, and a chance to own some land for a home. We were met at the landing by the genial president and committee of the Secular Association, and treated to the sights of the capital city.

The government house and grounds are most beautiful, and the building is said to be the largest wooden building in the world. Here also at Wellington our people hav a lyceum school, reading room, and Sunday lectures.

A hasty look over the city and a call on the editor of the Times, Chantry Harris, a prominent Spiritualist and a genial, kindly man, occupied all of the time allotted to our stay here, and with the urgent request for a course of lectures on our return, we steamed out of this beautiful land-locked harbor on our way to Auckland to meet Mrs. York, the better half of our family, who has also turned Freethought missionary, as well as to hav an eye on the old man, that he do not be led away by the vanities of this sinful world.

As per engagement, our farewell lecture came off on the Queen's Birthday to a full house. And I may well say that New Zealand has other large and beautiful cities, but none more so than this, and no people on earth more kindly than the Liberals of Auckland. My many thanks are due to Messrs. Searle, Cox, Sinclair, Fenton, Streeter, Potter, and others, who hav always so warmly welcomed all of our American speakers at Auckland. Hearty thanks are also due to Thomas P. Farra and the committee and friends at Dunedin for helping hands in our work.

The cause of mental freedom is ably sustained in the colonies by quite an array of local talent. Mr. Ivo, and Mr. Selly, besides Miss Chapman, a recent convert from Romanism, are fighting the battle in New Zealand, while Charles Bright, Joseph Symes, and Thomas Walker are doing their level best to hold the fort in Australia. There are also several Freethought papers doing good work in the colonies. The Wanganui Freethought Review, at Wanganui, New Zealand, and the Liberator and Harbinger of Light, at Melbourne, are all ably conducted journals, and are making a good fight against superstition. It gave me pleasure to see THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator on the table of the reading room of the Sydney Liberal Association.

My most sincere thanks are due to F. C. Hall, of Christchurch, for his kindness to me.

I will always remember New Zealand clad in perpetual green, and full of beauty, fruits, and flowers. Her scenery of mountain and valley is romantic and grand. Her waterfalls, although not so sublime as Niagara, are not wanting in grandeur and beauty. Her valcanoes, hot lakes, geysers, pink-and-white terraces, deep canyons, and snow-capped mountains, if not on so large a scale, remind me of our noted Yellowstone Park.

We reluctantly turn our face from this evergreen shore to gaze on larger if not brighter things. For such is Australia, with the great city of Sydney—like a proud queen situated among hills and slopes bordering upon an irregular and most picturesque harbor I hav ever seen, and only approximated in beauty by our own Puget Sound. The gateway to this harbor is quite similar to our Golden Gate at San Francisco, with heads not quite so prominent, and when once within, you are charmed with its natural fitness and strange beauty.

We were met at the Sydney wharf by the committee of the Sunday Platform Association, who had good quarters engaged for us, and under whose auspices we are to lecture for the next four months, following Gerald Massey, who gave his farewell here the day after our arrival. Freethought has a strong hold in Sydney and sustains three societies, Secular, Liberal, and Spiritual, besides a Young People's Progressiv Lyceum, which is quite as well conducted as any I hav seen in America. And from the response to Mr. Massey's most radical thought by the audience on last Sunday night I must conclude that the Liberals of Sydney are well out from the shore of old orthodox Christianity, and on the high road to mental liberty.

Sydney is a great, stirring city, as large as San Francisco, and full of activity. The style of its buildings is strongly English, and impresses you with their massivness and the idea that the city has come to stay for ages. The public parks are on a magnificent scale, evincing rare taste, as well as affording comfort to vast throngs of well-dressed people who delight in the grateful shade of overspreading trees, feasting the eye on gorgeous flowers, statuary, monuments, and fountains spread out like a panorama of surpassing beauty.

And now, as the story goes, let us say, "To be continued in our next." J. L. YORK.

Sydney, N. S. W., June 12, 1885.

From the Continent.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I wish to recall your attention to the paragraph in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 13, 1885, headed, "Hugh P. McElrone."

The idea this savage Irishman wishes to convey is that the Roman Catholics hav become civilized, are sweet, wholesome, and tame at this time. We read that brutal natures are tame when fat or hungry. It is between meals the trouble commences. It seems this party is hungry.

You say the (Catholic) Freedom of Worship bill is "happily dead." Not so, sir; it will never die until the thing that hatched it is killed. The grand work for man is the destruction of the Roman Catholic education of submission. To-day it is the thorn in the side of humanity. Wherever it is eliminated, there the poor are battling for their rights, and slowly getting them. Wherever the Roman Catholic education is in the ascendency, there is the dry rot. Look at Austria, where the working people are called "stinking feet," where the Roman Catholic church owns one-third of the land, where the "stinking feet" cultivate the soil for the benefit of the immaculate, the celibate, that has sons and daughters now and then.

There is Bavaria. The king spends two hundred thousand dollars to hav an opera performed, and his Catholic majesty (or maggot) is the only one to look and hear the music. This fellow's standing in life should be organ-grinder. The people are so poor in this Roman Catholic country that the women do horses' work.

This is the outcome of the education of submission, of divine rights, of the temporal power of the pope or church.

What you say of the Protestants is true, and should be said, but this fact remains; you would hav been burnt, or had the advantage of being on the first side of the Bridge of Sighs, if the Protestant religion did not exist. Look out how much weight you put on the rotten plank that lets you cross the lake of fire. CHARLES ECKHARD.

Hamburg, Germany, June 24, 1885.

Our London Letter.

The late change of government and consequent re-elections hav brought out the true character of the clergy belonging to the Established church, and clearly show what they would do if they only had the power, which, thanks mainly to the unbelievers, they no longer possess. Applications hav been made in various towns and villages by the Liberal political party for the use of the national school-rooms, which, though supported from the taxes, appear to belong, like churchyards, to the rectors of the parishes. In many instances insulting replies hav been sent to the applicants, refusing to allow such buildings to be used by any electioneering party but the Tories, who are the retrograde portion of the community, loving the darkness of ignorance and detesting the light of knowledge. One "Christian minister" designates the Tories as honest men and the Radicals as thieves, owing, no doubt, to the continued efforts of the latter to disestablish the church and make the parsons work for their living or starve, and as they either would not or could not do the former, the latter must be the only alternativ, for it is very doubtful if one out of a hundred of these useless members of society would get a penny-piece if they were paid according to merit and had to depend for their incomes on the voluntary system. That they see danger to themselvs in the near future is apparent by their strenuous efforts to augment the number of their members. At one time a parson was perfectly indifferent as to whether he had a congregation or not, as his living was secure. No one was rash enough to raise the cry of confiscating their ill-gotten possessions, but now they are beginning to find out the mistake they hav made in neglecting to tout for custom, and are using their utmost endeavors to make up for lost time; but events prove that their efforts are slightly too late, and the blandishments and inducements held out are of no avail. The people are gaining wisdom from bitter experience of the past, and are not to be easily caught by the reckless expenditure of chaff thrown out to trap them.

The chief dignitaries of the church find their lines are not cast in quite such pleasant places, though they still hav the goodly heritage, but as the prospect of losing that is not pleasant to contemplate they hav to stump the country and hold meetings wherever they can to tell people what an immense amount of good the church is doing, and what a loss it would be to the community if it is abolished. As they are quite unable to show where the good comes in as far as appearances are concerned, we are informed that it is being done quietly and unostentatiously, and although the fruit is not yet visible (the tree being such a young one), it will appear all at once before very long and astonish the whole world; and I hav not the slightest doubt it will. The mountain laboring and bringing forth the mouse won't approach the feat. The archbishop of Canterbury would like to see the church a great political party—what a happy country this would be if the church could influence the elections!—and it must be strengthened by deepening its hold on the consciences of the people by raising their moral level, and by being foremost to assert the laws of temperance, purity, and manliness. His grace surely wants to revolutionize the church—fancy the clergy inculcating morality, temperance, and manliness! They might, perhaps, if it paid them, do so by precept, certainly not by example. I think that history clearly demonstrates that the established church of any country has been the greatest curse that has ever been experienced. The bulk of the clergy hav always been morally and physically corrupt, the determined foes to liberty and friends of oppression in every shape and form, and practicing every kind of vice and allowing it in the laity who paid for the permission; the agents, and more often principals, in the most horrible crimes, where it answered their purpose.

It is useless to pretend that these were not true Christians, and that there has always been a little band of the faithful who hav kept the right path and preserved the true religion. It surely shows, if that explanation is accepted, that God must be either very weak or very wicked to allow such a state of things to exist for so many centuries, and that it had to be left to Atheists to bring forth liberty from its long imprisonment.

In the face of all the boast that the church is the only conservator of morality, disclosures hav just been made public in the columns of a daily paper of the fearful extent of prostitution in London, and showing how the debauching young girls has become almost a fine art. The supporters of this horrible system are chiefly to be found amongst the "high and mighty" of the land—princes, statesmen, judges, and others who are well-nigh all firm supporters of the Christian religion and who are horrified at the terrible blasphemy of Infidels and the attempts now being made to pass an affirmation bill and to open the museums and art galleries on Sunday. The accusations made hav so struck home to some of the miscreants that an effort has been made in Parliament to induce the authorities to commence a public prosecution against the proprietor of the journal. It is doubtless feared that the exposure made will stop the supply of victims to the foul passions of the aristocracy which a few benighted individuals consider so necessary to the well-being of a country. St. Louis Clergymen Aroused.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: You will remember, no doubt, that some time ago Messrs. Watts and Putnam came to St. Louis to lecture, and that Mr. Putnam published a rather vigorous challenge to any one or all of seven of the local clergymen who had just delivered a course of Lenten lectures to debate with Mr. Watts.

In this challenge Mr. Putnam strongly hinted that since the clergy always replied (?) to Ingersoll, after the colonel had left, it would look braver, manlier, and more honest to offer such replies as they had on hand while the object of their wrath was within range.

No ne of these seven wise men saw fit to accept the offer to defend their faith nor to oppose the "Infidel power" on these terms. They were the quietest set of little men you ever saw that week, and Mr. Watts could get nothing whatever out of them.

After Mr. Watts left, and the time of Mr. Putnam's challenge had expired, one or two of these brave men poked their heads out and crowed—little, timid, faint crows, lest by some chance they might be heard by the two travelers, and the time of the challenge extended.

After a little, they grew braver; one came out of his closet, another appeared from behind the pulpit, and two weeks ago the one who is bravery itself (in times of profound quiet) caused to be published the great fact that he would preach a "series of summer sermons on 'Infidelity: its Cause and Fatal Results.'" They are called summer sermons to agree with their torrid setting. I did not see the first one of these profound and brave discourses, being then in New York; but the second one I had the supreme pleasure of reading. This well-informed divine told his equally well-informed audience that Renan was an Atheist. He also offered this profound evidence of the truth of Christianity: "The truth remains that, after centuries of varied and violent assault, Christianity is still here." He neglected to remark in this connection that the same is true of a number of other religions, but it may be he will do so next week, and call our attention to the fact that it proves as much for one as for the others. He also remarked: "Christianity is not only the promoter, but the source of every excellency."

He neglected to state the source which makes the Chinese the most orderly, law-abiding, and mob-avoiding people on the face of the globe; but it may be he does not consider this an "excellence." He forgot to state that not one so-called "Christian precept" that is good is new, or originated with Christ. He depended upon the ignorance of his audience upon these matters, and, so far as I can learn, he was wholly justified in his faith.

Then he did just what Mr. Putnam, in his challenge, told him he would do—tried to stab Colonel Ingersoll in the back, while he dared not meet in a manly way, an Infidel debater on these very topics.

He was pained by the fact that Colonel Ingersoll made more money out of Infidelity than did Voltaire and Paine. But he did not state the exact amount of his own fat salary and perquisits. Hence, I do not know the precise relationship these would bear to the receipts of the gentle Nazarene or his earlier followers.

He then took up "What Must We Do to Be Saved?" as expounded by Ingersoll, and since I do not believe that I could condense so much untruth in so little space I will simply send you the paper which reported his sermon.

Here it is, and the inventor of this trash, the originator of these untruths, prates about morality! Ye gods! he does not know the meaning of the word.

I neglected to say that last week's sermon of this series was based upon the text, "He that believeth not shall be damned," and the reverend said that sentence was the "gentlest, tenderest, most loving message left by Jesus. I thank him for that loving message." With this idea of love and tenderness, I should think the reverend's affection would be a rather undesirable acquisition for a lady who had not an unusually robust constitution. Even then I should think she would rather risk scarlet fever, or stay in St. Louis in a cholera season.

"False Claims."

"Mr. Rems Burg Dear sir I see in your Book Called false Claims a Declaration the Solid Church South fought for slavry to the Bitter end. I Demand of you to show the whare the Dunkered Ever Did fight or hold Slaves (if you will show me the histry that Sais they tolerated slavery in any way Plese let me know. "John G. Norman.

"Mownd City, Holt Co., Mo."

The above letter has been addressed to me through the office of The Truth Seeker. Even admitting the full force of the objection offered by this Christian apologist, he is, I think, unduly captious. Were all language gaged by his critical standard, every page of English composition would hav to be modified. In my impeachment of the church I referred to the church South as a whole. Every rule has its exceptions, but common usage does not require us to state the exceptions every time we quote the rule. The handful of Dunkers scattered over the South constitutes too insignificant an exception to require a modification of the statement made by me at Rochester.

No intelligent person understood me to mean that every Christian in the South carried a musket in support of slavery. No intelligent person understood me to mean that the entire church, without a single individual exception, advocated slavery. There were exceptions, there were some who did not defend it, and among them were a few Dunkers.

But if the Dunkers did not espouse the cause of slavery, I am not aware that they were particularly activ in their opposition to it. I do not read of any antislavery conventions held by them in the times that tried the souls of Abolitionists. Among the antislavery leaders of that day I fail to recognize the name of a Dunker. Jesus says: "He that is not against us is for us" (Luke ix, 50), and this was evidently the manner in which the Dunkers in the South were regarded by their pro-slavery neighbors.

The solidity of the Southern church in its defense of slavery is not, it seems to me, materially affected by the criticism made above. The church was about as "solid" in its support of slavery as it is possible for a people to be in a bad cause. Were the church to-day as solid in its defense of liberty, in its defense of truth, in its defense of justice, as the church South was in its defense of human slavery, "False Claims" would never hav appeared.

Meteoric Accretion.

J. A. Tuttle asserts as a "fact that the firmament is thickly studded with motionless meteors," and he calls upon "W. H. B.," or any other man, to prove "that planets were formed by the conglomeration of such meteors."

I giv it up; it's no use to attempt to prove that motionless meteors ever conglomerate into whirling worlds. But it is a fact, nevertheless, which is known to every astronomer and a few of the rest of mankind, that in the course of a year some 3,000,000,000 or more of flying meteors add their substance to our earth; and this is the way all planets grow.

Mr. Tuttle warns me, or any other man who undertakes to prove so plain and palpable a fact, not to draw on our imagination; and straightway he proceeds to say:

"It appears to be the universal law of nature that all forms must hav an imaginary before they [can] possibly hav a material existence."

In other words, Mr. Tuttle appears to draw on his imagination to assert that all matter has been formed out of imagination. He ought to take out letters patent for a newly invented Creator.

An astronomical friend who takes The Truth Seeker, seeing the article signed with my initials on "The Cause of Planetary Motion," wrote to me saying:

"So far as it goes it seems unanswerable; but Giles Chase and J. A. Tuttle do not seem to hav any definit ideas of mechanical forces and effects. There is a question back of the meteors, where they get a difference of force and direction."

Planetary Rotation.

Our Truth Seeker, having put the gods to grief, moved by the earth's forlorn expression of countenance, bestows on her a motiv of rotation. July 4th, Mr. A. J. Tuttle writes:

"The planet, like the balloon, is a combination of dense and attenuated matter, that causes it to be suspended in the matter of our solar system, called ether, the same as a balloon is suspended in our atmosphere. Therefore, a planet can no more recede beyond a given distance from the sun than a balloon can recede beyond a given distance from the earth, for the all-sufficient reason that matter in that direction is of greater density than it can penetrate or displace."

If, now, we isolate this ether, denser than our earth (and which prevents our incurring the fate of Semele, by falling into the the sun's embrace), from our will-o'-the-wisp balloon, we are gratefully surprised to find in this invisible "matter," which we had supposed only a rational hypothesis, strata, doubtless gaged by some invisible barometer, and whose resistance sunward is attested by the fact (or fancy) that it givs purchase to that atmospheric stratum next it, and which serves as "pivot upon which the dense part of the planet turns to the sun." A pivot this more spiritual than the streamers of the Boreal Aurora. If we had suppposed the resistance of ether to be feigned in complaisance to the balloon comparison, we must confess its mechanical necessity as a "roadway upon which the planet rolls round the sun like a ball." Considering the regularity of this action, and the quantity of iron in the solar photosphere, we incline to the opinion that this ether road may be a veritable railroad, and suggest to our fellow truth seekers to make haste and secure shares of stock in the same before Mr. Jay Gould or Mr. Huntingdon gets wind of the discovery.

Edgeworth.

A Protest from a Tax Payer.

The founders of the Constitution of the United States, in their wisdom, refused to have their sessions opened with prayers (see Eliot's "Debates"). They were careful to establish the new government on a purely secular basis, leaving out of sight any of the religious planks of those old European aristocracies and theocracies, whose doctrin was that the common people belonged to a God in the skies, and whose political and religious history, for fourteen hundred years, had been one of human slaughter among themslvs and their neighboring nations. In view of all this, they said, we, as a nation, will not acknowledge any such power. This seven years' bloody and cruel war that we hav had forced upon us by one of these Christian theocracies has cost us too much for us now to go back to that old Popish doctrin that human governments must be established with a God at their head, and that the common people belong to the government. Now, they said, we will reverse this order of things; we will hav a democratic and republican form of government, and we will establish the doctrin that the government belongs to the people, and when from any cause it does not suit them, it shall be their right to alter or amend it to suit themselvs; and no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States—thus leaving out the Bible God, the Jewish Jehovah, with his Ghost-begotten son, which had been at the foundation of so much bloodshed and human misery among the Christian nations themselvs, and between them and their neighboring nations. To such an extent was this carried that the great Scotch writer, Professor Dick, in his voluminous writings on this subject, says: "There has been more blood shed in these Christian wars than would float the navies of the world;" and he was a Christian too.

Now, as the framers of our national Constitution well knew the tyrannical character of the Christian church whenever and wherever it could get the political power in its hands, and as they had just come through a seven years' bloody war with one of those Christian nations, in defense of their political rights, and were now about to take their place among the nations of the earth, as an independent nation; they settled this matter then and there, that it should be an independent nation in fact, as well as in name, and entirely secular in its government. So they left out of the Constitution all religious tests whatever. It was moved that prayers be offered every morning before proceeding to business. The motion was opposed, and defeated by adjournment, without a vote.

From that day to this, we have had a class of narrow-minded religious citizens among us who would like to hav their special religious notions brought into our governmental affairs, somehow or other. And so it came to pass that, in laying the cornerstone of our new Court House, which is being erected with the people's money, these religious minds must hav the exercises of this purely secular affair opened with prayers to their Bible God, the cruel Jewish Jehovah. We now learn that this class of minds hav it in contemplation to repeat this kind of religious mummery in the building before the county can use it for what the people's money built it for.

This, friends and fellow-citizens, is all wrong, as it is leaving the solid basis which the framers of our national Constitution laid down for the government to rest on, viz., the Rights of Man. Therefore, in the name of humanity, common sense, and consistency, and as an American citizen of over three score years and ten, and with an American pedigree of over one hundred and sixty years, we now and here protest against this turning of our new Court House building—built for secular purposes—into a religious church, and thus to hav this religion mixed in with our secular governmental affairs.

Signed in behalf of the friends of American liberties, Human Rights, and Common Sense,

Adrian, Mich., July 4, E.M. 285. Tax Payer.

General Grant.

There are three men who stand out prominent in the history of this country—Washington, Lincoln, Grant. The last of these died July 23d, at Mt. McGregor, N. Y., after months of painful suffering from cancer of the throat. From one end of the country to the other are displayed the emblems of mourning, and more than usual at the death of public men is this display a manifestation of sincere grief.

That our Union might hav been preserved without General Grant's aid is possible and probable; but nevertheless is it a fact that he, more than any other field commander, contributed to that end. For this he has been the recipient of the highest honors our nation could bestow. And if as presiden the lacked in statesmanship, and trusted unworthy friends who made his administration corrupt, the failure will be forgotten, and only his qualities as a great soldier remembered. When the passions aroused by the war were spent, and enduring peace came between the two sections, there is no doubt that General Grant, "the laureled soldier of the world," was loved by the citizens of every state. For, as Colonel Ingersoll said at the Grant banquet, "The soldiers of the Republic were not seekers after vulgar glory. They were not animated by the hope of plunder or the love of conquest. They fought to preserve the homestead of liberty and that their children might hav peace. They were the defenders of humanity, the destroyers of prejudice, the breakers of chains, and in the name of the future they slew the monster of their time. They finished what the soldiers of the Revolution commenced. They relighted the torch that fell from their august hands and filled the world again with light. They blotted from the statute books laws that had been passed by hypocrits at the instigation of robbers, and tore, with indignant hands, from the Constitution that infamous clause that made men the catchers of their fellow-men. They made it possible for judges to be just, for statesmen to be humane, and for politicians to be honest. They broke the shackles from the limbs of slaves, from the souls of masters, and from the Northern brain. They kept our country on the map of the world, and our flag in heaven. They rolled the stone from the sepulcher of progress, and found therein two angels clad in shining garments—Nationality and Liberty."

And so the Southern people came to look on General Grant, not as a conqueror, but as a teacher. "They were wrong, and the time will come when they will say that they are victors who hav been vanquished by the right. Freedom conquered them." And General Grant was but the servant of freedom. His magnanimity to General Lee and the Southern soldiers will be remembered as long as will the victories he won.

A great deal of discussion has gone on during General Grant's illness as to his religious opinions. This was due largely to the desire of one Dr. Newman to advertise himself. That General Grant was a Christian there is not much room to doubt. But his acceptance of the effusiv and offensiv ministrations of the peripatetic preacher was probably due as much to his regard for the feelings of his family and his tolerance of his ministerial friend as to any faith in religion. All that the press can gather now about his religious belief is filtered through Dr. Newman, and must therefore be largely discounted. Dr. Newman makes him out to hav been a very devout Methodist; and there is no question that he attended and supported that church. But as to his regard for the Sabbath and his love of prayer, Dr. Newman has overdone the matter. His anecdotes to show the general's piety bear very strong internal evidence that they originated with himself.

The most celebrated of General Grant's public speeches is that delivered at the reunion of the Army of the Tennessee on the subject of the public schools, and in that he took substantially the ground that Liberals occupy. The speech was delivered in September, 1875. He said:

"COMRADES: It always affords me much gratification to meet my old comrades in arms ten to fourteen years ago, and to liv over again in memory the trials and hardships of those days, hardships imposed for the preservation and perpetuation of our free institutions. We believed then and believe now that we had a government worth fighting for, and, if need be, dying for. How many of our comrades of those days paid the latter price for our preserved Union! Let their heroism and sacrifices be ever green in our memory. Let not the results of their sacrifices be destroyed. The Union and the free institutions for which they fell should be held more dear for their sacrifices. We will not deny to any who fought against us any privileges under the government which we claim for ourselvs. On the contrary, we welcome all such who come forward in good faith to help build up the waste places, and to perpetuate our institutions against all enemies as brothers with full interest with us in a common heritage. But we are not prepated to apologize for the part we took in the war. It is to be hoped that like trials will never again befall our country. In this sentiment no class of people can more heartily join than the soldier who submitted to the dangers, trials, and hardships of the camp and the battle-field, on whichever side he fought. No class of people are more interested in guarding against a recurrence of those days. Let us, then, begin by guarding against every enemy threatening the perpetuity of free republican institutions.

"I do not bring into this assemblage politics, certainly not partisan politics, but it is a fair subject for soldiers in their deliberations to consider what may be necessary to secure the prize for which they battle. In a republic like ours, where the citizen is the sovereign, and the official the servant, where no power is exercised except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence. The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us a free nation. If we are to hav another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason's and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side, and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other. Now, in this centennial year of our national existence, I believe it is a good time to begin the work of strengthening the foundation of the house commenced by our patriotic forefathers one hundred years ago at Concord and Lexington. Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the more perfect security of free thought, free speech, and free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men irrespectiv of nationality, color, or religion. Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar of money appropriated to their support, no matter how raised, shall be appropriated to the support of any sectarian school. Resolve that neither the state or nation, nor both combined, shall support institutions of learning other than those sufficient to afford to every child growing up in the land the opportunity of a good common school education unmixed with sectarian, pagan, or Atheistical tenets. Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school supported entirely by private contribution. Keep the church and state forever separate. With these safeguards I believe the battles which created the Army of the Tennessee will not hav been fought in vain."

"Keep the church and state forever separate." That sentence is a rallying-cry for Liberals. It reveals the patriotism of the man, and his fealty to American principles. For this let him be honored as well as for his services in defense of the republic.

The Pleasure of Missionary Work.

After Horace Greeley had traveled over the rest of the United States, he visited Long Island. His opinion of the island was that in ignorance and musketoes it beat the world. It was part of the League secretary's duty last Sunday to endeavor to dispel some of the ignorance. He took the editor along for protection against the musketoes, calculating that the editor's superior sweetness would draw them away from himself. It may be possible in the great hereafter for the weather clerk to get up a hotter day than July 26th, but it will embarrass him to do it, and the musketoes made the best of the weather by coming out in full force.

Merrick is a little hamlet about thirty miles from the city. Elisha Hyatt is the activ working Liberal of the neighborhood, and he met Mr. Putnam at the depot to carry him over to the grove. The day was so hot that Mr. Hyatt thought but few could be assembled; but Mr. Putnam, remembering that where two or three are gathered in My name there will I be also, was nowise daunted, but attacked the ministerial dish of chicken provided by Mrs. Hyatt, took a nap and fought musketoes till 2:30 P.M. Then he went over to the grove. The musketoes went also. They took their appetites with them, and seemed to recognize that the advent of a tender-skinned New Yorker was their opportunity. The grove is located on Mr. Hyatt's farm, and is bounded on one side by a Methodist camp-ground, on another by a cornfield, with the other two sides fringed by bushes in which are cultivated the musketoes. The Methodists hav not yet begun their revival efforts, though some forty or fifty families are encamped there and services are held weekly. Only one sheep strayed over the fence, and he is known on the camp-ground as a crank, and generally looked upon with suspicion as entertaining heretical notions. The heat kept at home all but about thirty Liberals, who sat upon the benches and wiped their perspiring brows with one hand and fought musketoes with the other and both feet. Their sacrifice was well rewarded. Mr. Putnam has generally been regarded as a pleasant speaker, but his year's work upon the platform has improved him greatly. The three-quarters of an hour in which he told of a new heaven and a new earth as he would hav them seemed only a few minutes. Then he sold some pictures from THE TRUTH SEEKER, gave away sample copies of a half-dozen Liberal journals, urged the people to subscribe to one of them, and made the personal acquaintance of all the audience. Mr. Hyatt took up a collection, which netted three dollars and ten cents for the League, Mr. Hyatt and Mr. Mollineaux having paid for the advertising in the local papers.

Arrangements were made for another lecture next Sunday in another grove, more accessible, and near the village of Uniondale. Mr. Joseph Carman will endeavor to get out a large audience, and every Liberal on Long Island should visit his grove next Sunday, and hear Mr. Putnam on the "New Heaven and the New Earth."

As the cars rolled out of the station rain began to fall. It is to be hoped those musketoes got wet.

A Fool and His Folly.

The Rev. A. C. Morehouse is one of the shining lights of Methodism in this city. He rattles around in the pulpit of the Seventh Street M. E. church. Sunday before last he chose as his subject, "Christianity as Compared with Infidelity." The substance of his remarks, as reported by the Herald, is:

"Infidelity should be divided into two classes—Atheism and Deism. Atheists advance the theory that all things happen by chance, and that the world owes its existence to chance, and yet they are never willing to trust the affairs of life to that theory. They understand and believe in the laws of nature and of humanity, which, he said, were to him far more difficult to believe as emanating from an inconceivable and unknown chance source than the spiritual law claiming origin from a divine, all-powerful one. They believe that transgression of those laws will work sorrow and suffering, and yet they deny that those who transgress God's perfectly-formed laws and creed can suffer punishment or pain.

"Infidelity is degrading in its influence, tending to destroy in mankind all respect for authority and principle, and all love of veneration, and productiv only of anarchism and revolt. Socialism and Communism go hand in hand with Infidelity, and their effects upon our people are fast approaching dangerous proportions. Let the exponents of that creed, so called, show any good works it had wrought for its followers—where had it built hospitals, schools, or charitable institutions of any kind, and what had it accomplished for the benefit of those it professed to raise from darkness and from the yoke of bigoted ignorance? Infidels abuse and criticise Christianity when totally ignorant of its principles and of its effects on those who are faithful to its teachings. Christ had taught his creed unaided, in the eyes of the world, by any advantages of position, education, or parentage. Without a word of argument or a line of writing he had converted thousands to his standard, and then, for those he left behind him, and for those that came after, he had given them that holy Bible, inspired in its utterances, and recognized as a rule of faith and conduct by millions of civilized and educated people. It contains the only existing history of our creation and existence for hundreds of years, and if that inspired book were suddenly blotted out from the world, we would be left in midnight darkness."

This was too much for even the Herald to let pass without rebuke, and it pointed out the "clerical error" as follows:

"When a clergyman perverts facts to make them contribute to a sound thesis, he injures the good cause in behalf of which he preaches, for those whom he seeks to convince are often repelled from his whole argument if they detect the misstatement.

"This was illustrated a few months ago, when the Rev. Mr. Newman, preaching against Infidelity, challenged the specification of any great scientist of modern times, who was not a Christian. The name of Charles Darwin—not to speak of more—occurred, of course, to every person of ordinary intelligence who heard the sermon or who read it in print.

"The Rev. Mr. Morehouse falls into a blunder of the same kind, according to the report of his sermon on the same subject, preached yesterday, and reported in another column, when he challenges 'the exponents of Infidelity' to specify an Infidel who has 'built hospitals, schools, or charitable institutions of any kind.' The name of Stephen Girard—not to speak of more—will occur, of course, to all persons of ordinary intelligence who read Mr. Morehouse's sermon, whether they are 'exponents of Infidelity' or not.

"Girard was an Infidel of the blackest dye, but he bequeathed more millions to 'hospitals, schools, and charitable institutions' in Philadelphia than his Christian contemporaries who were residents of that city did altogether. He also displayed the most courageous virtue by personal care of the sick in time of pestilence."

So far as it goes, the Herald's retort is well enough, though we fail to recognize why the "dye" of an Infidel is necessarily black. The total unfitness of the Rev. Mr. Morehouse to compare Infidelity and Christianity is shown by his ignorance of the good works of Infidels, or by his dishonesty in denying them. But a stronger impeachment of his mental capacity, perhaps, could stand against his assertion that "Atheists advance the theory that all things happen by chance, and that the world owes its existence to chance." It is hardly necessary to remark that this is a falsehood. Before Mr. Morehouse again enlightens his congregation upon any subject, he should endeavor to comprehend as much of it as his seemingly limited abilities will allow.

Mr. Morehouse's further remarks are the same kind of trash the pulpit has dealt out for many years. We hav so little respect for his honesty and capability that we do not think it worth the while to waste further space upon him.

A Pretty Weighty Charge.

With the vigor which usually distinguishes anonymous pens, because the wielders are safe, "X," one of the editorial writers on Liberty, attacks THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, and the Free Religious organ. He says.

"When the Index, the Investigator, and THE TRUTH SEEKER defend the existing state, they defend the existing theology. I propose to hold Mr. Underwood's dainty Free Religious nose down to this fact from time to time, until he either confesses it or skulks away as a moral coward. I honestly believe that he, and Macdonald, and Leo the Terrible of Paine Hall, are painfully conscious of the absurd and illogical position they occupy, and the time is not far off when they will either be forced to show their hands, or stand convicted of the same dishonesty and hypocrisy of which they accuse the pulpits."

This is a tolerably direct accusation that the three editors are hypocrits, and know it. Certainly this is a very old way of "answering" an opponent, but we never thought it a very conclusiv way. And we are not convinced now. Mr. "X's" assertion that when we defend the existing state we also defend the existing theology, is nonsense. And, so far as we are concerned, we are not particularly in love with some of our institutions. We hav said, and say now, that government is necessary, and a republican form is the best to which mankind has yet evoluted. But convince us that there is a better, and we shall advocate it. We do not believe in kings, nor in presidents, except as the president is the agent of the people, hired by them for a certain length of time to conduct the affairs of the nation. The trouble with the Anarchists is that they are impracticable dreamers. They will not take into account the stubborn fact that without restraint there are some people who would invade and violate others' rights. These people must be provided against; and were all government done away with to-morrow, a new start would hav to be made the next day. We want as little government as possible, and we want that little to be of, for, and by the people themselvs. The world is governed too much now, and right here in the United States law is made the tool of rogues to oppress their fellows. The cause is that the people send men to our legislatures who are open to negotiations for their votes. The remedy is to elect honest men who will work for the interests of the whole people instead of for a class.

It is tomfoolery to say that in this country theology and the state are the same. Theology is a system of religion built up by men for guidance to another world. The state exists to protect the people in this world. We do not deny that our government costs altogether too much, for it does; and our whole governmental system will bear a great deal of reformation. But until the Anarchists show how we are to exist without any government—except vigilance committees, mob law, etc., which are governments in themselvs, and very poor ones—we must claim the privilege of supporting and helping to reform the present republic.

We shall not call Mr. "X" a hypocrit because he differs from us in these things. He is only a genius with one idea.

Pictures that Speak Volumes.

The picture, "A Short Lesson in History for Christians," meets the cordial approval of the Liberal public and press. We hav sold a great many copies both of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing it, and of the separate prints, and shall be glad to sell a great many more. The price of THE TRUTH SEEKER with the picture is, single copies, 7 cents; in quantities of five and over, 5 cents each. On heavy tinted paper, we send the picture post-paid in rolls, secure from breakage in the mails, at prices as follows: Six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents; twenty-five copies for $1; and one hundred for $3.

A new supply of "The Modern Balaam" has also just arrived from the printer. The prices are: Per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $1.50.

Editorial Notes.

THE high license law seems to work well in St. Louis, Mo., where it was put in operation July 1st. It is reported that two hundred and fifty saloons hav closed their doors.

ACCORDING to a correspondent of the Providence Telegram, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher declined an offer of $5,000 to reply to Colonel Ingersoll's articles on "The Christian Religion," confessing inability to meet the latter's arguments. And yet, remarks an exchange, there are about five thousand one-horse preachers in this country who would jump at the chance for $2.50.

HELEN WILMANS, editor of Woman's World, writes to the Gnostic:

"I don't like Liberals. Their position is a sort of transitorial resting-place—gloomy as the desert of Sahara, and as unproductiv—lying between the old death in life, religious creeds, and the universe of the new that is opening upon us. I was there once myself, but not for long. I backed out."

Mrs. Wilmans is therefore now in the position of the person described by Luke when he remarked that "the last state of that man was worse than the first."

THE Times thinks that people care little about religion in midsummer, and that that is the reason why the ministers preach on sensational topics instead of from the gospels. It says: "People suffering from ninety degrees of heat think more about Coney Island than heaven; and when they are baking on earth sheol and its promised heat hav no terrors for them. It must be that the gospel is a failure in hot weather, and can succeed only in cool weather. Ministers are supposed to know all about religion, and if they confess by their selection of topics on which to preach that the gospel is not attractiv in summer we must accept their opinion."

THE following report of progress was sent by one of the clowns of the Salvation Army to their paper, the War Cry, printed in London:

"FROM CHALK FARM TO HIGHGATE.

"With a lot of hallelujah-go-a-heads under the command of Sergeant-Major Gowing, we stormed the devil's kingdom in the neighborhood of Highgate. The open-air cathedral was beautiful to stand in, and the sunshine corresponded well with the hallelujah sunbeams in our hearts. Commencing with a hymn we were very soon accompanied by a dog, who, delighted with the concertina, ran into the ring, and

"ON ITS HIND LEGS SANG A SOLO.

A crowd at once collected, and grasping the opportunity we told right and left of the pardoning love of God. A brother, once a publican's dupe, told us how that, since he had given his heart to God, he could mind his own clothes; previous to doing so 'Uncle had the sole charge of them.'

"The next was a Church of England friend, who said he had given five times the amount he usually gave to help roll the old chariot along, for the simple reason he should not rest contented till a Salvation Army Barracks was opened there.

"We then placed before them the realities of heaven and hell, and pointed to all the way of salvation; much conviction, and ere long we believe to report the salvation of many precious souls. HAYWARD, for Capt. Jim Lainchbury."

THE papers state that President Cleveland fished on Sunday. Although they ate none of the fish, all the religious editors hav the stomach-ache. Buckley, of the Advocate, says:

"This is not an edifying spectacle to the American people. If the president has no reverence for God's law himself, he ought to remember that he is at the head of a Christian nation, and be careful not to outrage the consciences of the best people of the country by his bold defiance of the divine commands."

How does Mr. Buckley know that it is God's law that a man shall not fish on Sunday? The only Sabbath which Mr. Buckley's God ever said anything about is Saturday. And then again, this is not a Christian country. There are a great many Christians living in this country, we know, but that does not make it a Christian country any more than the presence here of some Turks makes it a Mohammedan country. And why should the consciences of the "best people" be so tenderly respected? They never respect the Jews' consciences, nor the Turks,' nor the Chinamen's, nor the Infidels,' and why are they entitled to hav theirs respected? If the "best people" (meaning Christian, probably) will abstain from working or going fishing on Monday, which is the sacred day of the Greeks; or on Tuesday, which is holy to the Persians; or on Wednesday, which is the Sabbath of the Assyrians; or on Thursday, which is the Sunday of the Egyptians; or on Friday, which is the Mohammedan's day of rest; or on Saturday, which is the day of devotion of the Jews and Seventh-Day Adventists—why, then, these "best people" (meaning Christians, probably, though we cannot be sure) might with some consistency ask to hav their day of superstition observed. Now, however, their demand has a smack of impudence.

THE Wanganui, N. Z., Freethought Review says of Masonry that "if the recognition of a 'God' depended on 'landmarks,' Masonry would be wedded to the principle forever. It is affirmed by some authorities that Masonry had its origin in the early part of the eighteenth century, when Deism was fashionable in society and among literary people. Nothing is more certain than that its theology is that of the Old Testament, with a careful ignoring of the New. Its principles bear a remarkable resemblance to those of some of the founders of the American republic, and many of the changes in the humanitarian aspect might hav been written by Thomas Paine. The internal evidence, however, shows clearly that the ritual was not composed at the same time, and by the same hand, but was, to a large extent, a growth or development, exhibiting traces of many minds acted upon by widely different influences. It follows as a necessary consequence that there are inconsistencies which no casuistry can possibly reconcile. The question that remains to be answered under these circumstances is, Shall Masonry remain controled and fashioned by the 'landmarks,' whose chief defense is that they are 'ancient,' or by the central principle of the brotherhood of man, continually expanding under the influences of advancing civilization?"

A FRIEND sends us the following note to the Pittsburgh Dispatch, and wants to know all about it:

"Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the Agnostic, is in town as counsel in the big telegraph fight. As usual with him when in New York, he spends an hour or two every day in the gorgeous and garish Stokes bar-room. His beverages at these times are not alcoholic, and he never stands up at the bar, but is served while lounging over a newspaper at a secluded table. He was thus engaged when three young men addressed him. They said that they were a committee from the Christian Believers, which they described as an organization of orthodox Protestants devoted to the battling of unbelief. Their especial object was to convert Ingersoll, and to that end they had collected all his published Infidelity, studied it carefully, and prepared answers to his arguments. They wished to arrange a series of conferences with him. The colonel replied that he lacked the time for such proceedings. The spokesman of the committee, Robert Bradbury Hammond, a student in the Union Theological Seminary, appealed strongly to Ingersoll's good nature, to his sense of fairness, and finally to his courage, but without avail, for he declared positivly that he could not go into the proposed discussion."

We know nothing about the affair. It may be so, for Colonel Ingersoll is greatly pestered by Christian cranks. But of course he cannot "debate" with them. His conditions for discussion are well known. Let the church put up her best and representativ man and Mr. Ingersoll will be with him. Monsignor Capel has been asked to meet him, but has declined. Capel is no angel, but he fears to tread where the three "Christian Believers" are anxious to rush.

DR. RICHARD S. STORRS has written a book on the "Divine Origin of Christianity." In his prefatory note Mr. Storrs asserts that it is as useless to present arguments to those who deny the possibility of revelation as to communicate philosophical speculations to dogs. In his first lecture (p. 13) he further tells us "that only by spiritual experiment of the gospel can man be assured of its divine origin, as ultimately proved by its divine energy." "If, therefore," says the Evening Post, "external evidence and argument are useless alike to the believer and the unbeliever, one is somewhat at a loss to appreciate the motiv which has led the eloquent author to bestow on us this portly volume of nearly seven hundred pages, or to guess for whose benefit his labors are undertaken. The fundamental difficulty which lies at the basis of all such attempts is, that every writer assumes his own individual conception of Christianity to be that which Christ came on earth to reveal to man. To Dr. Storrs, we presume, the faith of three-quarters of Christendom is a travesty of Christianity, in which the ethical precepts of the gospels and the dogmas of the Pauline Epistles hav been used, with more or less intention, as a basis on which to erect a system enabling a hierarchy to gain power and wealth from the superstition of the masses. Now, when anyone assumes that he is able to declare the purpose of God, and to point out how that purpose has wrought its fulfilment, he must deduce his arguments from the totality of results and not from a narrow and self-limited circle. Notwithstanding the marvelous expansion of European civilization within the last two or three centuries, Christendom embraces to-day only about one-third of the human race. Latin Christianity is the faith of probably a majority of Christians. In Latin Christianity the two events of chief religious significance in our day hav been the settlement of century-old quarrels by the adoption of the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin and of the infallibility of the pope, thus carrying the Catholic church still further from gospel simplicity. Similarly, the only sect of Christians who really profess to practice the precepts of Christ—the Society of Friends—is not only one of the smallest but is daily growing smaller. Moreover, the missionary work of Islam is to-day obtaining more converts to Allah than that of Christendom to Christ. Evidently, the time in which Dr. Storrs's conception of Christianity is to become the universal religion is yet far off. We take for granted that 'its perfect contemplated supremacy in the world,' which is to create a 'society as pure as the Sermon on the Mount' (p. 326), refers to the expected supremacy of Dr. Storrs's own church. If it should happen that either the Latin or Greek churches should obtain such supremacy, believers such as Dr. Storrs would be suppressed by pope or czar with the scantiest possible ceremony."

Letters from Friends.

ELGIN, ILL., July 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Wishing to see as much of the inwardness of Christianity as possible, I attended the breaking up, last-night meeting of a two-week Free Methodist's camp-meeting. I had just entered the camp, when I was assailed by a buxom lassie of say twenty-five summers, who wanted to know if I loved God and Jesus Christ. Not getting very satisfactory answers from me, she started in to pray for me, and in about one minute she was lying stretched on her back at my feet. I at once felt her pulse, and every two or three minutes from the time she fell until she came to and got up I felt her pulse, which was as even and correct a beating pulse as I ever felt. To-day I asked one of our best medical practitioners about it. He said if it had been an actual faint that her pulse would hav been very uneven. At times it would hav been very low, and at others fast and weak, so fast at times that it could scarcely be counted. So, by his testimony, as well as my own experience, I pronounce the whole a fraud, put on, perhaps, for my benefit. All the feeling it awoke in me was one of pity and disgust. There were more than half-a-dozen lying prostrate at the same time. Then another bad giv-away was when the time came for them to march around in the camp ground, preparatory to dismissing. One of the black-coats made an announcement to march, and some one asked, "What about these lying around the ground?" His reply was, "Never mind them. God will take care of them;" and sure enough, as quick as they were ready to march these were all ready to fall into line, showing that it was all put on, not only by my patient, whose pulse I was timing, but by the whole lot as well. So I finally left the camp grounds at half-past twelve o'clock at night, thinking the poor monkeys would be ashamed to acknowledge relationship with such creatures.

MR. EDITOR: Your new picture in the last TRUTH SEEKER is indeed a telling picture, in a nut-shell, of the history of the Christian church, on the one side, and of science and common sense on the other. When I opened the paper, I took a look at the picture. I said to myself, "This must be put in a frame at once," and so, after reading the paper through on Sunday, as my custom is, I took the picture out, and had a first-class frame on it, and it now hangs up in my room by the side of our noble hero's monument. You will please send me twelve copies of this picture, on tinted paper.

S. D. MOORE.

CINCINNATI, O., July 4, 1885.

DEAR DISPENSER OF TRUTH: It affords your old Materialistic correspondent much satisfaction and pleasure to know that many of your sensible and intelligent readers indorse the honest sentiments of this aged Cincinnati Infidel, and the time will yet come when this city of the great West will be noted as the home of nature's son, whose firm conviction is that nature is all there is, or ever was, or will be, and every system now in existence, or in any past age invented and palmed off on the world as divine, and based on the supernatural or spiritual dogmas propounded or promulgated by Theistical clergy or mediumistic deceptionists, is, to all intents and purposes, a base fraud.

I demand that all of mankind should be put strictly to the test, and made to prove, in a most satisfactory manner, that what they propagate is positiv facts, and if they fail to produce genuin facts, the public should insist on its suppression, as cliques of pious frauds and swindlers, obtaining money under false pretenses. No party hath any right to cheat mankind, on religious grounds more than any other. All systems of fraud are very unjust, and a crime against innocence or ignorance. The public should be saved from their own folly and duplicity. Mental blindness is widespread, and knaves take advantage thereof. Let truth and honesty prevail, and every vestige of fraud be frowned down, so that mankind can hav full confidence in the honor and right between man and man.

The genuin Materialist hath no plotting or scheming trickery. His life is one straightforward course; all his acts and deeds are above board, and every sly and crafty trick is hateful to his true and sincere principles. His head is level, and free from all crankisms; his watchword is Progress, and the comfort, happiness, and pleasure of humanity in life. My motto is, Learn the way to liv, and never fear death, which is a friend to deliver us from every sorrow, pain, or misfortune forever.

T. WINTER, Materialist.

P.S.—Your new and very agreeable departure, in giving your readers picture glimpses of the cruel, barbarous, and hateful religion called Christian, as promulgated by the bloody-handed church of Rome, is much appreciated. Such a religion should be ignored throughout America; it is a dangerous element to our liberties, and should be heavily taxed or suppressed. Let every Freethinker light up the world on all the gullible and religious cheats of the period. T. W.

CHILLICOTHE, O., July 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting patiently for some one to answer the attack made upon Spiritualism by L. L. Northup in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 20th. As no one has seen fit to do so, and as you always seem disposed to giv everyone a hearing, I would like to present a few of my ideas upon the subject. I notice that the last TRUTH SEEKER givs an article upon the subject of Spiritualism by Mr. Burgess, of Zanesville. I will therefore try and giv him a little at the same time.

Mr. Northup accuses Spiritualism of being a religion, and givs as proof a remark made by George Chainey to the effect that Spiritualism, as a religion, took hold of humanity's cause where previous religions left off. Well, I, for one, am glad of it if it does. As I can see no harm in that, I will pass on to the next charge made against us, viz., "Spiritualism is a system of supernaturalism, fraud, and trickery based upon the hopes of mankind." Mr. Northup should not make such an absurd statement as that unqualified by reasons. I will correct him. One of the first axioms of Spiritualism is to the effect that nothing supernatural ever has or can exist, because everything in the universe, living or dead, is governed by unchangeable laws. These laws control the "conditions" which Mr. Northup and Mr. Burgess consider so unreasonable. Another principle of Spiritualism is that no wrong or dishonest act ever remains unpunished, and that no persons can deceive others without injury to themselvs. These two leading principles are a conclusiv denial of the charge that Spiritualism is a system of supernaturalism, fraud, and trickery, and any person advocating supernaturalism or using fraud in the name of Spiritualism is a rank impostor.

Messrs. Northup and Burgess convey the impression that all mediums are money-makers. I hav had an extensiv acquaintance among genuin mediums, and can testify that they seldom become rich, and are usually very generous.

Messrs. Northup and Burgess both insinuate that all the evidence of the truth of Spiritualism has been obtained either through professional mediums in darkened rooms, or by communications. There may hav been a time when those were "jest my sentiments, tew," but during the last five years I hav received hundreds of tests of the most unexpected and convincing character, entirely independent of any other human being, and often in the full glare of the sunlight. As these nearly always hav been a complete surprise to me, it could not hav been, as I used to tell others, my imagination. It is very easy to accuse others of making believe, but if either Mr. Northup or Mr. Burgess should find themselvs suddenly thrown into a trance, and made to write things which were an entire contradiction to all their previous ideas, and then, upon recovering their own identity, be accused of being a "juggling medium," they would feel, as no doubt hundreds of mediums hav done, that this is a very unkind world, and, under these circumstances, they would in time come to feel that any person who would say that no spiritual communications are ever received until they are "reached through the half-idiotic brain of some Indian squaw, and then peddled out for money through the trick performance of a medium," must be "supremely ignorant" upon the subject. If the sentence I hav quoted is true, such men as Garrison, Denton, and hundreds of living male and female toilers for Freethought, like Chainey, for instance, who not long ago was a most decided skeptic, must be either lunatics, imbecils, or tricksters. Will not Messrs. Northup and Burgess condescend to stoop from the exalted hights upon which they hav placed themselvs, and found some charitable institution for these foolish and depraved minds, that they may be expanded and lifted up from the depths of superstition and fraud into which they hav fallen, under the superior effulgence of the infallible, unlimited resources of the penetrating intellects of Messrs. Northup and Burgess? If they will not do this, I entreat them to try and be lenient while contemplating the folly and wickedness of the benighted Spiritualists, and to save their surplus ammunition to use upon those who do not advocate Freethought. With the kindest of feelings,

IMPROVISATRICE.

DUNLAP, KAN., July 6, 1885.

MR EDITOR: The prospects in this place are somewhat encouraging with regard to Liberalism. The great drawback has been no place to meet in. We will hav a hall ready in about two months, which will be open to free speech or anything that comes along. Will you be kind enough to send a lecturer to dedicate it to Freethought? If you can find an old soldier, we would prefer him. I will wait your reply.

Yours respectfully, J. J. HOLLAND.

[We refer this invitation to our lecturers. Surely some of them ought to be able to attend, and there is no dearth of veterans among them. Mr. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kan., we believe, has borne a musket, as has also Colonel Kelso, of California, to say nothing of the League secretary, Capt. Samuel P. Putnam.—ED. T. S.]

WAYNESBURG, PA., July 19, 285.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long, long time since I hav indulged in the pleasure of addressing you. Indeed, I fear that I hav unconsciously drifted somewhat away from the fold. I regret it very much, but the accursed necessity of bread-winning has led me away from the occupation of my desire. When I speak of having drifted away from the fold, do not understand that I hav become any the less zealous in the cause of humanity, but I hav become so enwrapped in business that I hav been precluded from directing my zeal in the effectiv manner that I feel it might be. Had I possessed a better opinion of popular appreciation, I might hav combined the bread-winning occupation with something more congenial to my inclination. I trust that I may yet be able to do so. Inclosed find $10.50, for which please send me the within mentioned books.

H. CLAY LUSE.

MULBERRY, Pa., July 20, 285.

MR. EDITOR: In the latest TRUTH SEEKER I got I read a paragraph to the effect that President Cleveland, Postmaster Vilas, and a number of those big guns went fishing last Sunday in West Virginia. Last summer we read that President Arthur went fishing on Sunday. Now I do not hav a particle of objection to fishing on Sunday, but what I do object to is the law against fishing on Sunday. To show the injustice practiced, and the bigotry and cowardice shown, I will relate a little incident that just occurred in our benighted neighborhood.

P. A. Nagle is an honest, industrious, upright man. He went fishing occasionally on Sunday. Why did he go? First, because he enjoyed fishing fully as well as Presidents Cleveland and Arthur, or any of those noble lords. Second, because he and his family enjoy a mess of fish as much as anybody else, including the president. Third, because he is a poor man, and has to work hard week-days for a living, and Sunday is the only day left to him. Well, sir, a few weeks ago some cowardly bigot sent him a letter, not by regular mail, but placed it under his door at night, warning him not to fish any more on Sunday, and threatening him with prosecution. Now why may not Mr. Nagle go fishing on Sunday? First, because he is not president of the United States. Second, because he is a poor man, and is honest enough to pay his debts and naturally stay poor. Third, and most, because he is a Freethinker, and is honest enough to say so.

I was glad when I read that Mr. Reynolds was coming to Pennsylvania, but he went to Michigan. Michigan cannot be worse than Pennsylvania. One outrage after another is committed by fanatics under our unconstitutional laws, of which we hav many. A campaign in Pennsylvania would certainly do some good.

L. W. LIGHTY.

GOFFS, KAN., July 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: This place was the scene of an enthusiastic Liberal meeting last night, conducted by A. L. Andrews, who completely wrecked three theological force-pumps, and made an impression on his hearers that will be lasting.

The audience was only limited by the seating capacity of the hall. Mr. Andrews's lecture was entitled, "Why I am Not a Christian." He is only twenty-six years old, but one of the most profound reasoners I ever heard; and while he completely riddled the doctrins of orthodoxy, he did not hurt the feelings of anyone.

This is what Goffs has been needing for some time. We hav in this place some of the most bigoted and prejudiced people that ever existed. It was gall, of course, to them, but beyond their power to gainsay. After the lecturer had finished invitations were extended to any who wished to reply. The state evangelist of the Campbellite church was present, and, urged on by his followers, undertook the task; but his cake was soon made dough by the unanswerable arguments of Mr. Andrews.

U. L. KERR.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., July 16, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your issue of July 11th contains a letter headed, "Sugar-Coated Drones," and this question (by way of accusation) is asked, "Did not the church break up the Washingtonian movement to suppress rum drinking?" The article is signed, "A Toiler." I know the church is guilty of about everything mean, and this fact I would like to hav authority for saying, as I am an advocate of temperance, and generally charge the church with being opposed to all reform. Will "Toiler," or anyone, giv me light on the subject through your columns?

R. BAKER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 13, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a copy of a placard posted in conspicuous places in this city. As an advertisment for the churches it certainly beats the Baptist church of the Epiphany, 64th street and Madison avenue, in your city, as it appeared in the issue of your paper of July 4th. If attractions of this kind are to be found at the churches on the holy Sabbath, it certainly will draw a great many old bald-headed "Majahs and Jedges" who now desecrate the day by sitting in the parks dozing and killing flies. This is an average church-going city; about ten per cent attend when the weather is not too hot, but just now that percentage has been reduced. Excursions and picnics hav made sad inroads among the godly. But if the sisters are offering these superior attractions, we may look for better houses, after it is generally known.

B.

[PLACARD.]

"We recommend public meetings to be held under the auspices of every Christian church to consider the speediest and most effectiv way of purifying the temples of the ALMIGHTY GOD against inroads being made on public decency and morality by females of our various churches—those who dare to enter in a semi-nude or transparent garb which would be more in keeping with the votaries of the Comique than the penitents seeking peace with their God. We therefore PUBLICLY PROCLAIM to whom it may concern, that all females who can so grossly insult the opposit sex as to appear in dresses made of white transparent muslin, or transparent material of any other color, fitting close to the limbs and body, are unfit persons to enter respectable society.

"N.B.—If parents or pastors are incapable of teaching them, the public will hear from us again in plainer terms.

"DISGUSTED GENTLEMEN."

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 19, 1885.

MR EDITOR: Being an uncompromising advocate of a common brotherhood of the human race, and of all that such relations should logically involve and imply, to be consistent, I should be as uncompromisingly hostil to all class distinctions, and especially to extravagant claims that are based on assumption of distinctiv class merits. Therefore, I wish to inquire into the justice of the claim that those who perform all the labor should hav an exclusiv right to all the product.

Does not that assumption smell strongly of the odor and odium of an outrageous proclamation that might should be the law of right? That the weak should hav no right to liv, except by sufferance of the strong? Should we wonder that the advocates of such an infamous iniquity should refer us to untutored savages for instruction on just principles?

They pretend that land should be as free and accessible as air, sunlight, and rain-water. Then, I will inquire, how can an exclusiv right to product be secured, except by an equally exclusiv right to the ground out of which the product is growing? I think we hav good reason to suspect some "crookedness" in a principle that requires such crooked logic to make it plausible.

It is conceded that man has no claim to the ground by virtue of his labor expended upon it. He simply ploughs the ground, plants the seed, harrows it in, and leaves the rest to the operations of nature until the harvest. It being evident that nature has furnished all the material, and done more than man toward making the crop, to whom should the unearned increment justly belong? Labor advocates claim it for those who perform the labor; the advocates of capital claim it for those who effect exchange and distribution. Should not those children of nature who are unable to labor hav a more just claim to it than either of the others?

That view of the subject should narrow the dispute between labor and capital to a wrangle between thieves for possession of the plunder, and we should see no good reason for intelligent, fair-minded men concerning themselvs about which gets the worst of it, except so far as it may involve the question of honest people getting their dues when rogues fall out. I am beginning to suspect that speculating money-grabbers are not the only nor the most formidable obstruction to a social reform that will extend a helping hand to those who are the most in need of help, and the most outrageously wronged.

The price of products is simply the price of labor charged to the product on which the labor is expended, and is necessary to serve as standard of exchange. Exclusiv ownership of products makes exchange and a price for product an economic necessity, and that necessity furnishes the opportunity for all the commercial fraud and villainy that is practiced. Therefore, our carping about the iniquity of the fraud and villainy, while we cultivate the root from which it springs and receives nourishment, is very like straining at a gnat an swallowing an elephant. I think it time that workingmen and their friends should hav learned the expediency of basing their claim to a right to liv, and to the means of living, on the broad plain of human need, instead of on the contemptibly mean, narrow plain of human greed in leading-strings that cannot lead.

J. A. TUTTLE.

STERLING CENTER, MINN., July 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I heartily indorse "Liberta's" communication under the head of "Refining Liberalism." In it "Liberta" has clothed my own ideas in words more eloquent than I could hav done. I hav wished so much that some one would step to the front and put some of the articles through the refiner's fire. "Liberta" has done this successfully. Surely we are not worthy the name of Liberals unless we are willing to accord to others the rights we claim for ourselvs. We do not make our own garments the whiter by staining with malicious words those of others. We also find more convincing proof of the hollowness of the Christian religion in one column of Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses" than is contained in volumes of personal abuse.

The Materialistic idea is, comparativly speaking, a new thing with me. Instead now of praising a mythical redeemer, I will bestow my praise upon the works of Thomas Paine, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, the few Liberal journals that I hav been enabled to obtain, etc., for through their strong reasoning I hav been awakened to a new life. As to the future punishment, which is, I think, the greatest dread to all still in the dark—for how can one be so bigoted as to think, "I am the one out of the thousand which will be saved?"—I hav no fear. If there is a continuation after life, we shall all be permitted to taste the sweets of that life. For Mother Nature respects each child alike. And as Colonel Ingersoll has so eloquently expressed it, "Suppose, after all, that death ends all. Next to eternal joy, next to being forever with those we love and those who hav loved us, next to that is to be wrapped in the dreamless drapery of eternal peace. Next to eternal life is eternal sleep." I think there are very few reasoning men and women who would not very much prefer an endless sleep to running their chances on heaven, when an "inspired" word givs them so little surety of a "complimentary" when they shall hav reached the gates. There is not, in my estimation, the faintest possible show for anyone to come up to God's standard of what his right-hand "glorifiers" must be. Do any of us love our enemies very excruciatingly? We may forgiv them, but love them—no. Do we sell all we hav and giv to the poor? Do we take no thought of the morrow? Do we not build fires in our habitations on the Sabbath day? Hav we not earthly gods that receive our first attention? And yet he says, "Thou shalt hav no other gods before me." When we are commanded by the same God to do two things exactly the opposit, how are we going to know which is going to meet with a reward? Certainly not both. For instance, "If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). And yet he says in Ephesians, "Honor thy father and mother;" "Husbands, love your wives." He also says in John that "whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish and wine to those that be heavy of heart." "Look not upon the wine when it is red: when it giveth his color in the cup." "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgivness." "And by him all that believe are justified from all things." Will some one point out the right of these uncertainties to a seeker after truth? LIZETTA.

PASSAIC, N. J., July 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly tell me what the law is with regard to the naming of children? In England you can meet the requirements of the law by simply registering them. I want to avoid the Christian baptism.

I send you one dollar for the Tent Fund, and am sorry I hav delayed so long. I was good enough to send it in the beginning, but somehow never could well spare it. We Infidels are a mighty poor lot. For any Christian object the parsons could hav raised ten times the amount in half the time. I hope Mr. Reynolds will carry on the good work. I hav some doubt, though; he won't hold out. I seem to read between the lines that he is tired of his job. Well, if he had an easy time in orthodoxy, he is bound to get tired of Infidel lecturing. You know it is only human he should; it is rougher work.

WOOLSON.

VINELAND, N. J., July 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Burk's plan of secularization, beginning on the broad basis of the population and proceeding so systematically as to secure interest and sustainment, is so consistent, and can be made so efficient, that I hope American Secularists will approve and gladly institute the measures he has outlined. It will be carrying the Liberal standard through the midst of our enemies' delusions, and surrounding it with watchful workers, kindly but firmly showing the difference of the systems, the tendency of each, the justice or injustice. Those who hav heard my plan of successful operation will see its likeness to this, and also see that as work advances the regulations will be made to greatly facilitate it and insure lasting permanence, by uniting sanitary measures which are expressly secular allies. With this, woman's aid and influence will enlarge to cheer and strengthen, while in the ratio of her help tyrannies' forces will weaken.

The proposed plan would in effect be a secular college, the national center be the receiving and supplying bureau, and the diffusiv order of action be as efficient as it proved practical.

Mr. Burk's plan is what I hav laid out under the head of "Integral Culture College" in a history of woman's efforts at true and sanitary life, which will be out of press and before the public in a few weeks. In the third department of the work, under the title, "Modern Martyrdom," this college is described with its diffused work. The term "Integral" includes the secular idea and sentiment, and I hav there instanced the adaptation of the plan and intent to the present needs of the Secular Union. Now that a man has seen the bearing of the measures on the success of the Union, I trust the officers and friends of the only organization battling for usurped liberty will most carefully consider the plan, and not allow its momentousness to prevent sanction and co-operation.

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

MANKATO, MINN., July 14, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3. Your paper reaches me every Sunday morning, and I need not tell you that it is more welcome to me and its reading better enjoyed than any sermon I hav listened to, voluntarily or involuntary, nolens or volens, from early boyhood on. A man who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER needs not fear his last hour; he leaves his present state of existence to become another, a different part or particle of the great universe, all content and perfectly satisfied that it is so and cannot be otherwise; even the idea of an eternal bliss is just as well a nonsense as the idea of eternal damnation. How long would a soul feel happy in the eternal bliss and how long unhappy in the eternal damnation, without committing, in both cases, if it could, self-destruction or suicide? Eternal bliss as well as eternal damnation are both impossibilities, a monstrous thought, imposed on mankind by priestcraft, which will fall with all the rest of superstition as soon as man givs up the unnatural, overbearing imagination that the world, especially the earth, was made for him, for his sake. Let me tell you that man has no more right to think that the earth was made for his sake than the leaf-louse has that the tree with all its leaves was made for her or his sake. There are Freethinkers or philosophers who proclaim that nature in bringing forth man had become self-conscious by the self-consciousness of man! If we are self-conscious, all other animals must be self-conscious in their way, and we are very likely not to understand their ways of showing it, just as little as a goose would understand me if I would place myself before her and tell her that I was a self-conscious being and that the earth was made for man's sake. Let us do away with all overbearing, with all the imaginary preferred and predestined perdition of man in the creature, and we will be at once man, women, boy or girl, and nothing else; and what can be—for us, of course—a higher attainment than to try to be a true man, a true woman, a true boy, a true girl? Let us be content with what we hav and with what we are, and improve on that, and let alone what man does not and never will comprehend. Why not be content with one good life? Men or woman who spoil, embitter, or curtail their present life in order to get an everlasting, blessed life "over there" are just as wrong as a farmer who is not satisfied with his 160 acres and buys more and more, until he destroys the happiness of himself and his family; he dies after a life of trouble and discontent Let us be men and nothing else. O. T.

THOMASTON, ME., July 12, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Being on a tour through this state selling "Important Truths," I reached this place last evening. I hav long wanted to visit the state's prison, but never did before. As I walked through the streets I remarked to a man, a stranger, "I would like to make an address to the prisoners to-morrow," not taking a thought that anyone else would hear of it. When I went to the prison this morning, and while waiting in the reception room, an officer came to me and asked me to step into the warden's room. I was surprised, and knew not what it meant, as I was a stranger to anyone in town. The warden said to me, in a very gentlemanly manner: "Mr. Mitchell, we understand that you hav said that you were going to talk to the prisoners. We cannot hav a sensational speech." I told him I made no such remark, but I did say I would like to make an address to the prisoners.

In his room was the Methodist priest who was to preach at the prisoners, to whom he introduced me. I received him very coldly, much more so than I would the prisoners, whom I considered his superiors. Soon we were conducted into the chapel, and, in a few minutes, one hundred and eighty men, with a degrading suit of clothes on, the right side black and the left red, caps the same, marched in with their officers and took seats where I could see every face distinctly.

And, my friends, no one but myself will ever know my feelings as I sat there. I could not restrain my feelings as I looked into the faces of those unfortunate brothers. I burst into tears. How I longed to take the hand of every one of those young men—most of them were young men—and talk to them as I could at that time. Had I had the means, I would take off those degrading Christian clothes, and they never should be put on again, and I would let each one hav a neat suit, and, on Saturday afternoons, I would hav called them all together and said, "My brothers, look up! I want you to feel that you are just as good as I am. It is only through circumstances that I am a free man and you are prisoners. I present each of you with a new suit of clothes. After breakfast to-morrow morning I shall present each of you with a well-filled basket of food, and then we shall unlock the doors and giv you ten hours of unrestrained liberty. Go where you please; if you do an unmanly act, you do it at your own cost. Come back at night like true men. After this you wear no more degrading clothes, and we pay you all for every day's work you do. An account shall be kept, and when your time expires it will all be paid you for the use of yourselvs and families."

My friends, in the language of a noble woman twenty-five years ago, "if this world is ever redeemed it must be by love.' And I say it can never be done by Christian hate.

The sermon of that Methodist priest stirred me as I never was stirred before. And as I sat there looking into those men's faces, and hearing that worthless sermon, I saw clearer than I ever did before why we hav so-called criminals. It all comes from the teachings of Christianity, its Bible, and its God. "Jesus pays it all," tells the whole story. If I execrated the teachings of Christianity before, I do a great deal more now.

To hear that detestable Methodist priest tell those ignorant men to "come to Christ," when they needed instruction as children, was enough to make the very stones cry out.

Mr. Editor and friends, when will the people become intelligent enough to keep these worst of all criminals—priests—out of all places of instruction?

Holding up my handkerchief, I told the warden, "I would not giv that for such talk as that priest made." I said to him, "I would not ask if rum brought those men there, but I would ask what were the prenatal conditions and the childhood of those young men?" Don't tell me that it was rum that brought those men there. I know better. Their faces told a different story. I could see and feel the whole cause far better than I can describe it. I saw some good-looking faces, but most of them were far from being attractiv. I had no hate, but a great deal of sympathy. I saw but one colored person there, quite a young man. I saw several youthful faces that I longed to send home to their mothers. I said to the warden, "Are there no women here?" "Yes, five." "Why are they not here?" "We do not think it best." And now, in closing this imperfect statement, I quote from the immortal poet, David Barker:

"While one intellect is clouded,
While one soul in sin is shrouded,
While a world for light is dying,
Brother, never cease your crying—
Light!"

SEWARD MITCHELL.

P.S.—I asked the warden if I could get the religious belief of the prisoners. Snapping his fingers, he said, "No; it is not worth that; they will tell you anything; you cannot depend on what they say."

I was pleased to see an improvement in one thing—the prisoners are not compelled to be shaved, they can wear their beard as they choose, if it is not "fantastic." S. M.

EARLVILLE, ILL., July 10, 285.

MR. EDITOR: I would like a dozen of your "Balaams." Every church should hav one for their Sabbath-school children to look at. When I see so much superstition and bigotry in the world, I feel like saying, "Oh, for more Ingersollites, to preach the gospel of peace and good will to man!" And I hope others will be raised up to take the places of those old veterans that we hav had to part with by death.

SARAH C. HILTON.

ADRIAN, MICH., July 7, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 to pay for six monthss subscription. I would rather hav THE TRUTH SEEKER than any other paper I know of. I am much obliged for its continuance beyond the time paid for. If I could do my business for pay in advance I could always afford THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I wish all business could be done on a ready-pay basis.

Yours truly, S. P. BABCOCK.

FORRESTON, ILL., July 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Your circular letter received. In response remit five dollars to pay for two years' subscription. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER since D. M. Bennett's imprisonment. I believe the paper is doing a great deal of good, and hope you are receiving the necessary financial encouragement. C. E. NICODEMUS.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I write to acknowledge the recipt of those pamphlets of "St. Matthew on Trial," and to tell you how much we appreciate them. They are just the documents to be circulated. We took ours over to our Liberal League meeting last Sunday night, and they were eagerly taken.

We take about all the Liberal papers published, and we save them all for free distribution at our League meetings, so we furnish a great deal of reading to those that are not posted in all the Liberal movements. And I would say that whenever you hav any papers, or circulars, or pamphlets, that you can afford to send out free, we will gladly circulate them at our meetings. We only wish we were able to send five or ten dollars for such papers for free distribution to you, but, unfortunately, we are not, for we do all we can to support our Liberal papers, and then what we can in numerous ways otherwise. We hav had very interesting meetings for the year past, and the interest is so great that we shall not adjourn during the summer months, as we did last year, but keep the meetings a-booming all the while.

Our meetings are run the same way the Manhattan Club is managed, a lecture first and then discussions follow, and all subjects are ably discussed.

THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better all the time, and it is read every week with avidity. In the last TRUTH SEEKER an article by Amrita Lal Roy, on "Religion and the Labor Movement," is one of the best I hav read in a long time. You hav our best wishes always. Ever your friend, A. B. SEVERANCE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

An Old-Time Lullaby.

Up the stairs they merrily climb—
Three little white gowns at sleepy-time,
Big brother Benny and baby Grace,
And funny Wee-boy with the happy face;
And mamma sings, as they mount the stair,
These cranky words to a queer old air—
"Go to bed, sleepy-head,
And sleep for money to buy a cow!"

Said Benny, "Such humbug I never heard!
And I don't believe it a single word.
If I slept all night, and slept all day,
Do you think I'd be any richer, say?"
The wee-boy nodded his curly head.
"Mamma, sing it aden!" the baby said.
"Go to bed, sleepy-head,
And sleep for money to buy a cow!"

Said Benny, "Who made such a silly song?
It tells a story; it must be wrong."
"I can't tell, Benny, I only know
It was sung to me long years ago,
By your old Scotch granny, sweet and dear,
When I was as small as baby here.
So go to bed, sleepy-head,
And sleep for money to buy a cow."

"If grandmamma said it, it must be true:
But I don't believe it, now say, do you?
And tell me, mamma, I'd like to know,
When she sent you to bed, did you always go?"
"Yes, I always went, just as you must now."
Said the funny Wee-boy, "Then where's your cow?"
"Oh, go to bed, sleepy-head,
The cow jumped over the moon, they said."

Which is the Strongest?

The Persian king sat on his throne;
Around him, file on file,
The lords of all his mighty zone,
From India to the Nile,
With gold and gems resplendent shone,
And smiled to see him smile.

"Now, tell me," said he, half in scorn,
"Which is the strongest thing—
Woman, or Wine, or Truth, sky-born,
Or Persia's mighty king?
Who answers best, a purple vest
Shall hav, with golden ring."

Then spoke the first and said, "Red wine
Of all is strongest far,
It fills the heart with joy divine;
Life brightens like a star;
The rich and poor embrace benign,
And all men brethren are.

Then said the second, bowing low,
"Earth's strongest is the King.
He says, 'Go forth!' his armies go,
They fear no living thing.
They smite the foe with deadly blow,
And home rich treasures bring."

Then said the third, "Woman of all
Of these is strongest still.
She rules the king within his hall,
And has with each her will.
What man most values, at her call
He brings her lap to fill.

"I saw Apame sitting fair
Beside the king of the land;
She plucked the crown from his dark hair
With air of mock command,
Then placed it on her tresses rare,
And slapped him with her hand.

"Nor frowned the king, but only smiled,
Submissiv to her mind.
To her caprice he was a child.
So always with mankind;
No matter how untamed and wild,
Woman can tame and bind.

"But Truth is stronger still; its hand
Reaches from heaven above.
It binds the ages with a band
Of wisdom and of love.
The earth stands still at its command,
The sun and stars do move.

"Wine may exalt us to the skies,
But then it biteth sore.
A woman's sweetest witcheries
Will fade when youth is o'er,
But Truth eternal never dies,
And gladdens more and more."

The princes shouted, "Great is Truth,
And mightiest over all!"
Darius said, "O, Hebrew youth,
Stand first in court and hall.
All things, forsooth, feel Time's fierce tooth,
But Truth shall never fall!"—Henry Peterson.

Peppercorn Stories

WHAT WE ARE MADE OF.

Tommy Clovertop, Frankie Muttonchops, and Johhny Gotobed were sitting in the shadow of a rough stone wall in the middle of a heap of ferns, discussing Polly Peppercorn's last talk.

"Isn't Polly too funny for anything?" said Johnny Gotobed. "Do you suppose it is all true that she tells us?"

"Course 'tis true," and Tommy Clovertop ooked the indig nation he felt at hearing a shadow of a doubt as to the veracity of Polly Peppercorn. "Isn't she a studying and a studying all the time?"

"But what I should like to know is, what makes us liv?"

"Fah! don't you know? 'Tis 'cause we eat; if we didn't eat we couldn't liv," and Frankie Muttonchops leaned against the wall and began to whittle a stick with the importance of an individual who has communicated a valuable item of information.

Just then they heard an audible titter on the other side of the wall, and looking over who should the boys see but Polly Peppercorn herself picking dandelion greens.

"Hello, Polly, we were just a talking about you," said Tommy Clovertop. "Johnny Gotobed does not know what makes us liv, and Frankie says 'tis because we eat—was that right, Polly?"

"Yes, it was right—I shall tell you all about that by and by. Of course, everything grows by eating or absorbing, which is the same thing. Plants, animals, rocks, and roses all hav to eat, or they would change into some other sort of material."

"They'd die, wouldn't they?" inquired Frankie Muttonchops.

"We should say they would die," said Polly, "but really nothing ever dies; it changes into other forms of life, and change is always going on. You know I told you the other day about the gases and principles of life, and maybe you thought those principles were only in human beings—did you?"

"I did," said Johnny Gotobed.

"But the same principles are in everything, in all matter, and just the same elements are always in the world, in one shape or another—they cannot be destroyed. People who hav studied a great deal in the science of life say that all the substances or elements in the world can be counted, and make less than a hundred."

"How many different substances are there?" asked Tommy Clovertop.

"Well, some say sixty, others sixty-four. There may be more that are not known, but somebody will find them, if so, by and by. See this sweet-fern leaf—smell it. Perhaps you think that what you smell is not a substance, but it is, all the same, very fine indeed; but if our eyes were as fine in proportion I guess we could see it, and if our sense of touch was delicate enough we might take the substance of odor in our very hands, but, as it is, we can only smell it, and the sense of smell tells the mind that it is an agreeable odor."

"But is mind a substance, too?" inquired Johnny Gotobed.

"Why, yes, it is, but it must be very, very fine indeed, because nobody has ever got hold of it to pick it to pieces and analyze it and tell all about its properties, any more than they can discover the perfumes of plants and flowers, or the keen faculty of some animals like cats, for instance, who can find their way back to their old homes, walking miles and miles till they reach the old homestead.

"We think because we hav brains to think with. If we had no brain, we should not think."

"Do you suppose cats think?" asked Johnny Gotobed.

"I know our cat thinks," replied Tommy Clovertop. "We had a cat once, and her name was Sally, and she was smart, and no mistake. She would climb the highest tree, jump over a five-foot wall, go fishing, and catch 'em, too. She used to go to the shore and dig clams when the tide was low. She was crazy for clams, was Sally. Before she learned to dig them, she would go and steal the fisherman's bait in the boathouse down there at the shad-hole. One time she got a clam in her mouth that had a hook in it, and she came home with the hook in her mouth, fastened there, and the line was dragging after her. Sally walked straight up to my father, and looked up in his face, with real tears in her eyes, and with the awfullest "Me-e-e-e-ow" that ever you heard in all your life, she just begged him to get that hook out. And she kept just as still as a mouse, sir, while he cut the hook out. After that you couldn't hire Sally to taste of fishermen's bait, and she learned to dig her own clams herself, and then she would bring them home for somebody to open and get out the inside for her. That looks as if she had some sort of thought, doesn't it?"

"Did she do any more tricks?" questioned Johnny Gotobed.

"She used to roll on my Aunt Nancy's flower-beds——"

"I s'pose she wanted to see them come up," laughed Frankie Muttonchops.

"Aunt Nancy livs with us, and she had planted sweet 'lyssum, marigolds, velvet pinks, hollyhocks, and poppies, and when Sally scratched 'em all up and rolled on 'em, I tell you Aunt Nancy was mad. 'I'll carry that cat off to-morrow, kittens and all,' said she. Sally was stretched on the wall, and heard every word Aunt Nancy said. She just winked one eye and twitched her tail, and just as soon as Aunt Nancy went in the house, down jumped Sally and made for the wood-shed, where she had six kittens—two white and black ones, one yellow, and the others sort of all colors mixed up together. Well, she took the six baby kittens, one at a time, right in her teeth, and off she carried them over to Uncle Jim Bradley's and hid them in the hay-mow, and she did not come in our house till fall, after Aunt Nancy had gone off to Connecticut visiting."

"Was that all she ever did that was cunning?" inquired Polly.

"She did a good many more things, and some of 'em were not quite so cunning. My father went fishing once, and caught one great toggy."

"What is a toggy?" and Polly looked quite bewildered.

"Why a toggy is a tautog, t-a-u-t-o-g, tautog, and we meant to hav it for our breakfast. But Sally sneaked in the pantry, where it lay on a plate, all clean and nice, threw it on the floor, and eat, and eat, and eat so much that it made her sick. My mamma was so offended with Sally that she told Timothy, the man who works at our house, to take that mean old cat and carry her away so far that she never would set her two eyes on her again. So Tim harnessed up old Billy to the light wagon, put Sally in a crocus bag, tied it up tight, and carried her nine miles and a half, and when he got opposit a good-looking farm house with a big barn and good fences, and a lot of pigs down in the orchard, he let Sally out of the bag, and drove for home as fast as he could. Timothy said he knew the man that lived there, and he thought he was a pretty good sort of man, because he always kept the place looking so neat. But two days afterwards, when Tim got up in the morning, Sally was sitting there on the door-step as contented as ever. Tim was scared and said, 'Lord bless me, Sally! where'd you come from?'"

"Was she real good after that?" asked Johnny Gotobed.

"She was for quite a while, but she soon got bad again, and when Aunt Nancy went in the bed-room one day, the company bed-room, and saw Sally curled up on the new white bedspread, and a whole lot of new kittens squirming and stretching themselvs inside her best bonnet!—oh, if she wasn't so mad! She told Timothy to drown every kitten, and she said she would attend to Sally herself. She carried her down in the pine woods, tied a string around her neck, and tied the other end of the string to a high limb. She thought she was dead, sure enough, but Sally got home before she did! When Aunt Nancy came in she said: 'I guess she won't spoil another bonnet for me. She's as dead as a door nail.' All the time Sally was under the stove, peeping out at Aunt Nancy, as if she would like to say, 'You didn't come it that time, old girl!' She didn't liv long, though, for she mourned herself to death for her kittens. I don't think Aunt Nancy did just right, myself."

"I am very sure she didn't," said Polly. "Of course Sally did not know any better. It shows she was intelligent by her going fishing, and carrying off her kittens when your Aunt Nancy threatened to do what she did, and by coming back home when Timothy carried her away, and I think if your Aunt Nancy had talked and reasoned with Sally she would hav done better. Cats can be taught as well as children. But this isn't picking dandelions for dinner. You take the knife and dig some for me, while I pick some blue violets, huckleberry blossoms, and pussy-willow buds for a bouquet."

Very soon the three boys had the basket full of young dandelion leaves, and Polly had a pretty little bouquet, and thanking the boys she hurried down the lane toward her home.

When nearly at the end of it, Tommy Clovertop screamed out, "Polly, the cat we hav now is one of Sally's grandchildren, and she's the best cat you ever saw."

"Yes," said Polly, "come over to-morrow about five o'clock, and we'll hav a little talk."

"All right, Polly," said the boys. "We'll be there." Then Johnny Gotobed called, "Pol-l-y, are cats made of the same kind of elements as we are?"

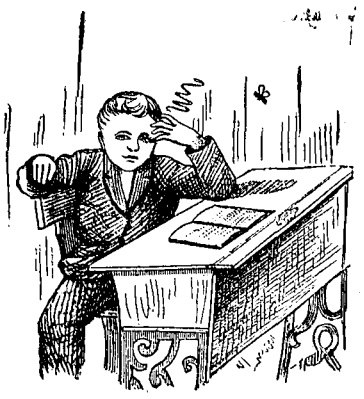
"Just the same," answered Polly.

Ashamed to Tell Mother.

"I would be ashamed to tell mother," was a little boy's reply to his comrades, who were trying to tempt him to do wrong.

"But you need not tell her; no one will know anything about it."

"I would know all about it myself, and I would feel mighty mean if I could not tell mother."



"It's a pity you were not a girl. The idea of a boy running and telling his mother every little thing.

"You may laugh if you want to," said the noble little boy. "I hav made up my mind never, so long as I liv, to do anything I would be ashamed to tell my mother."

Noble resolve; and one which will make any life true and useful. Let it be the rule of every boy and girl to do nothing of which they would be ashamed to tell mother.—Selected.

Correspondence.

MURRAY, IDAHO, July 5, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As there are so many boys and girls that write for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought that you would like to hear from this part of the country. I hav not seen any letters from way. We are acquainted with Mr. Pritchard, the man who discovered the mines. Times are dull now, for there is no water to work the claims that are on the hills, but they are working the creek claims, and some claims pay better than others. This is a good gold country, but the gold is very deep here. They had a celebration here and sent a paper balloon up in the air, but it did not go very far. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has ever since it was first published. I write to some girls in California that I never saw, but I am acquainted with their father, and he takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. Their name is Weybright, and one of the girls said she would write to THE TRUTH SEEKER. As I hav no more news, I will close for the present with success to the Children's Corner. Good-bye, from MELISSA ERWIN.

GREELEY, COL., July 16, 1885.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not written before, you will be surprised to hear from me. I wish there was a Liberal Sunday-school here, as we do not like to go to an orthodox school. We hav a Liberal hymn book, but wish to hav one having the words set to music. Do you know where we could get one?

We all like the Children's Corner very much, but I hav not seen a single letter from this place. This place has about three thousand inhabitants, and over one thousand school children.

Hoping this letter will not go in the waste basket, I remain truly yours,

ANNA LEIGHTON.

P.S.—The answer to the pictorial enigma, No. 3, in the June 20th number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is candy, nuts, and oranges. A. L.

MAINELAND, NEB., July 15, 1385.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: We may all address you thus, though you do not know us personally, because you are doing a friendly work for all mankind in your labor for the little ones. I read the Corner with deep interest and look upon it as being one of the most important, if not the most important, departments for Liberal effort. One man said, "Let me make the songs of a nation and I care not who makes the laws." He might better hav said, "Let me mold the minds of the children and I will make your laws in a few years." Your work is for eternity as well as for now. The little minds with the hood of superstition and fear lifted will be clearer, stronger, and better able to work and raise others than those who later in life were liberated, after having felt the galling chains. While the church holds the children our work will progress but slowly. I need not multiply reasons why the Corner is a good work, for itself givs sufficient evidence that you yourself hav seen and know the full value of the work upon which you are engaged. I desire to throw in a mite and so help to amuse and interest the little ones. I inclose two puzzles, which, if worthy, please place in the Corner. I also inclose some of the wild flowers of these great prairies. They are very pretty now. I hope they will retain at least their colors. The Corner is no place for long letters, or I would be tempted to giv the little Eastern truth seekers a description of our broad prairies where flowers of every hue are nodding and flashing in the sunlight at this season. But they must wait till another time, if at all. We also hav some very strange little animals which they never see except in the pictures. If Miss Wixon will permit, I may make up a letter of some interest.

For the present and for all time an interested reader and a heart full of love for all readers of the Corner, L. E. HUGGINS.

[We thank our friend for this kind letter. Such words of encouragement and appreciation are a great inspiration in our efforts for the entertainment and instruction of our darling children. The prairie flowers arrived in good condition, bright in color and fragrant. They are very beautiful, and, we think, must make a lovely picture blooming amid the waving prairie grasses. We in the East, and all of us everywhere, we think, would be delighted with a sketch from the pen of our friend descriptiv of the Western prairie, which is a wonder-land to us who hav never seen one in all its bright and glowing beauty.—ED. C. C.].

[Our thanks are due little Cora for a pretty cardboard picture. It is done very well for so young a child, and adorns a shelf in our room, and is admired by all who see it.—ED. C. C.]

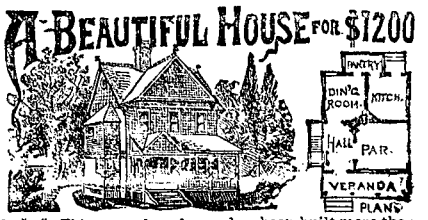
AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.



A very ancient granite, which is now in the museum at the "Indian House," was dug from the ruins of a temple in the island of Bombay. It is, as described by the late Thomas Maurice, (Indian Antiquities, vol IV, p. 372,) "A bust composed of three heads, united to one body, adorned with the oldest symbols of the Indian Theology, and thus expressly fabricated according to the unanimous confession of the sacred sacerdotal tribe of India, to indicate the CREATOR, the PRESERVER, and the REGENERATOR of mankind; which establishes the solemn fact, that from the remotest eras, the Indian nations had adored a TRIUNE DEITY."

Nearly all the Pagan nations of antiquity, in their various theological systems, acknowledged a Trinity in the divine nature. This is shown in BIBLE MYTHS.

The Missing Link
—IN—
MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. REVISED VERSION.

All people that on earth do dwell,
Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice;
No matter if you can't sing well,
Come ye before him and rejoice.

Know that the Lord is God indeed;
From nothing he himself did make,
And us his sheep, and each sheep's creed,
Also the devil, and the snake.

Oh, enter, then, his gates with praise,
Approach with joy his courts unto;
Flatter and laud him all thy days,
For he commands us so to do.

For why? The Lord our God is good;
His mercy you may thus secure;
For centuries his hell has stood,
And shall from age to age endure.

DOXOLOGY.

Praise God, from whom all blessings flow,
And also every form of woe;
Praise him above, ye heavenly host,
And thus delight the Holy Ghost.

IMPROVISATRICE.

Mr. Beecher's Christianity.

From the Brooklyn Eagle of July 6th.

Yesterday Mr. Beecher ended the series of sermons upon the subject of evolution, which he began some weeks ago. In making this known, however, to his congregation he took care to tell them particularly that with one branch of the subject, that, namely, of miracles, he proposed to deal somewhat later in the year. This and the related questions of prayer, of the atonement, the divinity of Christ, and the resurrection, he leaves to be discussed in the light of the major truths of evolution, and in setting the sermons which will treat of them aside from the present series, as corollaries dependent upon what has been demonstrated before, he acts consistently enough. At the same time he makes it perfectly clear that these matters hav become subsidiary in their importance, and so, of course, cease to occupy toward the thought of the present day any such relation as they held to the last generation. And, in truth, provided that Mr. Beecher is perfectly sound in his position, as described in the series of sermons now closed, where else could he place them?

How much value these charming discourses may possess as contributions to the literature of the subject; how profound will be their effect upon the thought of the day, coming as they do from the most daring and original of American pulpiteers as well as the most intellectual and influential; what, even, will be their full weight, estimated by their effect, on Plymouth congregation, must be determined after an interval. The world will watch all these relations with deep interest, when the time comes. At present it will concern itself wisely with what is immediately involved. Whatever, then, may follow in the future, one thing has already been accomplished. No intelligent reader of this memorable series need be under any doubt as to where Mr. Beecher stands, what he believes of the biblical story, or what value he places upon the generally held and time-honored system of religion, which cannot better be described than by the term dogmatic Christianity. In a word, he will hav none of it. He has outgrown it. No longer do its terrors move him. Its pathos is no longer immediate, to influence his reason as well as his emotion. It is, as history, interesting only as a sample of what a cluster of extremely consequential persons thought of themselvs and the phenomena of nature and spirit about them. Its real hold upon the world is that it contains certain truths. These hav been told heretofore in a fragmentary way, and with varying accuracy, perhaps all through recorded time; the one virtue of the Bible is that it presents them better than has ever before or since been done.

But the Bible is not to be accepted as the sole guide of man. Mr. Beecher does not only decline to accept its literal accuracy; he even stands aloof and condemns much of its doctrinal effort as pagan, heathenish, irrational, and perhaps demoralizing. There never was a fall. To teach that man was little lower than the angels originally, and by some misadventure sank to the lowest and most hopeless depths of estrangement from God; that that state was consequently characteristic of all who hav since lived, and that some fitful break in the order of nature was necessary to bring about a reconciliation, is to teach foolish fables. There was no fall; then, necessarily, there was no redemption, and so the whole story of human depravation and vicarious atonement is an offense to the intelligence of mankind, when proffered as a literal fact in the world's history. As to the crucifixion of Christ as a sacrificial act, by means of which all mankind might forego its penalties for offenses for which it could not be held responsible, that, too, is a mere assumption, more or less poetic, perhaps, but wholly without foundation. The resurrection, in the actual sense in which Christians of the old orthodox creed understood it, is equally unauthenticated, equally opposed to what we know of the processes of law, and wholly unimportant. Hell Mr. Beecher disposed of long ago; and the Old Testament revisers hav justified his disposition of it.

Thus stripped of its authority and of its assumptions, Christianity must stand or fall as a system of morals in due proportion as it receives the sanction of the intellect and the approval of experience. If it is in conflict with logic, so much the worse for it, since the principles of logic are based upon irrefutable truth. It is no longer a privileged system, ringed round with terrors to warn off investigation; no longer a pretext for privilege such as once hedged about a king and made the priest a temporal prince.

So far as we can see, Mr. Beecher's Christianity differs in no particular way from the ethical system of philosophy which satisfied the pupils of Socrates and Plato. Jesus the Christ is only a personification of the Kalon K'Agathon, the Beautiful and the Good. He becomes an art form of the same splendid order as an epic poem, the Parthenon, St. Peter's, "Macbeth," or one or all of Raphael's paintings. He is a living symbol of the art idea which expresses itself in the several ways that are here suggested. As the Son of Man, potentially sitting at the right hand of power, armed with Jovian lightnings and awaiting permission to "come again with great glory" to "shake terribly the earth," he is unthinkable, pagan, irrational, and wholly non-existent. As a study in perfection he is without a peer, perhaps; vastly more beautiful than Apollo as he remains in marble for all time, or even than Socrates or Buddha, so far as a nobler conception of humanity is the test; still, he has not by any means the beauty or sublimity of the universe of law of which science is the gospel.

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY
From Thales to Copernicus.
By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."
"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

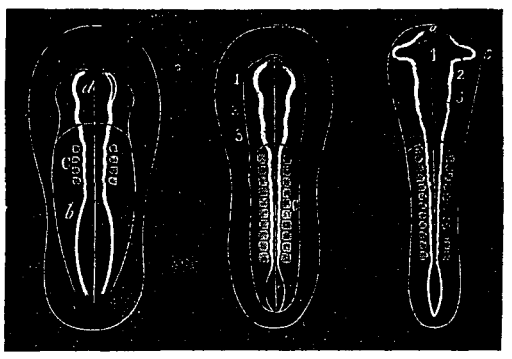
SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE;

OR, THE MYSTERIES OF MAN.

By R. T. TRALL, M. D.,

Carefully Revised and Enlarged Edition. Fully Illustrated.



This work was first published in 1866. Its success has been very great, and it has had a sale in every part of the world where the English language is read. It has become an authority on the subjects of which it treats. In England, in Australia, in New Zealand, in this country, it has been in constant demand since it was first published.

The advance in knowledge has made it desirable to revise the work and incorporate in it new discoveries made during the last 20 years. To this end it has been carefully revised, most of it re-written, several new chapters and a large number of fresh illustrations added, so that it is to-day practically a new book, and far the best of its kind which has yet appeared. It may be relied upon to give most complete knowledge of Sexual Physiology in all it departments.

Among the new chapters may be specially mentioned the one entitled, The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female. In no work is this subject so fully and interestingly treated. The subject matter has been drawn from a great variety of sources. This chapter alone will fully repay for the entire work.

There may be those who think the subject of Sexual Physiology one which should not be studied. There was a time when the subject of anatomy was considered improper, and it was considered unsafe for a man to devote his life to it. That day is past, and the benefits to the world from a knowledge of anatomy have been immense; and the benefits to the race from a perfect knowledge of Sexual Physiology will be far greater; and while we may respect the feelings of those who would never read on this subject, yet we must insist that it is one of the noblest studies, and brings one nearer than any other to the Creative Power, and one which, thoughtfully investigated, tends to make man wiser and better.

The illustrations in this work are 111 in number, and will greatly aid the reader by making everything plain and clear. No work of its kind has ever been so profusely illustrated; see samples in this adverisement.

The following are some the titles of the chapters: The Origin of Life; The Contests between the Males of Animals and Man for the Female; Pregnancy: Embryology; Parturition; Lactat on; The Law of Sex; Regulation of the Number of Offspring; Hereditary Transmission; Sexual Hygiene, etc., etc.

The price of the work is $2.00 by mail, post paid.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all form of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

FOR forms of government let fools contest,
Whate'er is best administered is best;
For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.
In Faith and Hope the world will disagree.
But all mankind's concern is Charity,
All must be false that thwart this one great end,
And all of good that bless mankind or mend.
—Pope.

ONE man is continually led by the complexion of his temper to forbode evil to himself and to the world, while another, after a thousand disappointments, looks forward to the future with exultation, and feels his confidence in providence unshaken. One principal cause of such differences is undoubtedly the natural constitution of the mind in point of fortitude.—Dugald Stewart.

THE wretch condemned with life to part,
Still, still on hope relies,
And every pang that rends the heart
Bids expectation rise.
Hope, like the glimmering taper's light,
Adorns and cheers the way,
And still, as darker grows the night,
Emits a brighter ray. —Goldsmith.

NO honest man can look upon the world and see it as it really is, without the question rising in him whether there be any God that governs it at all. No one can accept the popular notion of heaven and hell as actually true, without being as terrified as Bunyan was. We go on as we do, and attend to our business and enjoy ourselvs, because the words hav no real meaning to us. Providence, in its kindness, leaves most of us unblessed or uncursed with a nature of too fine fiber.—Froude's Bunyan.

CONFUCIUS is distinguished among the religious teachers of China by his worldly and practical character. All religion in his handling is brought down to the business of daily life, and estimated by its temporal benefits. A rationalist of the common type, he made no pretension to knowledge of supernatural things, and even advised his followers not to concern themselvs with inquiries about the nature of God, but to learn well their own duties, and to practice in their respectiv places, and especially to giv attention to political knowledge, as the path to usefulness and honor.—Dr. J. L. Moffat (of Princeton).

THE free man is king of himself, but he is ruler of none other; self-respecting, he must respect the rights of others; jealous of his own liberty, he must be equally jealous of the liberty of every one else; stern defender of his own dignity, he must, with equal sternness, repress any personal inclination, or any inclination of the many, to injure the same dignity, which is in each individual alike.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

LET not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts to throw,
And deal damnation round the land
On each I judge thy foe.

If I am right, thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, oh, teach my heart
To find that better way. —Pope.

FAR more important than specific influence on other writers, or even on the development of the subjects with which they deal, has been the effect of Locke's writings on the history of progress and civilization. In an age of excitement and prejudice he set men the example of thinking calmly and clearly. When philosophy was almost synonymous with the arid discussion of scholastic subtleties, he wrote so as to interest statesmen and men of the world. At the time when the chains of dogma were far tighter, and the penalties of attempting to loosen them far more stringent than it is now easy to conceive, he raised questions which stirred the very depths of human thought. And all this he did in a spirit so candid, so tolerant, so liberal, and so unselfish, that he seemed to be writing, not for his own party nor his own times, but for the future of knowledge and of mankind.—Fowler's Locke.

THE hights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.
—Longfellow.

THERE is no difference between the plain speech in many classic works and in those that hav been lately condemned [Mr. Conway is here referring to the trial and condemnation of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, in England, and Mr. Bennett, in these United States, both trials being equally notorious and shameful] as immoral, and no difference is alleged between the motivs with which they are all published. The book may be very able in one case, very poor in another, but the principles of freedom and right protect them equally. To contend that a book which is decent for the rich becomes indecent when priced within reach of the poor is a mere insult to the people, and it is on a par with the religion which regards subscribers visiting the Zoological Gardens on Sunday as pious people, whereas sixpence would make them Sabbath-breakers.—M. D. Conway.

IF a man is mistaken, instruct him kindly, and show him his error. But if thou art not able, blame thyself, or blame not even thyself. Whatever may happen to thee, it was prepared for thee from all eternity, and the implication of causes was from eternity spinning the thread of thy being and of that which is incident to it.—Antoninus.

BEFORE a man can use his powers to any purpose, he must arrive at some conviction in which his intellect can acquiesce. "Calm yourself," says Jean Paul, "it is your first necessity. Be a stoic, if nothing else will serve."—Froude's Bunyan.

WHO names not now with honor patient Job?
Poor Socrates (who next more memorable),
By what he taught and suffered for so doing—
For truth's sake suffering death unjust—lives now
Equal in fame to proudest conquerors. —Milton.

EARTH is sick,
And heaven is weary of the hollow words,
Which states and kingdoms utter when they talk.
Of truth and justice. —Wordsworth.

SUPERSTITION is religion out of fashion; religion is superstition in fashion.—Thomas Hobbes.

Odds and Ends.

CAPITAL punishment! as the boy said when the schoolmistress seated him with the girls.

DOGS are beginning to use their summer pants. If the heat continues they will all need muzzlin'.

THE Prince of Wales has stopped taking the Pall Mall Gazette. It is possible, however, that he has done worse things than that.

AMONG the new books soon to be published is one on Herod and one on Malthus. The names of these two famous persons can never die. Both did their utmost to relieve the world of the small boy.

"WHY did the Apostle Paul go to Athens?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. "Please, sir, was it to throw the detectivs off his track?" answered a Canadian tourist's little boy whose papa left him behind.

"MOTHER, the other day you said God made everything for a good purpose. I'd like to know what good purpose there is in these doggone flies." "Why, son, to keep you from being lazy." "Whoa, Emmy! I got you now. I wasn't borned when the flies were first made."

"NOW, then," said the school-teacher, who was an ardent advocate of temperance, "what is it that causes men to fight?" While waiting for some one to shout "Rum!" a little boy held up his hand and cried: "Dogs!" "Dogs!" exclaimed the teacher in astonishment. "Yesem. When a man says his dog is better'n another man's dog there's sure to be a fight."

WHEN the contribution box came back to him empty a clergyman said solemnly: "Experience may be a dear teacher, but the members of this particular flock who hav experienced religion hav acccomplished it at a very trifling cost. The choir will sing the seventy-ninth hymn, omitting the first, third, and fourth verses, in order to save unnecessary wear on the organ."

"IS the coon a smart animal?" asked a stranger of old Si Jackson on Onion creek. "Talk about coons being smart, I should say dey was smart." "Well, how smart are they?" "A coon played me de meanest trick you eber heerd tell on. I foun' a hole whar de coon went inter de groun', an' I waited dar all day long to shoot dat coon, an' when he did come out he was a polecat."

A POLICEMAN died in Erie, Pa., a few days ago, after drinking copiously of ice-water. It is not often that a policeman so far forgets himself as to indulge in colorless and flavorless beverages; but when he does step aside from the beaten track, it is all up with him. Keep water away from a policeman and giv him plenty of sleep, and he'll liv, if not forever, long enough for all practical purposes.

"CAN any little boy or girl tell me why the lions would not hurt Daniel?" said a gentleman, addressing a Sunday-school. "I know," said one bright little fellow, holding up his hand. "And what was the reason, my little man?" said the speaker, stepping forward, with his face in a joyous glow. "Speak up loud, so that all may hear you. Why wouldn't the lions bite Daniel?" "I guess it was coz he b'longed to the circus."

A MINISTER sat at the beside of a lady who was very ill. "We must all die, my dear madam," he said gently. "But what is death compared with the glories that are to come? Think of heaven, with its silvery streams, its clear running fountains, its eternal hills, its green fields, and its pleasant meadows; its clustering palms and crystal lakes, its—" "Yes," sighed the lady, "it must be a delightful place to look upon, but I should be dreadfully afraid of malaria."

"I UNDERSTAND you had quite a lively time at your house Saturday night," said Johnson to young Mr. Smirel on the Monday after the celebration of the national anniversary. "Yes, rather," replied Mr. Smirel, with a pleased and happy blush, which rather disconcerted Johnson, "What was the excitement? Celebrating the Fourth?" "Oh, no," hastily answered Mr. Smirel, with a blush, "it was only the first." "Why!" exclaimed Johnson, surprised, "Saturday wasn't the first; it was the"—then he stopped, made a little calculation on his fingers, remarked "Oh!" with a peculiar significance, and went in with Smirel to help him to select the cigars.

THEY stood beneath the summer skies and watched the twinkling stars in ceaseless brilliant twink. It was a night to bring the angels from the blue that they might lay their gentle hands upon the evening air, and, touching every heartstring, fill the world with harmony. "And this is love," she said looking into his face. "And love is religion," he continued, stooping to kiss the pretty pinkness of her cheek. "What religion?" she asked naively, "Presbyterian, or Methodist, or Baptist, or Episcopalian?" "None of these, angel mine," he whispered, folding her to his throbbing heart; "none of these; it is You-an'-I-tarian." Devotional exercises were continued until a late hour.

DOUBLE ACTION POETRY.

In his court King Charles was standing on his head
a golden crown,
And his royal brow was wrinkled in a most portentous frown.

Fifty courtiers entered walking on their hands were jewels bright
Set in rings of gold and silver what a rare and splendid sight.

Four-and-twenty noble ladies proud and fair and ten feet long
Were the trains that flowed behind them borne by pages stout and strong.

In a bower of fragrant roses the musicians now compete Blowing trumpets with their noses they inhale the fragrance sweet.

See the queen how sad and tearful as the king cut off her head
One bright tress of hair at parting and she wishes
she were dead.

Notes and Clippings.

A CINCINNATI paper says: "Hell by any other name is just as hot." This is, no doubt, official.

EPISCOPAL Bishop Bedell condemns the revised version because "it tends to unsettle fixed beliefs."

THERE is a clause pending before the Florida constitutional convention which makes clergymen ineligible as members of the legislature.

A FLOATING joke says the whale that swallowed Jonah was like a milkman retired on an independence, because he took a great profit out of water.

DR. BROWN-SEQUARD, a resident of this country, has just received the biennial prize of 20,000 francs from the French Academy of Sciences. He received 74 votes against 7 in favor of the explorer, De Brazza.

A CATHOLIC priest named Bruzza has been arrested at Leghorn, Italy, for enticing young girls to ruin by means of an "orphanage." Twenty little girls were found in the institution. The lady superior has fled.

THE will of Dr. Prime, editor of the Observer, indicates that he had gathered a large amount of this world's goods. He leaves his relativs nearly $50,000 in money, besides shares in the Observer which hav a considerable commercial value.

ARTHUR J. CAPEL, a brother of Monsignor Capel, has had his six months' invitation to the liberties of the Union Club, New York, revoked, because of behavior not becoming a gentleman, in getting drunk and sleeping in one of the parlors.

MR. J. H. HART, the Utah emigrant agent in this city, is making arrangements for the reception of six hundred European converts to Mormonism, who will be landed here about August 20. These people will come in one of the steamships of the Guion line.

LORD COLERIDGE, one of England's great guns, being threatened with breach of promis, is about to marry. Sir Charles Dilke, another noble lord, has just paid an injured husband $125,000. All London's nobility seems to be suffering exposure. "God save the queen.'

MR. C. DE ROBERTS, of Albion, Neb., has taken his children from the public schools, and declares his intention to resign as a member of the board and hav nothing to do with a school district that compels his children to listen to the reading of the scriptures and the repetition of the Lord's prayer.

FAITH cures are recognized by the London Lancet, which says there is no question that they are wrought. There is no miracle in faith healing, but it would be a miracle if faith healing did not occur under favorable conditions. The mistake that has been made is in proclaiming faith cures as a religious function.

AN exchange regrets that the form of law did not permit the jury in the Dudley-Rossa case to find a verdict thus: "We, the jury, find that Rossa being a dynamiter, and a blatherskite, the irrepressible little English woman, especially as she is a woman, was somewhat excusable for taking a shot at him—especially as she could not shoot to kill."

Two colored clergymen presented themselvs for recognition at the Convention of the South Carolina diocese of the Protestant Episcopal church at Columbia in May last. A brother tried to hav them kept out on account of their color, and a great deal of discussion is going on about it. The darkies threaten to divide the church unless they are recognized.

THE advance of civilization is a very curious affair. There are missionaries in the island of Zanzibar, and there is rum also—both of them importations from representativ Christian nations. The missionary preaches to a score, while the liquor affects a hundred. Zanzibar is in one sense absorbing the spirit of modern times, or, perhaps, we had better say the spirits. It may be according to the laws of social evolution that a people must first become drunk before they can become Christian; but it is certainly a remarkable fact that when civilization comes into contact with barbarism, Bibles and brandy are always used to giv the first upward impulse.—Herald.

A GEORGIA physician took the precaution to secure a certificate from a woman whom he had treated, stating that it was his services which had given relief. When some praying visitors announced that their petitions to heaven had brought about the result, the doctor triumphantly shook the document in their faces, and they retired from the scene discomfited.

AGENT DAVIDSON, of the Mormon church of Utah, passed through Washington last week en route to Jackson and DeKalb counties, Alabama, where he expects to purchase sufficient territory for the settlement of three hundred Europeans, who hav joined the Mormon church, and are soon to arrive in the United States. Davidson is provided with funds sufficient to accomplish his undertaking without delay.

CATHOLICS are advancing in all parts of the country upon the principles of religious liberty, and their aggressions are going to compel a bitter conflict. We formerly thought that some were extravagant in their views of the purposes of Rome in America, but recent events show that the Jesuits are as sleepless, as unprincipled, as plausible as they hav ever been. By their political craft they are able to develop a band of traitors among Protestants who will join hand in hand with them.—Advocate.

MISSIONARIES in the equatorial lake region of Africa hav discovered that a kind of beer made of bananas is a prophylactic against malarial fevers, and that this drink is indispensable to their health. Of course the missionaries take the beer only for the stomach's sake and their often infirmities. Contemporaneous with this discovery, a priest in Spain has found that absinthe will prevent cholera, and he therefore imbibes the liqueur in generous quantities. It was a theological student, we believe, who first discovered that smoking was good for corns.

IN a recent article on prohibition published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, our correspondent "Temperance" held that light wines and beer were more conduciv to temperance than the efforts of Prohibitionists. The following clipping would seem to support that view: "I hav sold hundreds, I might almost say thousands, of lots to Germans," said a real estate man, "and I hav noted one significant fact. The moment a German takes to whisky he's gone. He may swallow beer, ale, wine, and cider enough to float a ship, and yet pull through and pay for his lot, but old rye will lay him out. When a whisky-drinking German wants to deal with me on time, I say 'No.'"

A BURR OAK, Mich., paper reports the proceedings of a camp-meeting as follows: "Last Sunday a Mrs. Wm. Simkins got 'the power' at a Free Methodist camp-meeting at Algansee. After some hours, friends — outsiders — got alarmed, called a physician, and attempted to remove her. The elders objected, and in the row that followed a Mr. Navison was hit in the jaw by an elder—Clark. He swore out a warrant for Clark's arrest upon a charge of assault and battery. War followed. He was taken, and is under $500 bonds to appear before a Coldwater justice to-day; and Elder Matthews, who took a prominent part in the camp-meeting held south of this village a few weeks ago, is under $100 bonds for resisting an officer."

THE Rev. Washington Gladden, of Columbus, O , is trying to find out why a majority of workingmen hav deserted the churches. One worker writes, no doubt expressing the sentiments of many others: "Of course, the manufacturers can and should dress better than the laborer. But when we see them so full of religion on Sunday, and then grinding the faces of the poor on the other six days, we are apt to think that they are insincere. They say to us, 'We are not making as much as we would like; we will hav to reduce the cost of our goods by cutting down your wages a little.' We say, 'We can't clothe our families comfortably now.' They say we must economize by buying a cheaper article of clothing. We say, 'Hard work givs us a good appetite, and we can't set a substantial table.' They say: 'Corn is cheap; your table ought not to cost much.' This creates an ill-feeling between capital and labor. When the capitalist prays for us one day in the week, and preys on us the other six, it can't be expected that we will hav much respect for his Christianity." Similar sentiments no doubt prevail among workers, but there is a deeper and more significant reason why the more intelligent workmen no longer attend church. They hav lost all faith in the dogmas of Christianity.

THE Smithsonian Institution has received from Barton county, Ga., a natural curiosity that is arousing much interest. A company which is getting out limestone from a solid ledge found, 100 feet below the surface of the ledge, an immense deposit of human and animal bones carelessly heaped together and imbedded in the solid rock. The bones are intact, but break when an effort is made to free them from the stone. A mass of this conglomerate of stone and bones, weighing 5,000 pounds, has been received there, and the Smithsonian authorities will send an expert down to examin the deposit, which is represented to weigh many tons. No explanation is offered for the bones being there, save that a cave existed there inhabited by antediluvians, and it afterward slowly filled with a limestone deposit which cannot now be distinguished from the original rock.

"IT is astonishing what timber the Greenback party pick up when they want a public officer. The man whom they hav put in nomination for superintendent of public schools has a record that he probably now wishes was slightly blotted out. The Keosauqua Republican has this to say of his past actions: 'Mr. Moore, of Davis Co., the man whom the Greenbackers hav nominated for superintendent of public schools, and whom the Democrats are expected to indorse, is opposed to reading the Bible in our public schools, and he it was who filed a petition for an injunction before Judge Burton two or three years ago, asking him to restrain the teachers of Bloomfield from reading the Bible when they opened their schools, which injunction Judge Burton refused to grant. He would be a nice man indeed at the head of the public schools of the state.'"—Grinnell (Ia.) Herald. Concerning the foregoing rather foolish utterances, we can only remark that Mr. Moore's views on the Bible in public schools recommend him strongly to the place for which he has been nominated. No man holding opposit views is fit for the office. If the Greenback party always chose as wisely as in this instance, it would deserve better success than it has as yet achieved.

THE Indianapolis Sentinel, of a recent date, reports that the Ohio wing of the temperance party is fast splitting apart on the rock of politics. The larger wing has grown arrogant over the figure the prohibition cause has cut in politics, and has gone in for a hot campaign against the Republicans. The candidate for governor, the Rev. A. B. Leonard, declared in a speech here last night before 1,500 men and women, in the Tabernacle, that their first duty was to beat Foraker and the state ticket in Ohio this fall, and defeat the party at all times, because it was not prepared to bow down to the dictation of the Prohibitionists. In another hall the Cleveland Women's Christian Temperance Union met and passed a long series of resolutions declaring that, as the National Union had decided to aid the Prohibition party against the best interests of the temperance cause, its connection with the Ohio and National Women's Christian Temperance Union is to be henceforth severed. The Cleveland Union will go into the arena where the Reverend Leonard is at work, and try to lead the temperance workers of the state back to their legitimate work. Most of the real organizers of the great campaign for state Prohibition, two years ago, came from the Cleveland Union. Among those ladies of national reputation who are against political temperance work are Mrs. Ellen J. Foster and Jennie Duty.

ENORMOUS frauds in the accounts of the suspended Munster Bank, at Dublin, Ireland, hav been discovered. SENATOR AUGUSTUS VERA, of Italy, died at Naples a few days ago. He was a great Hegelian philosopher, and his philosophy was anti-Christian. ON the 23d of last month a band of about fifty gypsies landed at Castle Garden in this city from Bosnia, which is a part of northern Turkey in Europe. They were the dirtiest immigrants the commissioners had ever seen. They had trained bears, monkeys, musical instruments, and other attractions, which they purposed to display throughout the country to catch the unwary penny of the rural population. Judge Cullen has decided that the steamship company that brought them over will hav to take them back, as they are liable to become a county charge.

The wife bore it for eighteen months and then confided the story of her sufferings to her brother. When the matter became publicly known, Brantly was arrested, and one night last week a mob took him out of jail, hung him to the limb of a tree, and shot him full of holes. If the story of his crime is true, his fate was deserved. The law could hav imposed only a small fine and short sentence, which fact probably prompted the lynching.

The Development of Religion.

The article from Herbert Spencer, published not long ago in the Popular Science Monthly, entitled, "Religious Retrospect and Prospect," is, to me, the least satisfactory of all that hav proceeded from his august pen. Remembering the good, ancient authority that even Homer sometimes nods, I venture to say that there appears to me to be vagueness and confusion of ideas about it not unlike what attend the dreams in which its author thinks he finds the source of our belief in ghosts.

To illustrate what I mean, he, in effect, puts in the same category, and embraces with a deep identity, the emotion of the frightened ignorance, which, when the Northern Lights play, sees "war waged in the troubled sky," with banners, serried lance, and stain of blood, with what is awakened in the man of science at the same spectacle when the law of its sudden and varied changes baffles his scrutiny. Nay, he would make the philosopher who is struck with amazement at the revelations of geology concerning the age of the earth even more deeply religious in that emotion than the devoutest worshiper of the Mosaic cosmogony. Nothing less than this can he mean when he says (p. 350), "Science, under its concrete forms, enlarges the sphere of religious sentiment."

To giv the term "religion" any such wide interpretation as is here involved is in utter violation of that "good, customary use" which has long been held alone to establish the meaning of words, and, though it may be excused in the numerous pious writers who of late, getting ashamed, as it would seem, of religion in its simplicity, would fain associate with it morality, philosophy, and whatever else is of good report, is quite unworthy of the scientific reasoner.

There need be no great difficulty in getting at the nativ meaning of this word. As says the learned author of the Delphin edition of the classics: "Religio pro meter sumitur a veterebus." Philology itself confirms the interpretation, for, whether the word comes from re-lego—to reconsider—as Cicero thought, or from re-ligo—to tie back—as some other learned linguists have considered, it equally implies some influence that deters and hinders us from following the obvious path along which our senses and our reason solicit us. The meaning still holds good; some form of fear or apprehension concerning the unknown is still the inspiration of every form of piety, from the fetich-worship of the savage on the Congo to the adoration of the Host by assembled cardinals in the long-time capital of the civilized world. This is why the customary offerings at every altar hav been prayer, sacrifice, and privation, to appease an angry and avenging god. The classic pagans, it is true, had also festivals to Bacchus, Pomona, and other representativs of joy, but these were but the idle gayeties of a Fourth of July among ourselvs. The serious heart was not touched, nor the exercises of religion made a solemn business at Rome or Athens till when fire from angered Jove might touch the summit of the capitol, or birds of sinister wing alight on its entablature; just as among ourselvs today the regular services of the Sabbath hav become formal and perfunctory, or but supply an arena where respectability may assert or fashion display itself, leaving the religious soul unstirred till some professional revivalist comes along and threatens us anew with hell torments.

The only point in common between religion and science is that the provocation and study of them both is the ever-tempting field of the vast unknown. In the inspiration, aim, and path of their pursuit they are utterly diverse. The worshiper is moved by apprehension, his own safety is his chief aim, and acquiescence in the will of some superior power his law of duty; but it is the hunger of knowledge that impels the student of science, its augment is his aim, and an unwearied struggle against whatever enshrouds truth from his sight his willing destiny. The deep obscurity of things awakens in him no terror, but is only an enticement to their explanation. He looks upon the wonders of the sky above him, not with an anxious awe, but with admiring delight, and the fires beneath are a mere crucible to study and not a Gehenna to shudder at. Can "development" ever work such a transformation that this state of the spirit will deserve to be called religion? You may use what names you please, but things must remain forever different.

Indeed, for my own part, while I am a firm and thorough believer in Mr. Spencer's development, and consider that everything the most apparently casual is yet governed by unchanging law, I cannot help thinking that the attempt to bring the phenomena of religion, current or historic, into a systematic arrangement, or to set forth an established order of sequence between them, is altogether futil, and not unjustly exposes the undertaker to the ridicule which George Eliot in "Middlemarch" throws upon kindred endeavors. The start, succession, characteristics, and behavior of the innumerable forms of religious doctrin and disciplin hav been too various, disturbance and contingency too common, and the influence of sudden and original personality, that tertium quid among elemental powers, which Mr. Spencer is apt to overlook or belittle, too frequent and controling, for human intellect or industry to gather even the chief of them into a plan of nature. As well undertake to draw up a scheme of the Northern Lights, or frame a diagram of the clouds.

Owning the sole motiv of blind fear, and utterly ignoring the guidance of reason, as we constantly see, religion affords no field or foothold for philosophic inquiry. Its varying attitudes are as casual as the turn of a die, and as little within the scope of calculation. It is easy to understand and account for the origin of the several arts, of different forms of political government, and of whatever else has had human needs and intelligent purpose for its motiv; but the why and wherefore of Judaism, Mohammedanism, or Mormonism in the career of humanity, or the scheme of nature, is a mystery impenetrable, belonging to what Tennyson aptly calls "the hidden depths of personality."

Moreover, to comprehend the philosophy of a matter implies some power of prediction concerning its behavior—as we can now foresee with certainty that personal despotism in Europe is destined more and more to giv place to popular, and the telephone, from the hour of its invention, to play an important part among the methods of human intercourse—but would Mr. Spencer, sitting in Pilate's seat, hav felt in his all-comprehensiv and stirring brain any premonition that the subdued victim before him was destined to "turn the world upside down?" It may be said, to be sure, that we all feel able to prophesy that religion is destined to be greatly tempered in the future by the growth and spread of enlightenment; but this expectation in no way concerns the proper development, that is, the activ, automatic behavior of the religious sentiment, but only its passivity, or incapacity—as though we should foretell how a servant will yield observance to his master, or flowers be withered in a frost. It is a prophecy that relates to the nativ power and influence of knowledge, not to the activ forces of religion.

To descend to a topic of detail in Mr. Spencer's discussion, I cannot but consider his attribution of our belief in disembodied spirits—which, by the way, appears from all accounts to be the most constant among the most barbarous—to the testimony of dreams as far-fetched and unsatisfactory. For every man very early in life is sure to find out that the visions of the night are not at all to be trusted as evidence of any reality, past, present, or future. Accordingly they make little impression, even on the minds of children, the morning so constantly bringing their refutation. Thus it happens that though among ourselvs superstition is by no means extinct in all its forms, the study of dreams is as dead as that of witchcraft.

A better explanation of the wide-prevailing belief in ghosts appears to be found in the fact that to the unschooled mind it is hard to believe that the dead are dead. That what so long and so powerfully animated this familiar form, which now I find so still, but changed in no other way, has suddenly forever ceased to be, is too strange, and too perturbing to long habitude, to be at once and unhesitatingly accepted for a fact. Nor can even reason for a time make it seem such. Constantly our excited imagination re-creates his voice and his behavior in our ears and before our eyes. The creak of the door becomes the creak of his familiar footstep, and the bark of his dog the welcome of his returning presence. Add the awe that the aspect of death inspires, paralyzing the understanding. Such a frame of mind, which does not soon or easily altogether pass away, is ready to welcome any, the frailest, testimony that favors its own leaning—a baseless inference, a casual suggestion, or downright lie, from any quarter, or concerning any other case. The double influence of hope and apprehension lends its strengthening aid. This would seem to be a natural and sufficient explanation of the common belief in ghosts, a belief vastly invigorated among Christians by the undoubted apparition of Jesus after his supposed and apparent death.

As to what changes time may bring in the several attitudes of science and religion, it would be a metamorphosis stranger than any in Ovid if the one should droop its towering wings, and slip its never-daunted courage, to sit in the tabernacles of cowering devotion, or if the appetite of the other should so alter as to feed on sweet and solid realities instead of its ancient diet of fearful fancies. Only this can be safely looked for, that as the unsubdued spirit of science still more and more uncloses to light the realms of shade, the imaginations that hav lived in that murky precinct, little by little ousted of their freehold, will turn by degrees to a happier vocation. But to look, at least at any near day, for the entire dislodgment of fetichism, savage or cultured, would be too sanguin. The field of its occupation in the timid and unreasoning fancy of man is too wide, and the power of tradition, custom, and early education over our opinions, behavior, and professions too dominant.

Superstition has as many lives as a cat, and is as nimble. The last quarter of the last century saw it ousted from public recognition in France, and almost from respectability, and the same quarter saw it seat itself again there nigh as lively as before. So no small part of the same New England which long ago quit believing in the pinches of witches now listens devoutly to the rappings of the "spirits." Warfare against it is as thankless as it is tedious, and sometimes seems hopeless; but none the less is it the duty of everyone who recognizes in all history its constant baleful influence on the welfare of mankind, unredeemed by one essential benefit, to echo on every fit occasion the famous war-cry of its greatest enemy, "Ecrasez l'infame." Far more public respect than odium will be gained thereby, for a certain deep sympathy with the sentiment, not by any means all hidden, is fast pervading the general mind. The contrary endeavor of a certain set of philosophical writers to find some worthy element in all its various forms to make it the companion, as ally or handmaid, of the spirit of science, and to tool along its decaying influence, will prove as futil as it is unworthy. It is the nativ antagonist of truth and virtue, and must be constantly worsted in the scuffle.

Colonel Ingersoll on the Revision.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was corraled by a Record reporter this morning and asked if he had read the revised Testament. He replied, "Yes, but I don't believe the work has been fairly done. The clergy are not going to scrape the butter off their own bread. The clergy are offensiv partisans, and those of each denomination will interpret the scriptures their way. No Baptist minister would countenance a 'revision' that favored sprinkling, and no Catholic priest would admit that any version would be correct that destroyed the dogma of the 'real presence.' So I might go through all the denominations."

"Why was the word sheol introduced in place of hell, and how do you like the substitute?"

"The civilized world has outgrown the vulgar and brutal hell of their fathers and founders of the churches. The clergy are ashamed to preach about sulphurous flames and undying worms. The imagination of the world has been developed, the heart has grown tender, and the old dogma of eternal pain shocks all civilized people. It is becoming disgraceful either to preach or believe in such a beastly lie. The clergy are beginning to think that it is hardly manly to frighten children with a detected falsehood. Sheol is a great relief. It is not so hot as the old place. The nights are comfortable and the society is quite refined. The worms are dead, and the air reasonably free from noxious vapors. It is a much worse word to hold a revival with, but much better for everyday use. It will hardly take the place of the old word when people step on tacks, put up stoves, or sit on pins; but for use at church fairs and mite societies it will do about as well. We do not need revision; excision is what we want. The barbarism should be taken out of the Bible. Passages upholding polygamy, wars of extermination, slavery, and religious persecution should not be attributed to a perfect God. The good that is in the Bible will be saved for man, and man will be saved from the evil that is in that book. Why should we worship in God what we detest in man?"

"Do you think the use of the word sheol will make any difference to the preachers?"

"Of course it will make no difference with Talmage. He will make sheol just as hot and smoky and uncomfortable as hell, but his congregation will laugh instead of tremble. The old shudder has gone. Beecher had demolished hell before sheol was adopted. According to his doctrin of 'Evolution,' hell has been slowly growing cool. The cindered souls do not even perspire. Sheol is nothing to Mr. Beecher but a new name for an old mistake. As to the effect it will hav on Heber Newton, I cannot tell; neither can he, until he asks his bishop. There are people who believe in witches and madstones and fiat money, and centuries hence it may be that people will exist who will believe as firmly in hell as Dr. Shedd does now."

"What about Beecher's sermons on Evolution?"

"Beecher's sermons on Evolution will do good. Millions of people believe that Mr. Beecher knows at least as much as the other preachers, and if he regards the atonement as a dogma with a mistake for a foundation, they may conclude that the whole system is a mistake. But whether Beecher is mistaken or not, people know that honesty is a good thing, that gratitude is a virtue, that industry supports the world, and that whatever they believe about religion they are bound by every conceivable obligation to be just and generous. Mr. Beecher can no more succeed in reconciling science and religion than he could in convincing the world that triangles and circles are exactly the same. There is the same relation between science and religion that there is between astronomy and astrology, between alchemy and chemistry, between orthodoxy and common sense."

"Hav you read the reports from London about the recent exposures of vice?"

"I hav never read the Pall Mall Gazette. If the charges are made in good faith, the editor is in the right. Virtue does not liv on ignorance, and vice flourishes in the dark. All the guilty parties will object to the publication, but I see no reason why good people should. If the charges are true they ought to hav been published. I know, in a general way, what the acts are claimed to be, and nothing could be more horrible."

"Hav you read Miss Cleveland's book? She condemns George Eliot's poetry on the ground that it has no faith in it, nothing beyond. Do you imagin she would condemn Burns or Shelley for that reason?"

"I hav not read Miss Cleveland's book, but if the author condemns the poetry of George Eliot, she has made a mistake. There is no poem in our language more beautiful than 'The Lovers,' and none loftier or purer than 'The Choir Invisible.' There is no poetry in the 'beyond.' The poetry is here—here in this world, where love is in the heart. The poetry of the beyond is too far away, a little too general. Shelley's skylark was in our sky, the daisy of Burns grew on our ground, and between that lark and that daisy is room for all the real poetry of the earth."

Facts and Fallacies of the New Testament.

HEAVEN.

But to return to heaven. The twenty-seventh chapter of Exodus tells us of the heavenly altar of burnt offering, seven feet six inches each way; with pan to receive the ashes; shovels, basins, and flesh-hooks (verse 3); linen curtains one hundred and fifty feet long; fifty-three pillars of silver with sockets of brass (Ex. xxvii, 9–19). That all these things actually exist in heaven, did so in the days of Moses, and do exist to this day in heaven, where God and Christ are, we hav text after text—the most emphatic "thus saith the Lord." It is declared by Moses, David, and Isaiah, in the Old Testament, repeated and insisted on by Stephen, Paul, John, and Christ himself, in the New Testament.

David, inspired of God, declares not alone the existence of a real sanctuary or tabernacle in heaven, but that God's dwelling-place is between the cherubim (Ps. lxxx, 1; xcix, 1; cii, 19; Isa. xxxvii, 16; Ex. xxv, 22, 40).

The New Testament confirms all this. The martyr Stephen, a man full of faith and the Holy Ghost, declares:

"Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen. But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God and Jesus standing on the right hand of God" (Acts vii, 44, 45).

Paul declares: "We hav such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens. A minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man" (Heb. viii, 1, 2). We read that John was permitted to take a stroll around heaven, and he saw the real, genuin, original seven candlesticks: "And being turned I saw seven golden candlesticks, and in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the son of man" (Rev. i, 12, 13).

He saw the altar of incense and the golden censer and fire on the altar:

"And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne" (Rev. viii, 3).

He saw the ark—the real original:

"And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament" (Rev. xi, 19).

"And thou shalt put the mercy seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall giv thee. And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat, from between the two cherubim which are upon the ark of the testimony" (Ex. xxv, 21, 22).

"And look that thou make them after their pattern which was showed thee in the mount" (verse 40).

Priests and ministers are paid to tell us all about heaven. They hav not done so; they hav been obtaining money under false pretenses.

However reluctant they may be to admit it, or acknowledge such a Materialistic heaven, with its ark, curtains of linen, skin of animals, pillars, boards, candlesticks, lamps, snuffers, ash-pans, and flesh-hooks, Old and New Testament alike declare it, and that Christ is now officiating as high priest in that sanctuary in heaven.

Many a poor, heart-broken woman, wife of a miserable drunkard, longs for heaven. No more leading kind, generous hearts to vice through treating and drinking there. She wonders how the all-wise, ever-loving, heavenly father could hav sanctioned it here:

"He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth; and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart" (Psalms civ, 15).

"Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more" (Prov. xxxi, 6, 7).

But ministers assure her that since that day heaven has adopted prohibition, and so there will be no treating, no drinking in heaven. Yet Jesus declared:

"But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my father's kingdom" (Matt. xxvi, 29).

So there will be treating and wine-drinking in heaven. Jesus himself says so.

Many a poor, worn, and weary wife and mother, heartsick of dreary household drudgery, and monotonous round of duties, meals to cook, dishes to wash, bread to bake, longs for heaven, where there is no bread to bake, no emptyings to sour. "Ah!" she sighs, "thank God, there will be none of that in heaven." But there will if the Bible is true:

"Beloved is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of heaven" (Luke xiv, 15).

"And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my father hath appointed unto me. That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke xxii, 29, 30).

"And thou shalt set upon the table shewbread before me always" (Ex. xxv, 30).

"And thou shalt take fine flour and bake twelve cakes thereof: two tenth deals shall be in one cake. And thou shall set them in two rows, six in a row, upon the pure table before the Lord" (Lev. xxiv, 5, 6).

"Glad there will be no dishes to wash when I get to heaven," says the young girl. Sorry, but there will:

"And thou shalt make the dishes thereof, and spoons thereof, and covers thereof, and bowls" (Ex. xxv, 29).

"And look that thou make them after their pattern which was showed thee in the mount" (Ex. xxv, 40).

"There won't be any nasty, greasy candles to make or lamps to clean, dirty old snuffer-trays to empty; nothing of that kind in heaven." Sorry again, but the Bible says there will:

"And thou shalt make the seven lamps thereof; and they shall light the lamps thereof, that they may giv light over against it. And the tongs thereof, and the snuff dishes thereof" (Ex. xxv, 37, 38).

"I know the Bible says there are lots of linen curtains, but they will be always clean. In heaven all is purity. There can nothing that needs cleaning enter there. No dirt in heaven. Oh, I long for heaven, where I can enjoy rest and not hav to be everlastingly fighting dirt!" says the good housewife. The Bible says heaven needs cleaning:

"Yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight" (Job xv, 15).

"It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these, but the heavenly things themselvs with better sacrifices than these" (Heb. ix, 23).

There is dyeing curtains and ram and badger skins, weaving linen and alpaca. Then for men there is catching badgers, butchering rams, tanning, carpentering, brass founding; gold-beaters, wick-snuffers, lamps, candlesticks to make, and last, not least, flesh-hooks.

Mark well! We are taught God is unchangeable, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. The Jews hav ceased to offer their continual burnt offerings, but God is not to be deprived of his "sweet smelling savor," and so he has an altar of burnt offering with flesh-hooks, pans, etc., in heaven (Ex. xxvii, 1–3).

"And look that thou make them after their pattern which was shewed thee in the mount" (Ex. xxv, 40).

How rash are the members of the National Liberal League! They would stop president and governors from appointing Thanksgiving days; yet who knows, if the Bible is true, what terrible calamity we are spared, not by the thanks, prayers, or praise of Christians, but by the roasting of the Thanksgiving turkey, its savory smell ascending to heaven? The smell of roast beef and chickens is and ever has been pleasing to the Lord, and to his servants, the preachers:

"And Noah builded an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And the Lord smelled a sweet savor, and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake" (Gen. viii, 20, 21).

Who knows what dreadful curses are spared us by those heavenly flesh-hooks being kept constantly to work?

The one grand incentiv to attain heaven is the hope to be reunited and dwell forever with our loved and lost. Take away this hope, and women, the last stay, the main support, of the church, would forsake it. Being reunited to the love of the dear departed is the grand hope held out to become devout Christians, yet Jesus himself declares there is no human love in heaven. The Sadducees asked Jesus, If a woman hav seven husbands, in heaven whose wife shall she be? Jesus answered:

"In the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. xxii, 30).

Here is the plainest possible, the most positiv, declaration that there is no human love in heaven, that angels were never fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, or children; that in heaven there will be no more love for husband or wife than for any other saint—nay, not so much as for the pious Charles Guiteau or holy Jesse James, for Jesus tells us there is more joy in heaven over the arrival of one sinner than over ninety-nine that need no repentance (Luke xv, 7).

We sing and talk of our loved ones having gone to be angels, being pure as an angel, innocent as an angel. The comparison is odious. Angels are not pure or holy or innocent. We read in 1. Kings xxii, 20–22, how they wilfully lie, and in 2 Kings xix, 35, how ready they are to murder men in the night. We read:

"And it came to pass that night that the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred fourscore and five thousand. And when they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses."

Revelation is full of their horrible, wicked, and destructiv doings—maiming, torturing, and killing poor human creatures who never injured them. Who with human sympathies would desire to dwell in heaven with such cruel beings to love, instead of near and dear ones of earth? Heaven is filled with the vilest miscreants of earth if Christian theories are correct. They assert that none is so acceptable to heaven as the worst of sinners. Priests and ministers assure the vilest criminals, the most brutal murderers, of prompt admittance to heaven and eternal bliss, and dispatch them, by way of the hangman, direct from the gallows to glory. Who could hope for joy, love, and happiness in such company? Who could love or be happy in the society of angels who delight in pouring out vials of wrath, unmixed with one drop of mercy, upon all mankind? We hav too much of this spirit in God's chosen ministers here.

But the Bible declares heaven is not at all a quiet, peaceful, or even a safe place. We read in 2 Sam. xxii, 8, that the foundations of heaven shake when God gets wroth! There was war in heaven:

"And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels" (Rev. xii, 7).

What is to prevent another rebellion? Was not God just as powerful then as now? Was not heaven just as holy then as now? If war broke out among the angels before heaven was so filled with earthly villains and miscreants, why should it not again? What kind of love can be in that heart that can look down into sheol and witness the horrible sufferings of its loved ones of earth, and then try to drown the wail of agony of the damned by singing hosannahs to the loving, ever-merciful, heavenly father?

Gentle reader, do you wish part in such a heaven? Could you bow in adoration and shout songs of glory to a being who, for no possible good purpose, for no other reason than the gratification of fiend-like malignity and hate, would cause and continue such scenes of horror?

We cannot lament that the Bible declares heaven itself, and all the host, shall be burnt up at last:

"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree" (Isa. xxxiv, 4).

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat" (2 Peter iii, 10, 12).

Christians expatiate on the superiority of faith over works, and that we can only be saved by the former and not by the latter, meaning that belief in creeds and church dogmas takes precedence over useful lives and works of benevolence, kindness, and love. We, on the contrary, hold that acts of kindness, goodness, and benevolence outrank faith, and that it matters little what a man believes, so that he does what is just and right.

In the language of the heroic, noble, and lamented founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER: "How excellent is the practice of virtue and how commendable in every sense of the word is a life of morality! They are the sources, and the only sources, whence are derived peace of mind, happiness, and contentment. It is a great consolation to know that acts of kindness and love produce the same happy results whether performed by those of much or little faith, Christians or Infidels."

Let us discard the barbarous teachings of a degraded, barbarous people, and instead of talking about being cleansed by being washed in the blood of a mythical savior, shed on an imaginary cross, after he was already dead, let us seek real purification in the clear, beautiful, living stream of knowledge; cleanse ourselvs from errors of life as well as errors of faith, and, instead of obeying the arbitary exactions of Christian priests and ministers, in hope to attain the Bible heaven, with its slaughtered rams, badger-skins, altar of sacrifice, flesh-hooks, candlesticks, and snuffers—all relics of barbarism of the past—let us seek to promote the happiness of all around us, and make for ourselvs, here and now, an Eden paradise—a heaven of every home. Instead of cringing in abject fear at the altar of ignorance, let us worship only at the shrine of reason, science, and truth.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

NO CONTEMPORARY NOTICE OF JESUS.—The writers of the first century were all silent as to the contemporary existence of such a man as Jesus. Philo, Pliny, Justus, and Josephus hav not so much as named Jesus Christ, nor one of his apostles, nor noted any of the wonderful events narrated by the gospel writers. Something had to be done to supply the omission, and in an uncritical age, when forgeries were ripe, the remedy was at hand.—Anti-christ.

Mr. Beecher.

The press of the country, THE TRUTH SEEKER included, puts forth—and justly—sundry sharp thrusts at Mr. Beecher's recent series of discourses on Evolution and Christianity, wherein the latter continues what for some years past has seemed to be his favorit employment of putting new wine into old bottles.

Now, this putting of the new wine into old bottles, though not by any means the best work a man could put his time and talent to, is perhaps better than not to handle it at all; since by attending upon and observing the ingenious process, now and then one who would not otherwise secure it may get a taste of the new wine.

It is unaccountably strange, however, that Mr. Beecher, with his acknowledged sagacity, does not see how futil must be all his efforts to accomplish the end at which he seems to be driving. Although quite apparent to others, the Plymouth pastor seems wholly oblivious to the fact that if he is succeeding at all, it is in reconciling evolution, not with Christianity as through a thousand years of life and activity it has crystallized into a well-defined system, and, as such, is universally apprehended and understood, but with Christianity as revamped and reconstructed by Mr. Beecher.

This final and great effort (by himself so-called) of Mr. Beecher's long and industrious ministry, however impotent it may seem to himself and to a small band of ready followers, can hav, in the direction intended, no permanent influence with the great majority of thoughtful people either in or out of the church. It may do this, however: call attention to and in some measure emphasize the fact of the utter irreconcilability of the antagonistic systems, evolution and Christianity; and this, though not intended, is in itself a good and desirable result, and worth all the time and thought the great preacher has given to these late discourses. Miss Wixon Among the Mediums.

In answer to numerous inquiries, and which I hav not time to answer individually, I would say that I am doing my best to get at the "bottom facts" of the Spiritual philosophy by giving it a candid, earnest, and impartial investigation. I am having seances with the so-called best and most powerful mediums. My sitting with J. V. Mansfield was not satisfactory—that is, my questions were not answered at all. I will giv one instance. I asked my father, if it should be he who would answer my letter, to tell me one or more of the given names of our family. A simple thing to do, yet he, who in this life never refused a request of so simple a character, or, indeed, of any character relating to my interest or happiness, utterly failed to grant so slight a desire as that above mentioned, knowing, if he livs and was present at the interview, that it would hav afforded me infinit satisfaction.

At the same time, I must say that I do not think Mansfield read, except by some subtle instinct, my question, it being folded and sealed securely, and neither the letter, nor himself, leaving my presence. It is evidently true that the mind has power to read manuscript without the aid of the outward vision, but that "the spirit postmaster," as Mansfield is called, can tell more than he knows himself, I do not believe.

My interview with Henry Slade was not more satisfactory, although I am not able to account for the writing that appeared upon the slate—two messages, one in French, and the other in English, and neither by anyone that I ever heard of before. But because I am not able to account for the performance is no reason I should say it was a specimen of spirit handiwork. Nor will I say it was not, only that I do not know, and it does not appear either plausible or probable that it was the work of spirits. While at this sitting something touched my limbs on the farther side from Slade. I thought it might hav been his foot, and I calmly asked him if it was his foot that touched me. He was quite indignant at the question, though it did not seem to me there was sufficient cause.

For the first time in my life, I attended a seance for materialization of spirit-forms, at Mrs. Fay's. It was with some awe that I took my seat, but it was not long before that feeling melted before the presence of a hundred different "spirits," men, women, and children, who appeared one after another in a light so dim and misty that one could not distinguish his dearest friend. One appeared for me, but could not tell her name! Perhaps I am wrong, but I could not feel that I was at any time during the evening in the presence of those who had once lived on earth and departed for the unknown shore to return again in such a shape.

With Mrs. Beste my experience was not different. Objects purporting to be "spirits" came and sang, whispered, lectured, etc. Voices were heard, deep and resonant, and anon gentle and child-like. Ventriloquism could do all in that line that was done that night. There was no light whatever, even the light of the moon and stars being excluded by black cambric nailed before the windows, the illuminated garments of the "spirits" making the only light on the subject that was afforded. To my mind there was not evidence sufficient to warrant the idea of the appearance of a single spirit outside of the medium, though, viewed as a performance, an entertainment, it was quite clever, though its length was objectionable. However, others believe when I disbelieve. I advise all to go and see for themselvs, and the mediums mentioned are called as good as any in that line.

At Mrs. Maud Lord's seance I did receive some tests that were unlooked for. I went a stranger, unknown to all present. I was touched several times during the evening by little fingers, apparently, that I was unable to grasp or hold, for they seemed to melt as I touched them.

I was addressed as daughter by what purported to be my father, who told me some facts that I had forgotten. He called me by my original name, Mary, which I bore till five or six years of age, a circumstance that I had quite forgotten for the time being.

Other matters were told me that I may not mention here, and which I consider as somewhat remarkable, but whether they came to me through or by means of spirit power, I am not yet prepared to say. I am still investigating the phenomena, but, so far, hav had the best results through the mediumship of Mrs. Lord. She herself is a very bright and attractiv woman, and her seances are characterized by a spirit of quiet harmony that is very agreeable.

Found Dying.

A MISERABLE DEATH.

In Leominister, last week Wednesday, an unknown man was discovered by the roadside unconscious, and fast sinking. A pint bottle about a quarter full of whisky, and an empty laudanum bottle, told the story. He died soon after his removal to the station-house. He was about sixty years of age, decently dressed, and apparently an American. In a coat pocket was found a letter written with a lead pencil, which was inclosed in a white envelope, and addressed, "To whom it may concern," and was as follows: "Out of money, and out of health. I hav worked all my life since I was ten years old, so I don't owe the world a great amount. I hope you will forgiv me for the trouble I cause you, for I could go no farther. I cannot beg, so I take the shortest way out of trouble. Make as short and cheap a job as you can of it, but do not put me under ground until you are sure I am dead. There will be no use in asking who I am, for I do not wish anyone to know. I belong many miles from here. Again I ask your forgivness, and bid the world good-bye. I expect eternal sleep. I hav done my best to do unto others as I would that they should do unto me."

The above item I cut from a local paper printed in Massachusetts. It deserves more than a passing notice. The heartlessness of its caption, "A Miserable Death," induces comment. We cannot think that a miserable ending when, after fighting a battle for existence sixty years, weary, worn, and exhausted, this man surrenders a life forced upon him. It was a miserable beginning—a beautiful ending. Let us quote his dying recorded words; we must presume them true in the absence of any knowledge to the contrary. Dying words are deemed the best evidence in public tribunals, and we must think it so in this instance. "Out of money, out of health." Out of money is bad, but couple that with an expiring vitality, without a home, and the case is indeed deplorable. We may call him a dead coward, but unable to work he could no longer be a living hero. His condition, when found, supports his written declarations.

"Decently dressed"—he had not lost his self-respect. Sixty years of age, his days had not been lessened by vices. Had he possessed an appetite for strong drinks, he would hav followed the injunctions of the Bible (Proverbs xxxi,7)—"drank and forgotten his poverty, and remembered his misery no more." He would not hav left a "quarter of a pint of whisky untouched by his side." "I hav worked all my life since I was ten years old, so I don't owe the world much." No! on the contrary the world owed him. His productiv capacity must hav been greater than his consumptiv powers. The world had absorbed his surplus, which, when unable to longer labor, would hav carried him to the end of his vitality.

"I hope you will forgiv me for the trouble I cause you, for I could go no further." Such sensitivness could not ask help. Hear him: "I cannot beg, so I take the shortest way out of trouble." He would not prolong his misery; he preferred to end it.

This stranger would hav preferred life; despair made him seek death. The cancer of poverty was in his throat. He could swallow—he could get nothing to swallow. Hence, Spartan-like, the hemlock to remove the desire and necessity. There were other reasons than his sensitivness why he could not beg. To seek employment on the road, asking for food, in Massachusetts is crime. He could not commit crime. Suicide is also a crime in Massachusetts, but that is only when it is not a success. "Make as short and cheap a job as you can of it, but do not put me under ground until you are sure I am dead." How thoughtful! He knew the spot where he was to be buried had been anticipated—the paupers's corner in the graveyard of Leominster. He also might hav thought one in the millions had been buried alive; he didn't wish to be that one; hence his request in view of the mourners being hurried. He need hav had no anxiety about his burial. He would hav been buried not for his sake, but for the sake of that society of whose creation he was.

"There will be no use in asking who I am; I do not wish anyone to know." How thoughtful for those he loved! Hav they in the past been so thoughtful of him? "I expect eternal sleep." He might hav formed his conclusions from the progress of science during his period, or from Ecclesiastes iii, 22: "Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his own works, for that is his portion; for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?" But whatever his opinions may hav been, to him they were sacred. "Eternal sleep!"—what a joy it must hav been to him, freed from toil for an existence! How many mornings during his long life had he awakened from his previous day's toil, and wished the night had been a little longer! How sweet to think that last long night had come when he could not be awakened to his unrequited labor again!

"A miserable death!" Can that be a miserable death when we lie down on the bosom of our mother, the earth, in the soft summer eve of July, under the canopy of the blue sky, with the gentle breezes of old Wachusett fanning our brow, singing its sweet lullaby? No, it was a beautiful death.

Yes, and we can fancy the low murmurings of the dying stranger by the wayside as life was ebbing:

And now my pulse is ceasing,
And hands and feet grow cold,
And death, my colors fleecing,
Prepare me for the mold.

"O grave, where is thy victory?
O death, where is thy sting?"
The grave is but a bed to me
And death my waiting wing.

GEORGE M. DAVENPORT.

Snowflakes from Snowville.

Variety may be the spice of life, but we hav rather more of this spice than we covet when it brings cold winds and creeping chills up one's back way down here in Dixie in July.

But as we cannot alter, correct, or amend the weather, we must e'en make the best of the inevitable, if we do it by sitting in the kitchen by the cook-stove, so that we may benefit from the conserved heat that the trees hav gathered from the rays of Old Sol during their growth. Yes, even this box of stove-wood here by my side may say as you or I would say:

"I am the acme of things accomplished,
And an incloser of things to be."

All that was in the past united in bringing what is in the present. As the tree is "the acme of things accomplished" so far as vegetation is concerned, so is man the "acme of things accomplished" when we consider the animal world. And once again to quote from the "good gray poet:

My feet strike an apex of the apices of the stairs,
On every step bunches of ages,
And larger bunches between the steps,
All below duly traveled, and still I mount and mount.
Rise after rise bow the phantoms behind me,
Afar down I see the huge first Nothing, I know I was even there.
I waited unseen and always, and slept through the lethargic mist,
And took my time, and took no hurt from the fetid carbon.

. . . . . .

All forces hav been steadily employed to complete and delight me,
Now on this spot I stand with my robust soul.

All is quiet and no special news stirring, or if there is, it comes not to our little home-world.

To-morrow is the glorious Fourth, but one would never dream of it here. Not the fizz of a cracker or a preparation is going on to show that it is to be a holiday; nor will it be so.

The weather is very dry and windy, and gardens and growing things suffer for rain.

Snowville is bright and gay with sunny faces and girlish forms, making glad and joyous our quiet little village. Many are rusticating here as country boarders and visitors from the cities, trying to find health, rest, and recreation among our mountains.

Oh the gleesome saunter over fields and hill-sides!
The leaves and flowers of the commonest weeds,
The exquisit smell of the earth at day-break
The moist, fresh stillness of the woods,
And all through the forenoon.

E. D. SLENKER.

Why is This Thus?

What is the matter with the Banner and the Offering? When the Freethought paper admits to its columns both sides of a question, why a cry like this which the Offering emits and the Banner echoes? Has not THE TRUTH SEEKER (and the Investigator also) given the Spiritualists as fair a show as it has the Materialists? Hav the former been muzzled more than hav the latter?

Aside from the New Thought, what Spiritualistic paper allows its opponents, or, rather, the opponents of Spiritualism, anything like the chance that Spiritualists hav in the papers that the Banner and the Offering seem to look upon as enemies?

MASON, MICH.—Lack of judgment in appointing time, and inability to personall y attend to advertising, etc., by the party who induced us to take Tent to this place, added to delay of freight train with our Tent, and it being race week, made comparativ failure of our efforts in Mason. Yet a very large num. ber of our best periodicals were given to people really interested, and a large number of books and pamphlets were sold, half of it a good deal below cost, but it will pay in the near future.

Mr. J. B. Worden came three miles to every lecture. He had never before heard a lecture on Secularism. He is rejoicing in the truth and at the good work done. His wife and family are Salvation Armyists, but he hopes to induce them to read Liberal literature, and after a little get them so far Liberalized as to permit him to read THE TRUTH SEEKER in his own home in peace. He looks to the Liberal press as his savior, so his faith is well founded.

Many others expressed gladness at hearing of Liberalism; nearly all were astonished and delighted as we laid the facts before them, and expounded the beauties of the ennobling Gospel of Humanity, and urged their individual study and investigation.

Mr. H. Wixon walked over six miles every night, after hard days' work in the harvest-field, inducing others to accompany him. Poor in this world's goods, he is rich in hope and confidence of the grand triumph of universal mental liberty, and in a helpmate in full sympathy with him.

Several came three and four miles. We are hopeful, despite discouraging financial results, that our effort at Mason was in all else a success. Certain it is that it awoke quite a number to earnest thought and careful reading. Mr. Arthur Tilney, our efficient helper, won golden opinions from all sorts of people by his geniality and courtesy to all attending, and induced many to attend to listen to his artistic rendering of choice gems of song.

We take two days of needed rest; open at Owosso Wednesday, July 29th, under the auspices of Geo. H. Bedford, one of the most energetic, intelligent, and enterprising citizens of this section, an outspoken, live Liberal, deservedly respected of all classes—the only TRUTH SEEKER subscriber in Owosso. We are confident of a good time, and determined to win a grand success.

INSOLENT DOMINEERING OF THE CHURCH—A MOST EXEMPLARY CITIZEN THREATENED WITH PROSECUTION FOR ATTENDING TO HIS OWN BUSINESS ON HIS OWN FARM ON HOLY SUNDAY—NEED OF UNION AMONG LIBERALS—"ETERNAL VIGILANCE THE PRICE OF LIBERTY!"

The following letters tell their own story. Liberals are too apt, because they do not at the moment themselvs suffer from the irritating, insolent dictation of the church, to regard it as altogether unnecessary to giv of their time, influence, or means to insure efficient organization and sustain the National Liberal League.

How many timid but honest hearts are slaves to priestly tyranny—forced to servil obedience to rites and ceremonies they at heart despise!

Let every Liberal rally. The spirit that instituted the Inquisition is not dead. The serpent is coiled, and only waits opportunity to dart on its unprotected victims.

"I admire your answer. Pursue the even tenor of your way. If they do arrest you, telegraph me. The National Liberal League will defend you in your just rights. The Prehistoric Cross.

Long before the Romans, long before the Etruscans, there lived in the plains of Northern Italy a people to whom the cross was a religious symbol, the sign beneath which they laid their dead to rest; a people of whom history tells nothing, knowing not their name; but of whom antiquarian research has learned this, that they lived in ignorance of the arts of civilization, that they dwelt in villages built on platforms over lakes, and that they trusted in the cross to guard, and may be to revive, their loved ones whom they committed to the dust.—*Rev. News and Notes.

Concerning the aggressiv purpose of the Albany Convention to move at once upon the works of the enemy, and demand justice in the halls of legislation, we hav the following vigorous words from the activ president of the Albany Liberal Association:

"ALBANY, June 26, 1885.

"DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I think this should be one of the most important matters for the Convention to emphasize with all the boldness and determination to which words can giv power of expression.

"It will not do to be continually tickling a cancer with a straw. It must be cut out. The exemption of church property from taxation is contrary to the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, and also contrary to, and incompatible with, the whole spirit of our national Constitution.

"Guizot, the great French historian, says in his 'History of Civilization' that 'every great idea that has been born into the world in modern times has been born in France, or after its birth in some other country it has had to come to France to be fully elaborated and finished.' Now, may there not be some truth in this statement of the great French scholar and bistorian? The French Republic is not fourteen years old, yet see the unparalleled progress that Liberalism has made in that country in this short space of time. I hav always had the patriotic hope that our own country would be the teacher of the nations of the earth, but if France makes the same progress in the next fourteen years that she has in the fourteen that are drawing to a close, I am afraid that the United States will not be the advance guard of civilization. It is a singular fact that the only country in the world where the worst form of superstition is allowed an unlimited field in which to operate, and ply all all of its various modes of deception, is the very country whose political institutions it assails and condemns. If fraud can thus with brazen front assail our institutions, where is the Freethinker so meek and lowly and so time-serving as to fail to let his voice be heard in honest protest against the rank injustice of the legal exemption of property from taxation simply because superstition is taught on the premises? We do not expect to accomplish all the objects we hav in view through the agency of our few Radical journals and public speakers. We must organize societies, and demonstrate a gallant, agggressiv spirit.

"We are in favor of the protection of all the sacred rights of liberty and property, but no property must be too sacred to pay for the protection it receives. If the people in this country who sit down and growl about the many injustices that a barbarous superstitious sentiment has heaped upon the shoulders of toiling humanity would now make a grand rally for the cause, victory would certainly crown our efforts. Superstition in all its ramifications is now gathering for the final defense. Theology has gone down before the keen edge of the scientific scythe, but the spoilsmen are entrenching themselvs behind the fortress of ignorance and innocence. As we pass through the streets of any city or large village, our ears are assailed by the can-can instruments of the Salvation Army, or some agent of the Young Men's Christian Association asking us to go to their rooms and hear some windy exhorter talk about a God, soul, heaven, etc., that he knows no more about than a brickbat.

"Theological seminaries are built and endowed, and young men are educated, or rather trained systematically to become public impostors. These young men receive, at their ordination, a guarantee that they will be taken care of, and will never come to want as long as they continue to be impostors. But should they see fit at any time to hearken to the voice of a manly conscience, their means of livelihood are taken away.

"Many a brave minister who could not afford to see his family in need of the common comforts of life has been doomed by the accident of the profession that he or somebody else chose for him, to liv a life of lingering torture. Many a talented and high-minded priest has been compelled to liv in the most abject mental slavery under the imperious exactions of tyrannical bishops. And even in those churches where heresy is not condemned by high ecclesiastical courts, the ignorance and emotional nature of the common herd must be nursed and pandered to, so that even in the field of religious latitudinarianism the honestly-disposed minister of the so-called gospel is sometimes compelled to submit to a fate that is worse than 'sheol.'

"Now, we are charged with the duty of liberating the priests from the mental toils that surround their path, and also to liberate the people from the shackles of slavish superstition. There are enough Freethinkers in this country to accomplish this result in the very near future, if they will only come out boldly and put their shoulder to the wheel. Therefore, when we meet in Convention let no time be lost. The great army of young Freethinkers are ready to join us if we show that we are harmoniously aggressiv, that we know who the enemies of mankind are, and that we do not fail to denounce every fraudulent advantage that organized priestcraft is continually taking in trying to shape legislation, state and municipal, for their own protection and aggrandizement.

"Our platform is comprehensiv enough for all Liberal-minded people to stand upon. Let the order go forth from the Convention that we hav come to stay and to put down all injustice, and when the smoke and dust of the conflict hav settled, then, and not till then, will we begin to canonize the pioneers in the cause of human progress. The bold spirits who faced the jeers and taunts of ignorant fanaticism and eloquent hypocrisy will then receive the crown of immortality—immortality here in this world. Yours truly, J. J. MCCABE."

Our good friend Edward Ross, of Montezuma, N. Y., whose noble and pathetic struggle with superstitious tyranny during the past year is remembered by all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with feelings of sympathy and triumph, writes as follows:

"MONTEZUMA, N. Y., July 27, 1885.

"FRIEND PUTNAM: Inclosed find four dollars for tickets to Albany Convention for Charles Traver and wife, myself and wife. I am taking a deep interest in the fast-growing cause of Freethought, and am constantly arousing in my locality inquiry into and after the principles of which you are a representativ and champion, and which in thunder tones this great Convention will enunciate and proclaim to the world. The people here are becoming more and more Liberalized day by day, and more especially on the subject of church taxation and exemptions by statute of the clergy, and many expressions of assent to taxing church and priest can be had from those heretofore opposed to or unaccquainted with the present unequal and iniquitous system of taxation and exemptions. I want a blank petition mailed to me, and I hav no doubt of obtaining a goodly number of names to it. Brother Traver and myself hav had an uphill fight here, the whole power of the church having been hurled against us relentlessly, and from which we hav escaped unhurt, excepting an insignificant injury to my business. This feeling is fast being obliterated by a persistent and persevering warfare, and by a free and voluntary circulation of Liberal literature. I am well pleased with the prospects of success of the Convention, and hope that every nook and corner of the United States will be represented. By a large attendance, a plain, comprehensiv statement of our cause, the legislature will take cognizance of our claims, and long-standing and iniquitous laws will be expunged from our statute books, or amended to conform to a sense of right and justice, and an advance step hav been made in the right direction for a wider and enduring separation of church and state. Ye men and women of brains and tongue, ye workers, push on the works! EDWARD ROSS."

Canada also comes wheeling into line. Our gallant and cheerful comrade, John Ray, of Welland, Ontario, writes:

"FRIEND PUTNAM: "I hav been with you at the last three Conventions, and hav had pretty good times, and shall be pleased to meet you and my many other friends at Albany. I am in my eightieth year. I expect some of our Welland friends will be there also, and I hope for the success of the Convention.

"Ever your friend, JOHN RAY."

Our glorious veteran, Horace Seaver, will be with us in Convention, and an army of Liberals will giv him a mighty welcome. He says this, in reply to a certain criticism:

"We think P. is about right in setting us down for a short speech, if any, at the Albany Convention. We are a great admirer of short speeches, and agree in this with Franklin, who said that ten minutes were long enough to talk at a meeting if a man had anything to say, and too long if he hadn't. Of course this refers to ordinary individuals, and not to lecturers and essayists—

"Larger ships may venture more,
But little boats should keep the shore."

Short addresses are most important in a Convention of this sort. A world of meaning, of power, and of influence can be put into a twenty-minute speech. It is sometimes a brilliant, burning focus, wherein some vital thought is uttered that more than anything else expresses the heart of the Convention. It was by such an address as this that Ingersoll flamed to world-wide recognition.

We need elaborate lectures, clear and profound expositions of some great and leading truth, but we need also bright, extemporaneous, rattling speeches of fifteen or twenty minutes, that will set our hearts on fire. It is a grand gift to be able to make a short address every word of which is like a lightning-stroke. Such a speech as this Horace Seaver can make every time, and what he says will be one of the most inspiring utterances of the Convention, and one of the rarest treats that Liberals of to-day can enjoy.

"B. F. W.," Greenfield, writes in Investigator: "I hope all who can will be sure to attend the Albany Freethinkers' Convention in September. It should be a great gathering, and with the talent that will be there, the meetings cannot fail to be of a superior quality. Pass the word along the whole line, and let us see if we can't bring out such a host of heretics as will make the orthodox shake in their shoes with more fear than is said did old Belshazzar when he saw the ominous hand-writing on the wall of his palace, announcing that he had been weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Outdoor Meeting at Carman's Grove, Uniondale.

We did not consult the clerk of the weather, and we had no prayer machine whereby with Christian zeal we might change the purposes of an unchangeable God, and so just before the hour set fer our Freethought meeting the clouds gathered and a slight shower precipitated itself upon the bosom of the parched earth. This prevented the attendance of many who lived at a distance, and though the sun partially appeared, when the hour for meeting arrived only a few were on hand. However, the earth looked so beautiful after the rain and seemed so revived with the precious balm of the skies that we had no heart to find any fault with the operations of nature, and made the best of the situation. I gave my lecture, and we had a friendly conference with the pioneer spirits of Long Island, whom nothing can daunt and who for years hav kept up a steady combat with orthodoxy. One thing was favorable—the musketoes were thoroughly wet, and seemed to be quite discouraged. They did not present their bills upon this occasion—and their bills are about the most uncomfortable ones that ever bother our struggling flesh; not even a doctor's or a lawyer's bills are quite so audacious.

We had a delightful visit with Joseph Carman, who has lived for a quarter of a century in this locality and has helped to make Long Island the cultivated spot that it is, and who has always been an outspoken Freethinker. The grove near his house is a handsome one and well fitted for outdoor meetings, having open spaces for the breeze, and lofty trees whose spreading branches shut off the fervor of the skies. The orthodox often hold their Sunday-school picnics here, and no doubt get a little Secular philosophy by good eating and contact with the face of nature.

I had a few Christians in my congregation on Sunday, and they paid good attention to the end, except one, who went off in a flutter about the middle of the discourse. But I hope the good seed was planted. That which startles at first remains oftentimes to produce a mental growth.

We lecture next Sunday at the same place, afternoon and evening, the weather clerk permitting. S. P. PUTNAM.

Death of a Hebrew Philanthropist.

Sir Moses Montefiore, the philanthropist, is dead. He quietly passed away at his home in Ramsgate, England, Tuesday afternoon, July 28th. He was called the "Ideal Jew," but was beloved by "gentiles" as well as those of his own religion. It has been said that "he belonged to no race, religion, or country; his name had gone all over the broad earth, and had been received without regard to birth, or nationality, or faith." He was born at Leghorn, Italy, on Oct. 24, 1784, and when, a few months ago, he reached his hundredth year, the day was celebrated in England, America, and every land that civilization has reached. His father was an English merchant, and traced his ancestry back to Spain. Driven from that country by religious persecution, the Montefiores amassed wealth in Italy. They went to England after Manasseh-ben-Israel's intercession with Cromwell for the admission of the Jews.

Sir Moses was educated in London, and, after a careful commercial training, became a member of the Stock Exchange. In 1812 he married Judith Cohen, who was the sister-in-law of Nathan Meyer Rothschild, the founder of the London branch of the Rothschilds' banking-house. Their wedded life was one of happiness, and his wife's death, which happened nearly fifty years after their marriage, was Sir Moses Montefiore's great sorrow, and a sorrow that time did not seem to lessen.

Lady Montefiore possessed much literary ability, and wrote an interesting account of one of her many philanthropic visits with her husband, which was published in 1844 under the title, "Notes of a Private Journal of a Visit to Egypt and Palestine." It was while visiting Palestine with his wife, in 1829, that Sir Moses became interested in his co-religionists there, and ever afterward it was his desire to see the holy land peopled by his own race, and the seat of the Jewish empire, with Jerusalem as its capital. On his coat-of-arms is a banner on which "Jerusalem" is written in letters of gold.

Sir Moses Montefiore was chosen sheriff of the city of London in 1837, the first of his faith who had ever held that office, and in the same year was knighted by Queen Victoria. The honor paid to him by city and sovereign was for his efforts in the cause of liberty and philanthropy. In 1840 he made a second journey with his wife to the East, in company with Cremieux, on the occasion of the persecution of the Jews in Damascus. He carried with him a relief fund of $35,000, half of which was his own contribution. He saw Mehemet Ali, pasha of Egypt, and made such an impression on him that he at once released the Jews who had been imprisoned, granted the free return of fugitivs, and guaranteed such future protection as Sir Moses demanded. Afterward, when the pasha sent his son to England to be educated, he placed him under Sir Moses's care. When he got back to England from this expedition Queen Victoria showed her pleasure by granting to him the "high distinction" of bearing supporters to his family arms—a privilege conceded only to peers of the realm and knights of the various orders. At the same time a magnificent memorial, sculptured by Bailie in 200 ounces of solid silver, was presented to him by a deputation of citizens—Hebrew and Christian—who joined in this testimonial to his worth and work.

In 1846 Sir Moses prevailed upon the Emperor Nicholas to suspend a ukase against the Jews. On his return he was created a baronet. In 1854 he collected $100,000 for the relief of the sufferers by famin in the East, obtained from the sultan the right to hold real estate, and established poorhouses in Jerusalem. He also promoted industry and agriculture there. In 1863, having secured at Madrid the cooperation of Queen Isabella, he obtained a firman from the sultan of Morocco in favor of the persecuted Jews, guaranteeing their equal protection with Christians. In 1866, when he was eighty-two years old, he made his last visit to Palestine, where the people had been afflicted by the cholera, and whose crops had been destroyed by the locusts. The next year he went to Bucharest to use his influence against the ill-treatment of the Jews in Roumania.

There was one mission, however, which the good man undertook which failed of its object, because it had to do with that most unscrupulous and heartless of all institutions, the Catholic church, as represented by Pope Pius IX. The case was this: Edgar Mortara, son of a Jewish cloth-merchant in Bologna, was taken by force from his parents by the papal police on orders from the inquisitor-in-chief at Bologna, for the reason that he had been surreptitiously baptized by a Catholic servant girl, and the church considered itself under the obligation of protecting him against his parents. Both the boy and his parents were in despair, and addressed themselvs in vain to the papal authorities. The church kept its hold on the lad. The Evangelical Alliance in London presented a protest against this outrage to the English government, but with no effect; the English government did not move in the matter. Then Sir Moses Montefiore took up the case and went personally to ask the pope for the return of the boy to his parents. He had the indorsement of both the French and English government, but they availed nothing, and for the first time the great philanthropist failed in a benevolent undertaking. The disgraceful and execrable action of the church in this affair can never be overlooked by thinking people, and will serve to keep fresh in mind the contrast between the Italian harlequin, Pio Nono—masquerading as pope, and voted infallible by the combined ignorance of Christendom, while forgotten by the intelligent—and Moses Montefiore, the Jew, the promoter of intelligence, the dispenser of charity, and the friend of the oppressed everywhere.

Pope Joan.

The earliest notice of Pope Joan is by Marianus Scotus, who died A.D. 1086. He inserts in his chronicle this passage:

A.D. 854, Lotharii 14, Joanna, a woman, succeeded Leo, and reigned two years.

From this small beginning the story grew, its first enlargement a few years later being as follows:

It is reported that this John was a female, and that she conceived by one of her servants. The pope, becoming pregnant, gave birth to a child, wherefore some do not number her among the pontiffs.

In 1282 came this further enlargement:

After Leo IV., John Anglus, a nativ of Metz, reigned two years, five months, and four days And the pontificate was vacant for a month. He died in Rome. He is related to hav been a female, and, when a girl, to hav accompanied her sweetheart in male costume to Athens; there she advanced in various sciences, and none could be found to equal her. So. after having studied for three years in Rome, she had great masters for her pupils and hearers. And when there arose a high opinion in the city of her virtue and knowledge, she was unanimously elected pope. But during her papacy she became in a family way by a familiar. Not knowing the time of birth, as she was on her way from St. Peter's to the Lateran, she had a painful delivery, between the Coliseum and St. Clement's church, in the street. Having died after. it is said that she was buried on the spot; and therefore the Lord Pope always turns aside from that way, and it is supposed by some out of detestation of what happened there. Nor on that account is she placed in the catalog of the holy pontiffs, not only on account of her sex, but also because of the horribleness of the circumstance.

As a further addition to the story it is said that, her holiness having presumed in that condition to exorcise a demoniac, and command the devil to tell her when he was to quit the body he possessed, the evil spirit answered:

Papa pater patrum, Papissae pandito partum,
Et tibi tunc eadem de corpore quando recedam.*

The whole story of Pope Joan is fabulous. Leo IV. died July 17, 885, and Benedict III. was consecrated on the 1st of September following, so that it is impossible to insert between their pontificates a reign of "two years, five months, and four days." It is, however, true that there was an antipope elected upon the death of Leo, but his name was Anastasius. This man possessed himself of the palace of the popes and obtained the incarceration of Benedict. But his supporters soon deserted him and Benedict assumed the pontificate, reigning two years and a half. Anastasius was never charged with being a woman, and cannot be the supposed Joan.

Bower in his "History of the Popes," 1758, says:

The female pope owes her existence and her promotion to the Roman Catholics themselvs; for by them the fable was invented, was published to the world by their priests and monks before the Reformation, and was credited, upon their authority, even by those who were most zealously attached to the Roman see, and among the rest by Saint Antonius, archbishop of Florence; nor did they begin to confute it till Protestants reproached them with it as reflecting great dishonor on the see of St. Peter.

Mosheim seems to assume the truth of the story, for he says:

During the five subsequent centuries the witnesses to this extraordinary event are without number; nor did anyone prior to the Reformation by Luther regard the thing as either incredible or disgraceful to the church.

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, an English churchman, is indignant at the above assertion by Mosheim, and says:

For two centuries there is not an allusion to be found to the event. The only passage which can be found is a universally acknowledged interpolation of the "Lives of the Popes," by Anastasius Bibliothecarius; and this interpolation is stated in the first printed edition, 1602, to be found only in two manuscript copies. . . . Mosheim is false again in asserting that no one prior to the Reformation regarded the thing as either incredible or disgraceful. . . . Platina, in his "Lives of the Popes," written before Luther was born, after relating the story says, "These things which I relate are popular reports, but derived from uncertain and obscure authors, which I hav therefore inserted briefly and baldly, lest I should seem to omit obstinately and pertinaciously what most people assert."

But does not this quotation from an author prior to Luther's birth rather go to confirm than to refute Mosheim's assertion? Platina relates the story from "popular reports," and records "what most people assert," though he himself expresses a hesitating doubt of the fact.

Furthermore, the learned Bower adds to the quotation already given this:

Ænius Silvius, afterward Pope Pius II., in the fifteenth century, was the first that questioned the truth of the fact, saying "that the story was not certain."

Upon the evidence, therefore, it does appear that Bower was right in saying that the Catholics did not begin to confute the story until the Protestants reproached them with it as reflecting great dishonor on the see of St. Peter. Indeed, it is admitted by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould that "a marble monument representing the papess with her baby was erected on the spot." Its existence in 1413 is attested by Theodoric of Niem, a papal secretary, who believed it to represent a female pope, though it might hav been an ancient pagan statue. It was placed in the cathedral of Siena, among the popes, between Leo IV. and Benedict III., and inscribed, "Joan VIII., an English woman." But Joan VIII. reigned from 872 to 882, and it was subsequently metamorphosed into the statue of Pope Zachary, who reigned from 741 to 752. Finally the statue was destroyed in 1677.

ANTIQUARY.

*Metrical translation, by "Antiquary:"

O father of holy men! Female papa!
O pontiff rotund in Episcopal see!
If you can tell when you're to be a mamma,
Then I'll let you know when the demon shall flee.

"Liberty of Personal Discretion."

The above is a phrase in an article entitled "Temperance vs. Legislativ Prohibition," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25, 1885. It is a remarkable fact that the champions of the "liberty of personal discretion" are Antiprohibitionists. The laws against opium joints, one would naturally think, impeded the practice of "liberty of personal discretion" in the same manner as a law against liquor saloons would. I wish the army of noble veterans enlisted in the glorious cause of the "liberty of personal discretion" would air their rhetoric in a philippic against the laws prohibiting the keeping of opium joints.

How strange it is that the saloon-keepers to a man, the manufacturers of all grades and kinds of intoxicating liquors, without exception, call the Prohibition movement a dangerous one, if it has been, is, and always will be inoperativ and useless! If it is dangerous to the saloons, then it is certainly a "bow of promis" to suffering humanity. Oh, the suffering women and children, whose only hope of a decent home, of the respect and love of their fellows, of the restoration to sobriety and sanity of a husband and father, once loving and capable, lies with the success of this same Prohibition movement, so sadly misunderstood by so many good-hearted and intelligent Liberals! The Antiprohibitionists never call our attention to the innocent victims of the indirect effects of dram-selling. Almost every newspaper that comes to hand contains a story of some unfortunate persons whose death resulted from the insane and brutal acts of a drunken wretch.

Common as these things are, they are beginning to be noticed, and now that they are noticed, a reasonable effort should be made to prevent their recurrence. Absolute success cannot be expected; no law is an absolute success, or accomplishes fully what it was designed to do.

That the church and the temperance movement should be intimately connected just at present is quite natural, but not at all alarming. It is temperance which has captured the church, and not the church which has captured temperance. The way of it was something like this: the temperance people had not where to open their mouths, though they were in constant danger of having their heads laid open.

The whole country was and is barren of Liberal halls. Whoever goes about to teach the people must take a tent along with him, as does our energetic Reynolds, or speak in the open air, which is not always a delightful thing to do, or hire a hall, not a thing to be done without money, or, as a last resort, get the use of the thousands of churches in the land. Now, the temperance people tried all these ways. They hav had their tents, their camp-meetings, and their halls. They wanted the churches as places in which to talk temperance. If there were any Liberal halls they would want them, too, and they would hav them. Well, they had to pay the price for the churches. It would not be honest to take them without paying the price. The price was that the temperance meetings held in the churches should be called "Gospel Temperance." No slurs were to be fired at the "Christ" for making wine at the end of the feast, after the guests had become so helpless that they could not distinguish wine from water with a drop of brickdust in it. The innocent amusement of opening the temperance meetings with prayer was indulged in, and the texts, "No drunkard shall enter the kingdom of heaven," and that other golden one, "He who putteth the wine skin to his neighbor's mouth shall be in danger of sheol," were to be repeated every ten or twenty minutes. You see the price was not one that impoverishes anyone to pay. The churches hav never got very rich out of it; but the temperance cause has daily prospered.

This temperance cause is a very great cause. Even the brewers are temperance men of the most ardent, if not verdant, kind. The civilization of our day which supports these dreadful saloons will in the future be deemed worse than any of the barbarisms of Africa. We are such creatures of imitation, we yield so easily to the influences around us, that this twaddle about "liberty of personal discretion," when used to prevent the use of strong measures to destroy a business built up and sustained by the good-natured weaknesses of society, resulting in the impoverishment, misery, and death of millions upon millions, is almost a crime. Liberals, if you would indeed be freemen, destroy this most extensiv and most disgraceful slavery to old King Alcohol.

Where Are the Prophets?

Immediately after the nomination of Mr. Blaine, Mrs. Morrell, a Spiritualist medium, of New York, predicted that Blaine would never be president. Ah! if prophetesses would only stop at the right place they would not lose honor in their own country. But, unfortunately, this medium predicted the same thing about Cleveland. That spoiled the whole yarn. Speaking of those two candidates, she said: "It seems to me as though one will die and the other be killed." Wonder why the one who was killed didn't die? If Cleveland was killed and didn't know it, somebody ought to inform him that his present course is irregular, if not positivly unconstitutional.

A dead man or a spirit might make a very good president, but the presidency has not yet fallen quite so low in public estimation that no live man can be induced to accept it for $50,000. Afterward Mrs. Morrell called on Mrs. Fisk, another medium, and the spirit of A. Lincoln came into the room, and wrote a distressingly gloomy message. Among other things, he said that "the poor man's friend" would be the "next in order."

The spirits are good at hugging, kissing, sitting in people's laps, etc., but they seem to be rather lame on politics. Abe was much shrewder while in the flesh. He must be progressing backwards. But Mr. D. S. White said: "This prophecy points to Butler," etc. Now, if Butler had been elected, what a blowing of trumpets there would hav been among the faithful! That prophecy would hav been pointed out as a clincher on the spirit question. But since the election there has been a dead calm in this department. The silence is so thick that you could cut great chunks out of it, and never hear a squeak. Which way do the prophecies point in the coming election in Ohio?

Already the Spiritualists are weakening in the Seybert Commission business, and conjuring up ingenious excuses to account for the forthcoming failure. Kind friends, when you hav a dollar to spare, instead of spending it for something to eat, drink, or wear, go to some one of these humbug prophetic mediums, pay your dollar, and take the value of it in prophecy.

The Orthodox Belief as Applied to Children.

The doctrin preached and believed a few decades ago, viz., that all infants that died before they arrived at a sufficient age to realize they were sinners, and therefore could not repent, went to the place of eternal punishment, was more consistent with the doctrins of the church than the present belief, viz. that all such infants are saved. The primary and most essential doctrin of the orthodox is that in Adam we all sinned, and consequently are born sinners. Without that doctrin there would not be any plan of salvation, and consequently no Christian church. If all are born sinners, of course we must all be "born again," or suffer everlastingly in flaming fire. The moment an infant breathes he is a sinner, and the only result at which a person can arrive and be logical, who believes in the Christian religion, is that infants who die under a certain age must be damned.

But the idea became so appalling to our ideas of justice, in the advancement of civilization, that the belief is no longer now entertained, only as an exception. It would not do to preach it, and it would find no adherents if preached.

In surrendering the belief of infant punishment, they hav not only abandoned their fundamental doctrin upon which their church is built, but they hav not relieved themselvs from any of the unreasonableness of their doctrin of the fall of man, and the plan of salvation.

Admitting that infants up to a certain age go to glory when they die virtually admits that none are condemned at any age. At what age do persons pass from that condition when if they die they are safe, into that state when if they die they are damned if not "born again?" One may say when they arrive at the age of accountability. When is that? When they can tell right from wrong. When is that? To that there is no answer. Gradually man learns one thing is right, another wrong. The more knowledge a person has the less he is liable to do wrong, other things being equal. There is no certain time in any man's life when he commences to sin. In fact, man believes largely as he has been taught, and acts accordingly, as a rule.

To him who believes the doctrin of the Christian church there exists to-day a heaven and hell. To-morrow a child is born. Heaven or hell is eventually to receive him. They were made for him by God. The child is not accountable or responsible for anything that has preceded him. He has had nothing to do in the formation of these places, or in his coming into existence. He was forced here by the laws of nature over which he had no control. He may never hear of those places. If told about them, the fall of man, and the plan of salvation, he may not be organized so as to believe it. He does the best in life he knows how. He dies and goes into everlasting torment, and for what? God did not come to him, at an age of understanding, and tell him of his errors, how to correct them, and inform him that he would make a place of torment for him if he did not reform. No, it all existed before, and the child is born for the place, born under influences for which he is not accountable. Let them believe it who can. It is too unreasonable, unmerciful, unjustifiable, for my nature to accept.

The unsoundness of the orthodox belief is nowhere more apparent than when applying it to the condition of children.

FRANCIS M. BUCK.

Is It All the Tariff?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am especially pleased with the article of your correspondent "Holt," in your issue of July 18th, entitled "A Lesson of the Past."

Taking, as I do, extreme radical ground on almost every reform question, appreciating, as I do, in the highest degree the efforts of radicals of almost every class, I see no greater need anywhere than of just such solid, clear-cut, plump, ringing arguments as abound in "Holt's" article from beginning to end.

The tariff, any tariff, is a humbug, a fraud, a millstone tied to the neck of labor, a foe to human brotherhood. Additional interest and value are given to the article by its reference to that stupidest of all stupid ideas, "over-production," and that giant among frauds, "specie basis."

But I am not disposed, as your correspondent seems to be, to charge the tariff with being the sole or main cause of hard times and scarcity of money. I charge as much, or more, to our false financial system. When there is a special need abroad of our surplus produce we hav good times, in spite of tariff and bad finance combined. Free trade would be a great promoter of prosperity in any case. But, I believe, a true financial system could insure prosperity, in spite of any hindrances to foreign trade. This country could, if necessary, liv within itself. With capital and labor all employed, as it would be with a plenty of reliable currency, the rest of the world might be sunk in the sea, and we should never go to the poor-house. I believe in American manufactures and a home market. We do need cheap money, but we do not need a tariff to promote them.

Whether we are now suffering from contraction depends upon what you mean by it. Though there is not enough money, there is enough to insure a fair degree of prosperity, provided it was in circulation. Of what practical, beneficent use is money hoarded in bank and government vaults? With bond and bank system abolished, and government hoarding abandoned, money would go into circulation and insure business activity inevitably.

Liberal Spiritualists, and Sectarian Spiritualists.

It is a plain fact that there are two classes, at least, of Spiritualists. One class work as hard for human progress as any Materialist, are as heartily in favor of free thought, free speech, and free press. Such Spiritualists condemn no man for his skepticism, his Materialism, or Atheism. But your sectarian Spiritualist is a Christian on the half-shell. He does not believe in affiliating with Materialists. He does not believe in free speech nor free press. On this trip I hav met a large number of Liberal Spiritualists. At our grove meeting to-day Dr. J. C. Corey, Waterloo, Iowa, was one of the speakers, and he is a firm Spiritualist. He gave us a refined, forcible, eloquent speech. I had not seen him in twenty-three years, at which time we both lived in Michigan. He is now a physician with a large practice, and is a Liberal Spiritualist. In his address he let a Materialistic cat out of a Spiritual bag by informing the audience that in those days of our youth I had furnished indubitable proof of the truth of Spiritualism, converting him on the spot, so to speak.

With the exception of two or three sectarian Spiritualists, everybody appeared to enjoy the meetings, forenoon and afternoon, with a picnic dinner between. Mr. Matthew Farrington, president of the Liberal League, presided. He is one of the ablest Liberals and clearest thinkers in this part of the country, and activ in our cause. Like Cincinnatus, he follows the plow, and has a large farm, commodious house, huge barn, and a number of the Lord's cattle. His wife and the daughter at home are with him in his Liberal work. Their taste is discerned in the extensiv flower garden and other pleasant surroundings of the home. A few days' sojourn with them was appreciated by the writer. Their son resides six miles from Waverly.

Mr. Farrington was formerly a school-teacher by profession; taught in New York state five years continuously, at another time two and a half years, and in the West a good while, making in all fifty terms of school-teaching.

That prince of prevaricators, Elder Clark Braden, says Ingersoll is so illiterate that he could not obtain a second-grade certificate to teach a common school. Let him try Mr. Farrington, who was a young man among the old Abolitionists, acquainted personally with Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, Henry C. Wright, Parker Pillsbury, and Abbie Kelly, before and after marriage. One reason, he says, why she and Stephen Foster married was because, as they were co-laborers on the Abolition platform, people talked about them.

Mr. Farrington is a strong Materialist; is willing to be anything else when he gets the evidence, which must be satisfactory to his own mind. He has a high regard for Spiritualists that are Liberal. Sectarian Spiritualists he ranks with bigoted Christians. A bigoted Materialist he does not esteem.

Their daughter Delia, a couple of miles away, and her husband, Fred. W. Jacob, are Liberals with whom I passed a day. They hav two children, two as near perfect little specimens of humanity, boy and girl, as I ever saw.

Mr. Jacob is young, strong, enthusiastic, brimful of Liberal gospel, and is nowhere ashamed nor afraid to hav it known. For sturdy independence of thought commend me to the young farmers who hav not been lassoed by the church.

On the 4th of July a few of us met in St. John's Grove, and celebrated our national birthday without priest or prayer.

The next point which I am engaged to visit is Cedar Falls, then Waverly, and next New Hartford. By that time I will be close upon the time in August when I am to meet Moses Hull in debate, at the Spiritualists' camp-meeting, near Clinton, Ia.

These debates are kind but earnest exchanges of thought on the chief questions of the day. Quite a number from this part of Iowa intend to be present.

What Hav Mr. Parton and Mr. Bonner to Say?

The Correspondents' Column of the New York Ledger, August 1st, contains this curious paragraph, which I wish you would say something more about than can I in its reference to Mr. Parton:

R. M. C. (Tennessee) asks: "What effect did Tom Paine and Voltaire hav on the Christianity of France? Did they not overthrow the religion of the nation? Or, at least, did they not generate an era of doubt and uncertainty, which threatened strongly the subversion of Christian faith? Kindly refer me to a book or article upon the subject. What hav been the effects of Infidelity on the religion of America?" Voltaire did more than any other one man to intensify the revolt against authority in religion and in other matters which characterized the eighteenth century. Paine was more prominent as a patriot and a lover of liberty than as an assailant of Christianity. Both failed to distinguish between Christianity and what men choose to call by that name, and often, when they thought they were attacking the substance of the Christian religion, they were only attacking corruptions of it. Paine's criticisms of the Bible are acute, considering the time at which he wrote, but a large class of them is now seen to be only criticism of certain interpretations of the Bible, and another large class has lost its force through increased knowledge of Bible terms and places, so that his once famous works hav little interest now. France's generous assistance to us made French ways of thinking popular here at the beginning of this century, but, in spite of some lecturers, the school of Deism is now extinct among thinking people. You should read Parton's "Voltaire."

Is it not worth Mr. Parton's while to notice such a sweeping statement, absurdly making him subscribe to being called unthinking, by an editor of a paper which publishes his essays?

If Paine and Voltaire only assailed the corruptions of Christianity, why should Christians of a better stripe denounce them as Infidels? Who commissioned the Ledger paragrapher to decide what is the distinction between real and corrupt Christianity? As Christianity, in all its phases, is a matter of faith in some authority or other, must not the separation of authority from religion be a renunciation of Christianity altogether? Can a religion that depends upon the information of scholars for the interpretation of its oracles be unreliable? As the modern criticism and interpretation, accepted by large denominations, is Unitarian, or, in other words, Deistic and humanitarian, not looking upon God as a personality, but as a power, are not the Christian schools of theology Deistical now? The scientific philosophers, like Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, etc., if not Deists, are more than Deists in their departure from old Christianity. But the most curious thing about the above paragraph is that it refers to Mr. Parton's "Voltaire" as the repository of correct thought on the subject, Mr. Parton himself being a Deist, or still more oblique to orthodoxy, an officer of the great Infidel order in America, and being also the finest writer for the Ledger, along with Beecher and other Deists.

WHO ARE THE DECEIVERS?—If the detection or exposure of error destroys faith, of what use is such faith? If Jesus Christ is a myth, how much better is Christianity than paganism? If the gospels are monkish legends, who are the liars and deceivers? If Christendom is worshiping a false God, is not "Antichrist" a benefactor instead of a blasphemer? —Antichrist.

The War is Not Ended.

The notion has been expressed, and is general among advocates of the so-called "higher" biblical criticism, that the day of destructiv Liberalism is past; that the people who are worth Liberalizing hav already rejected Christianity, and that all now remaining to be done is to bury the corpse of superstition, and then go about some sort of constructiv work on a new basis. That notion is a mistaken one. It is true that the higher criticism has its place, and does work necessary to be accomplished, but not that work which just at present is most important. A great many books and newspaper articles of this sort, thoroughly undermining the claims of supernatural religion, hav been written and printed, and then read by hundreds of people without raising the suspicion that Christianity had been attacked. The writers hav a method of presenting evidence and testimony in an able and wordy way, but no verdict is reached; the bearing of the facts against current falsehoods is not traced, often not hinted at, and the reader at the end finds himself in possession merely of a series of suggestions; all of which shows either that the writers are too timid to press on from premis to conclusion, or that they are less philosophers than students, and do not appreciate the significance of what they hav learned. Of course, these works are valuable reference books for writers, and furnish ammunition for trained thinkers, but to beginners not yet accustomed to compounding thought they are unwieldy and almost useless.

Thomas Paine was the first in this country to giv the people a weapon which, even in the hands of the most unskilful, could be successfully turned against the trained advocates of superstition. That weapon was the "Age of Reason," a book which has probably had a larger circulation than any work ever written in defense of the Bible. Denton, and Ingersoll, and Remsburg hav followed Paine's method, and the circulation and effects of their writings attest their worth. Theirs is not the "higher" criticism, but it is the criticism that all can understand.

Mr. Reynolds, also, has a way of presenting the absurdities of the Bible in their most absurd aspect. There are still ignorant fetich-worshipers who will smite their Bible and declare that they "believe every word that is between the leds of that book;" and while one of these remains the work which Mr. Reynolds is doing will be needed. All the books and pamphlets containing arguments directed against the inspiration of the Hebrew scriptures must be circulated.

Right here we would introduce a letter just received. The writer, well known for his activity in Liberal work, has a practical way of expressing his opinion on this point:

"GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., July 22, 1885.

"TO THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, Gentlemen: I see by your paper that C. B. Reynolds, of Tent fame, is struggling away in this state with his tent meetings or lectures, and that he speaks of distributing Liberal literature free amongst his audience with apparent success. Now, as I am an advocate of this last-mentioned movement, I inclose you $11—ten dollars to pay for leaflets, tracts, etc., which you will forward to Reynolds for gratuitous distribution (these to be selected by you). For the other dollar send me twenty-five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 11th, containing the 'Lessons.'

"Very truly, D. A. BLODGETT."

As the familiar saying puts it, that has the right ring. There is no movement on foot in the world more deserving of support and success than the one inaugurated by Mr. Reynolds. It is pioneer work which he is doing. All can appreciate its difficulties, and few are so well qualified as he to overcome them. If every Liberal would learn to look upon laborers in the field as his or her substitutes sent to fight the battles of Freethought, which they must desire to see won, the duty of supporting them would be plain. Mr. Reynolds would appreciate a few more contributions to the Tent Campaign, either in literature for distribution or in the circulating medium of the country.

Catholic Ideas on Education.

At the last annual meeting of the Westminster Diocesan Education Fund, Cardinal Manning presided, and his utterances on that occasion may be regarded as unimpeachable Catholic authority. Manning was formerly an archdeacon of the Church of England, but differed with that body on the question of infant baptism and regeneration, and joined the Catholic church in 1851. The London Times prints a report of the cardinal's address, in which he dealt mainly with the question of schools, and gave his notion of how they should be conducted.

The Catholic population of London is given at 200,000, which, compared to a total population of 4,000,000, is agreeably small. The average attendance at Catholic schools is 18,000. Very few Catholic children attend other schools, and the cardinal gave the parents great credit for fidelity on this account, it being a fact beyond dispute that the public or board schools possessed superior qualifications for furnishing the pupils with both mental and physical training. The trouble with them was, in the Catholic point of view, that the education which they provided was not "Christian." They were intolerably godless. For this reason Cardinal Manning believes Christian education in England at this time is in a crisis and in great peril. He holds that education is strictly a question of morals and religion, and that the instruction of youth in the law of God, which with Catholics is synonymous with the laws of their church, is the first duty of the teacher. The state, he implies, has no further duty, in regard to education, than to furnish the school buildings and to pay the salary of the teachers, who in every case should be Christians. He has great hopes from the new House of Commons, and believes that it will be pervaded with an atmosphere of Christianity.

When the state entered into questions of morals and religion, as it had done in providing public schools, the clergy had a right, said the cardinal, to enter the realm of politics. Therefore he would say that every man who loved Christianity and his country was bound, when anybody came before him to ask his interest and his vote, to assure himself that any person he voted for would protect "Christian education." Honesty, capacity, faithfulness to his trust, are not to count with a candidate seeking Catholic favors.

Cardinal Manning has been somewhat censured by the wealthier classes in his church for his habit of consorting with and preaching to the low and ignorant instead of cultivating the society of the rich, and has thereby gained the credit of being democratic in his leanings. But the pope knows that Manning is a good servant. He knows that the low and ignorant support the church. He knows that, under the new franchise act, the low and ignorant will hav a vote, and that in a revolt they carry the muskets. For these reasons Manning is doing the work of the politician.

It is the undoubted hope of the Catholic church that England may become a republic, with the Episcopal church disestablished. Catholicism flourishes best in a republic. Her foothold in our land grows daily stronger, so that it has become a mere question of speed between progress and enlightenment on the one side, and the proselytizing enterprise of Catholics on the other. At the root of this problem lies the school question. If the church gains control of the public schools, or if the Catholics can obtain government support for their parochial schools, with attendance made compulsory by law, the children of the country will be at the mercy of zealots and educated in an atmosphere of superstition. The only answer to priests and clergymen who wish reforms made in school systems is that, except as citizens, they hav and can hav nothing whatever to do with educational institutions. Education is secular. A pupil instructed only in ascertained facts will know nothing of religion except its atrocities. The teaching of religion must therefore be omitted. If, as the Catholics claim, the ordinary school history tells the pupils that the Reformation was really a reformation, and that Martin Luther was a benefactor of his kind, that is a question for historians to settle. The reformation must be judged by its effects upon civilization and progress. If the Catholics can show that it was really a disaster, they will, no doubt, hav little difficulty in pointing out to their children the error of the popular text-book.

We can form no estimate as to how far Cardinal Manning will be supported in England in his attempts to make the government pay for manufacturing Catholics. A people that will support an established church, as the English people do, cannot be expected to protest very vigorously against any sort of religious tyranny; but in this country, happily, the ideas of this distinguished authority on infant baptism hav as yet met with little general favor.

That "Unchaining the Tiger" Letter.

The statement that Franklin wrote to Paine, advising him not to publish his "Age of Reason," still continues in current circulation though many times shown to be spurious. A presentation of the following facts should set the question at rest.

In Volume III. of Bigelow's "Life of Franklin," page 364, appears the following letter:

To THOMAS PAINE (?) date uncertain [1]:

"I hav read your manuscript with some attention. By the argument it contains against a particular providence, though you show a general providence, you strike at the foundation of all religion. For without the belief in a providence that takes cognizance of, guards and guides, and may favor particular persons, there is no motiv to worship a deity, to fear his displeasure, or to pray for his protection. I will not enter into any discussion of your principles, though you seem to desire it. . . .

"I would advise you, therefore, not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person, whereby you will save yourself a great deal of regret and repentance. If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be if without it? I intend this letter as a proof of my friendship, and therefore add no professions to it, but subscribe simply, Yours, B. FRANKLIN."

The editor's note to the above is as follows:

"This letter was first published by William Temple Franklin, but without the name of the person to whom it was directed. Mr. Sparks supposes it was addressed to Paine."

William Temple Franklin was accused of tampering with the manuscripts left by his grandsire. This tampering grandson first published the letter without date or name of the recipient. Historian Sparks supposes it was addressed to Paine, and biographer Bigelow, on that shallow supposition, heads the letter: "To THOMAS PAINE—date uncertain."

Franklin died in April, 1790; in December, 1793, Paine, who had never before written any thoughts on religion, began his "Age of Reason." On his return to America, in 1802, he published a series of "Letters to the Citizens of the United States," in one of which he says:

"In my publications I follow the rule I began with in 'Common Sense,' that is, to consult nobody, nor to let anybody see what I write till it appears publicly."

In the light of these facts, is any further argument necessary to prove that Franklin never wrote any such letter to Thomas Paine?

Rivalry in Revivalism.

In all varieties of callings in which personal strength, agility, or skill is requisit to excellence, there is some gentleman or lady engaged who claims the title of champion. Thus Prof. J. L. Sullivan is the champion pugilist when sober enough to support the title; Mr. Beach, of Australia, we believe, is the champion sculler, besides being a gentleman; some young lady of forty-five summers, and numerous falls, connected with Mr. Barnum's greatest show possible on earth, is champion equestrienne; the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage is the champion pulpit acrobat, and the Rev. Joseph Cook, by general consent, poses before Christendom as the champion liar.

Just now there is a dispute in religious circles as to who is the champion converter. There is rivalry in revivalism, or rivalism in revivalry, to state it plainer; and the most conspicuous figures are Boy Preacher Harrison, æt. fifty-four, and the Rev. Sam. Jones of Georgia, whose age is unknown, but who would properly belong to that age when the loftiest dome of intellect loomed skyward between the ears of the patient ass. These two gentlemen both claim the championship, but it is admitted that just now Mr. Jones is the favorit. His lofty style and elegant diction giv him the call over Mr. Harrison To show what these are we print the subjoined report from the Day, of Waco, Texas, where he was at last accounts laboring:

"Between two and three thousand people were in the Tabernacle last night when Evangelist Jones stood up to open the services. He prefaced his remarks with the statement that there were some incidental expenses, such as the gas used, etc., that would hav to be paid for, and that a collection would be taken up to meet this. 'Any gentleman,' he said, 'will cheerfully contribute his mite to help out, for the demand is necessary and reasonable. There are some people here, I hav no doubt, who will sneer and say, "This is always the way with these religious meetings; anything to get money." I am not appealing to these flop-eared hounds. They can keep their hands and their money in their pockets.'"

Besides indicating the degree of refinement which Mr. Jones has attained, the foregoing extract shows what those people mentioned by our fair correspondent "Liberta" may enjoy when, offended at the bruskness of Liberals, they seek the cultured society offered by Christians. The present dispute between Harrison and Jones is over the results of their respectiv labors in the cause of Christ. Harrison was so unwise as to make his statement first, but he put his estimate high enough, it was supposed, to cover the mendacity of all future liars. According to his figures, he has converted between forty and fifty thousand souls during his career. Jones says that he has made between eight and ten thousand converts during the present year. This is a much better showing than Harrison's, as the latter has been engaged in the great work for some twenty years. Further, Jones desires to bet 10 to 1 that ninety-five per cent of his converts never recover. Harrison is not a betting man, but he makes no bones of hinting that Sam Jones is a liar.

This question should be settled in some satisfactory and decisiv way. The probability is on the side of Mr. Harrison in his opinion of Mr. Jones. It is well known that many of the latter's converts are darkies, and that on their way from the meetings these do not scruple to absorb whatever fowls may chance to be roosting for the night near the line of their homeward route. But whether or not this can be construed as inconsistent with true piety is an open question. Custom would decide in the negativ.

It might be recommended that these rival revivalists, in accordance with a suggestion that has been made, should attend the coming Albany Convention, and test their respectiv converting powers on the people there to assemble. Fifteen minutes might be allotted to each in which to tell all he knows, and the converts could then be counted by some competent person. The result would set at rest all doubts as to which is the champion nuisance.

Editorial Notes.

THE Springfield Republican says that "the rage which is said to exist for Miss Cleveland's book of literary studies, if it be not a fiction of enterprising publishers, illustrates the inexhaustible supply of fools." Quite correct.

THE London Freethinker has published an illustrated summer number, with an illuminated cover representing palms, pyramids, Assyrian lions, and other oriental things. The pictures inside, metaphorically speaking, would make the angels weep.

IT givs us some pain to see paragraphs which we hav taken the trouble to write republished in our American Freethought contemporaries, and credited to foreign journals, after having crossed the water and returned. This occurs from not rendering "unto scissors the things that are scissors'."

THE Rev. Mr. Turner, of Georgia, lost faith in mankind and everything else, and committed suicide because he could not make the narrativs of the apostles agree. If Mr. Turner had recollected that the disciples were fishermen, and that their language on that account should not be pressed too closely, he might hav overlooked their discrepancies, given up preaching, and lived a long and useful life.

THE Author of the Hebrew scriptures owes the revisers a debt of gratitude which they will probably never be able to collect. In the one hundred and thirty-ninth Psalm of the old version this verse occurs:

"If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there."

By deftly changing the word hell to one meaning grave, the revision committee hav extricated the Almighty from an uncomfortably warm place.

THE Christian Herald contains this paragraph, printed on the authority of Evangelist Charles Cook:

"HER MAJESTY'S PRISON, PENTONVILLE.—'I had not been here, had I not hav followed the teachings of Bradlaugh.' 'Ah! my friend, would that you were the only one who thus regretted being led away by such false teaching, which leads to open sin and vice. Many—very many—who languish in "durance vile" attribute the downward career to listening to such men; they became lawless in proportion as they threw off the fear of God, and now bitterly repent having imbibed Infidel doctrins. Listen to this: "I AM ONE OF THIRTEEN INFIDELS. What has become of my friends? I will tell you. One became a Christian, six were transported, four were hanged, there is one in the cell above me sentenced to penal servitude for life, and I am to be hanged to-morrow!"'"

Mr. Bradlaugh says that Evangelist Cook has been lying to the Christian Herald, and offers to award a sum of money sufficient to cover the expenses and institute an investigation. "If the Christian Herald," he says, "does not concur in this investigation, the editor must submit to be classed in the category of those unscrupulous and pious people who greedily use the vilest falsehoods against heretic enemies." There seems to be a class of religious dissemblers in England of unusual talent.

WHEN Remsburg's "Life of Paine" was published in 1880, copies of it were sent to prominent Christian clergymen. Since that time, six of these clergymen—Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York; Rev. Minot J. Savage, of Boston; Rev. J. Lloyd Jones, of Chicago; Rev. Charles Wendte, of Cincinnati; Rev. H. L. Eads, the Shaker bishop, of Kentucky, and Rev. J. Fletcher Williams, of Liverpool, Eng.—hav, either in the pulpit or through the press, paid eloquent tributes to the character and works of Thomas Paine.

ONE of the St. Louis preachers of whom Helen Gardener wrote last week, asked in his sermon "if it was not true that it needed a man to be steeped in the depths of Infidelity before he could become a distributor of obscene literature, like Bennett." He also repeated the "Don't unchain the tiger" story, and the regular stock tales concerning Paine and Voltaire. It is surprising what a number of dishonest and ignorant men there are in the pulpits of the country. It is of no use to labor with them. Their wooden heads are too thick and hard to take anything in. They are fitly described in 2 Peter ii, 22.

THE Mansion House Committee of the Pall Mall Gazette's exposure of London vice, consisting of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, Cardinal Manning, and Mr. Samuel Morley, has completed its labors. The report is as follows:

"Having been requested to inquire as to the truth of statements printed in the Pall Mall Gazette from July 6th to July 10th, we decided from the first to exclude inquiry into charges against particular men, or classes of men, or against the police. We strictly confined ourselvs to an inquiry into the system of criminal vice described. After carefully sifting the evidence of witnesses and material before us, without guaranteeing the accuracy of every particular, we are satisfied that, on the whole, the statements of the Pall Mall Gazette are substantially true."

The London Salvation Army is taking a hand in looking after immoral persons, which will remind people of the distinguished Mr. Bill Sykes, who joined in the pursuit of little Oliver with the cry of "Stop thief!"

A LAMENTABLE feature of the literature inspired by the death of General Grant is the bad poetry that has been written to commemorate the military achievements of the great soldier. Perhaps the verses below are the worst. They are painted in colossal letters and flank a heroic-sized picture of Grant on our city hall. Rollin M. Squire, of the department of public works, is the author. The poetry runs:

"He bore aloft our sword of fire,
A world-watched, envied nation,
Where victory sang, while trembling kings
Bespoke our desolation.

No faltering marked the Titan's task,
No shrinking from the trial;
He faced the foe ere Freedom's hand
Fell shattered from Time's dial."

It is the generally expressed sentiment of New Yorkers that this rhyme should be taken in out of sight. The occasion is a tempting one and a great deal more poetry will probably be written, but the bard who kindly refrains in this crisis will deserve the thanks of man and woman.

A CORRESPONDENT forwards us an account of "A Backsliding Infidel," purporting to be descriptiv of the recent action of Leo Taxil, the noted French Communist and Freethinker. Taxil was one of the characters of the Republic in Nance. He was originally a clever newspaper writer. When the Commune began to get a permanent foothold in Paris he formed the Anti-Clerical Society. His writings, which were published by the society of which he was the head, were called blasphemous. Among Taxil's productions was a "Comic Life of Jesus," illustrated with numerous irreverent woodcuts. His "Comic Bible" was another similar work in character. "The Female Pope," "Sacred Stupidities," "Down With the Surplice," and half a dozen similar volumes were each, in turn, suppressed by the French police. Taxil was an interesting and popular man in literary circles, and had many friends. The account says he has recanted, thrown himself on the forgivness of the Catholic church, and entered a convent. Our correspondent desires us to answer these statements. We hav received no information on the subject further than that cabled to the New York papers to the effect that Taxil had resigned the presidency of some society on account of differences among the members. That is probably the truth about it. The information in regard to the recantation may safely be ascribed to the imagination of the writer of the account our correspondent sends. Taxil's "Comic Bible" is not quite as indecent as the original Jewish version, but it is a performance that reflects little credit on its author. The truth about his recent action will doubtless be made known in time.

READERS of the Independent will peruse with great interest the Rev. Jonn P. Newman's account of the last scene at the death-bed of General Grant, but their confidence in the strict accuracy of the parson's narrativ will be somewhat shaken when they learn that Dr. Newman was swallowing his breakfast in a neighboring hotel when the death occurred. The facts of the case, as given by the Commercial Advertiser, are these: "About 7:15 o'clock on the morning that Grant died Dr. Newman said he thought he would go over to the hotel and get a little breakfast. The physicians warned him that a change might occur at any moment, and that he had better not go. He turned to Henry, the nurse, and asked his advice. Henry thought the general would liv for an hour. So off the doctor went and ate his breakfast at breakneck speed. In the mean time Dr. Sands, who had left the cottage at ten o'clock the evening previous in order to hav a good night's rest, sauntered back about 7:50, just in time. Dr. Newman was not so fortunate. After breakfast he came up the path at so quick a rate, with his arms waving, that he was short of breath. Dr. Shrady saw him coming, walked out, and said, 'Hush! he's dead.' The doctor almost fell. His terrible disappointment was depicted plainly on his face. He replied not a word, and when he had recovered rushed into the house and led Mrs. Grant to the sofa." The New York World observes: "Dr. Newman beautifully remarks that 'some of the last scenes of General Grant's death were pitiful and at the same time eloquent,' which is creditable alike to Dr. Newman's elocution and eyesight, since he witnessed these scenes from the breakfast table of the hotel some distance away from the cottage occupied by the general."

A Book for the Dollar Nobility.

The New York TRUTH SEEKER calls Rose Elizabeth Cleveland's new book "about the weakest slush that the book makers hav ever put upon a long suffering public." We do not question the accuracy of this criticism, but by way of comment let us add that the days are not long enough, the capacity of the fastest printing presses is not great enough, to print this slush in such quantities as the wealth and fashion of America at the summer resorts demand. There can be no question, of course, regarding the literary excellence of a book which sells like that among the dollar nobility of this great land.—Winsted Press.

One of the Salem Martyrs.

The descendants of Rebekah Nourse commemorated the 193d anniversary of her execution as a witch at the old Nourse homestead in Salem Village (Danvers Center), on July 30th (o.s. July 19th). There was a meeting at the First Parish church in Danvers at twelve o'clock, with addresses by the Rev. Fielder Israel, pastor of the first church in Salem, of which Rebekah Nourse was a member when arrested on the 24th of March, 1692, and by the Rev. C. B. Rice, of the First Parish of Danvers (Salem Village), the church of the Rev. Samuel Parris, in whose house and family the witchcraft delusion which swept over Salem was born. A monument was dedicated, and a perpetual endowment of the burial lot is to be secured. Thus, after the lapse of nearly two centuries, has the martyred woman's name been vindicated, and the very churches that with a "Thus saith the Lord, thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," hounded her to her death, with the Rev. Cotton Mather, D.D., at their head, virtually repudiated God's command by commemorating the event in their churches. Is it not surprising that they cannot see that they are now entertaining and preaching doctrins that two hundred years hence will be looked upon by their successors quite as illegitimate as putting to death men and women as witches, and hanging Quakers?

The monument erected is a granit shaft, eight and a half feet high, and is on a grassy mound two and a half feet high. The base is of Rockport stone, with a die of polished granit. The front bears this inscription:

"REBECCA NOURSE,
"Yarmouth, England, 1621; Salem, Mass., 1682.

(Lines by John G. Whittier.)

"O Christian martyr who for truth could die
When all about thee owned the hideous lie.
The world, redeemed from superstitious sway,
Is breathing freer for thy sake to-day."

The reverse is also appropriately inscribed.

I will only add that I am familiar with the location of these places and churches, having stood upon the spot where this unfortunate woman, and eighteen other victims, were hung, it since being called "Gallows Hill" (Salem), but now within the limits of Danvers. How much more sensible to hang the Bible and the clergy, I thought, as I stood there, a quarter of a century since, than those innocent men and women!

"Spiritual Retreat."

From the Catholic Union and Times.

The annual Spiritual Retreat for the clergy of the diocese will begin at the Seminary of Our Lady of Angels, Monday, 24th of August.

From the Evening Telegram, July 26th.

A troop of little girls ran down Sixth avenue last night to Policeman Schleier, at the corner of Twenty-ninth street, crying, "Oh, Mr. Policeman, there is a priest up on the next block, and he's acting horrid. He's taking hold of all the ladies' dresses" The policeman went in the direction indicated by the girls, and on the next block, sure enough, he found a young man dressed in clerical garb, with his arm around a young lady, trying to kiss her. The young lady was screaming and struggling, and the spectators were convulsed with laughter. The man was evidently intoxicated, and the policeman arrested him. He gave the name of Brady.

Mr. Brady found a spiritual retreat in the Jefferson Market station house, a month ahead of the procession.

Letters from Friends.

CONRAD GROVE, IA., July 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Macdonald, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 18th, proves to me that I hav been posing under a false canopy in calling myself a Universologist. It was only an illusion. The convergency of the divergent lines of my theory of the universe led me one stratum still below the "general antagonism" of Universology to cosmic unity; and why not call it Harmonology? It is Materialistic in seeing, with Mr. Tyndall, in matter the potency of all life; Idealistic, with Emerson, in knowing nothing as it is in itself, but only as it appears, which outline varies with each individuality. Would not this be the Materia-Idealistic branch of Harmonology?

I am both pessimist and optimist, as life is both the worst and best possible condition of things. Schopenhauer, Hartmann, and all the pessimistic galaxy are posing as the philosophers of disenchantment, themselvs only half-disenchanted, seeing all on the pain and sorrow side of the great sphere of life as real, and the pleasure side as illusion, while the optimists look through the reverse angle of the spectroscope. Both are both reality and illusion, as relativly and absolutely considered—all the result of inevitable necessity, the effects of an infinit sucession, and each both the parent and child of the other, becoming a unit in the universal harmony. Joy and sorrow, pain and pleasure, thus become equal, and are prime elements in the evolution of life and consciousness. Is not this the pessimo-optimistic branch of Harmonology, growing out of cosmic unity as a fundamental necessity?

We are all little spheroids struggling to grow larger, some more spheroidal, fanatical, or "cranky," others more roundly developed on all sides, or spherical. The true measure of our greatness is double the diameter from the center to the nearest circumferential point. Of the 1,300,000,000 of these now suffering conscious life no two are alike, and if each of these spheroids were to gravitate into an aggregation of the whole human family, each taking its place by the inherent bent of its individual differentiation, the negativ points of their respectiv polarities would converge to one common center, the opposit or positiv diverging to form the continuous area of a single spheroid. Thus says "Cosmic Unity;" and crush one or an aggregation of these spheroids out with the chain of its successiv parentage, like Catholicism or Protestantism, no matter how tyrannical, egotistical, or modest, and the whole sphere would be impaired. Thus does Harmonology harmonize the antagonisms of sociology, and make them necessary elements in its economy in the evolution and perpetuation of consciousness. Consciousness is a little spark or aggregation resultant from pervading curiosity, or the desire to know, inherent in all matter struggling between two infinities, one so great that in our smallness we cannot even imagine its outlines, the other so small that in our coarseness its infinit realities fade from our vision, reaching out our tentacles—the telescope on one side, and the microscope on the other—reveling in ecstasy, imbibing the material truths of the sylvan realms of zymology and bacteria here, and, with Herschel, dissolving and resolving the nebulæ of the Milky Way in its alembic there, and we find the secret of its perpetuation in that though we reach out beyond Spencer's line of the Unknowable, with Emerson, and Goethe, and Plato, we see still beyond the outlines of a new and varying succession of the Unknown, thus realizing that nature, not God, "perpetually geometrizes." Thus, were it possible to complete the "knowable," and pass upon an absolute line of the "unknowable," that moment consciousness must become unconscious.

So we are led, by successiv gradation, to the great law of universal illimitability, the interpretation of which discloses the key to all phenomena, as it develops into that crystal stream of prophecy.

Mrs. Macdonald will not so misunderstand me as to think, because I cannot see things as she does, that I do not appreciate her kind and encouraging words. As in the harmonizing system is woven that mantle of charity which necessitates a universal brotherhood, I never expect to find one who will agree with me, as no one else can look through my horoscope, and this is the embryo out of which grows the beautiful flower of Agnosticism. Schopenhauer called his first satellites fanatics. Emerson says, "Hitch your wagon to a star." Why not rather say—do not be a satellite. Develop centripetally and be a planet, growing larger and rounder until, with your uncompromising individuality, you can swing far out into the vibrant empyrean and be a star. GENELLI.

ORANGE, CAL., July 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Free discussion is something that should never be restricted, but abusiv and insulting opposition to the honest opinions of those who differ with us will never convert them or stimulate friendship. I believe there are few Spiritualists who object to discussing the question of immortality with Materialists, but if any exist who think it pleasant and proper to be the recipients of harsh invectivs, I hav never met them. This mode of debating (?) the merits of Spiritualism has become so common that certain men of prominence among the Spiritualists are in favor of a complete separation between Spiritualists and Materialists. Now, this is something that is not really desirable, were it possible, for both parties hav a common enemy in the church and all theologians. If certain Materialists are so combativ and pugnacious by nature that they must quarrel, let it be done with avowed enemies and those who seek to enslave the human mind. There are plenty of such, and they need never want for an opponent. What is there in the simple belief of a spirit existence or continued life beyond the grave that need to arouse animosity in anyone? Is not such a thing desirable? And whether desirable or not, if true, what does it amount to to oppose it? When Spiritualism draws a boundary line for thought, when it attempts to force men's minds into particular channels, when it denies the right to reason or the exercise of private judgment, then is time to combat it, and I shall be one of the combatants. While Spiritualists, outside their belief in immortality, hav no important views on life and the pursuit of happiness at variance with the Materialist, why should that one be a source of enmity or ill-feeling? When union is necessary for strength, why not encourage that union, and strive to cultivate fraternal feelings, as long as both hav a common enemy that must be fought and subdued? The term Liberal is as applicable to Spiritualists as Materialists, though there are individual members of both classes that hav very slight claim to it. I regret this fact, but do not look to such as proper representativs of either belief. Bigotry and intolerance, dogmatism and postulation, hav but one rightful place, and that is in the church. No one afflicted with these theological attributes should stray into the ranks of Liberalism, for such are out of their sphere, and traveling under a misnomer. They should return to the church and mingle with congenial society. In a recent fulmination by one of these positiv postulators I notice all mediums are frauds, and if any ask or want "conditions" they instantly prove it. This is a broad assertion, and shows an extensiv acquaintance among mediums which I supposed no man but Mr. Winter had experienced. La Roy Sunderland admitted, as does Miss Gibson, that phenomena occur such as Spiritualists attribute to spirits, but other Materialists deny it, which shows even they can disagree on this much-ventilated subject. Now, a word as to conditions. Everything that is ever accomplished is done under certain conditions, and the absence of the right conditions will prevent success. Take the telegraph for one illustration. The batteries and instruments may be in perfect order, and the two places between which a communication is to be sent properly connected by wire; but if one of the glass insulators on a telegraph pole is broken, and the wire comes into contact with iron or wood, the "conditions are not right," and failure results. Said Mattie Sawyer Hull to these condition-ridiculers, as she stood on the rostrum, "You all hav to sleep; will some of you come up here before the audience and go to sleep?" They respectfully declined, for the "conditions wan't right." "Materialism," says this same writer, "is all we know to be a fact." Had he used the pronoun "I" instead of "we" his assertion would not hav been improper or false, as it was, it is. There are a large number of "we's" in this world, and no one is an authorized spokesman for all. Said D. M. Bennett, on page 40 of the little tract, "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind" (which I would like to see in the hands of every dogmatist): "Now, the question arises: Are there proofs of intelligences disconnected with visible organizations? Thousands of people, yes, hundreds of thousands and millions, answer Yes. They hav repeatedly received such evidence as to satisfy their reason that such intelligence or intelligences do exist. We are one of this number." Henceforth will these enthusiastic annihilationists be more cautious in using the word "we," for as used it includes these millions that do know spirit is as much of an entity as matter? And will those who hav continued to claim D. M. Bennett as one of their number now accept his own words as evidence of their mistake. Let us be tolerant in the discussion of all subjects, and never so presumptuous as to think there are no undiscovered truths in the great realm of nature. The truth of Spiritualism will never be established by discussion, for each and every one, to believe, must hav evidence. This evidence must come through the despised medium, and if any are averse to seeking it there, they don't hav to.

In closing, I will again quote from D. M. Bennett: "It is not our purpose to here cite instances, nor to detail phenomena that thousands of times hav occurred, but simply to recognize the fact that they do take place. In doing this it is by no means necessary to accept all the claims of charlatans, frauds, and enthusiasts, of which undeniably large numbers exist. C. SEVERANCE.

P.S.—"Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind" costs but 10 cents, though worth many times that sum. C. S.

I am away from home almost all the time, but I manage to get THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I make it a practice when I am through with it to giv it to some friend. It always institutes a spirit of inquiry and starts them thinking in the right direction. When it is possible to get the followers of the meek and lowly to look on the opposit side and to create within them a desire to know the whole truth, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred they will see where they are wrong, and in place of a blind faith in the Christian's heaven and a superstitious fear of their hell (old ed.) they will become converts to the more modern religion, the Religion of Humanity.

Yours truly, L. W. ZUVER.

POMONA, CAL., July 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed slip I cut from the Dayton Chronicle, published in Washington territory:

"THE EFFECT OF GRAVES'S PREACHING.—At the coroner's inquest held over the body of the infant child killed near Weston last week by its mother, the fact was developed that since Evangelist Graves had been preaching in that place, she had become imbued with the idea that she had 'committed the unpardonable sin and was doomed to go to hell.' She said after the deed was committed that 'the blood which coursed in her veins was the same as that which ran in the veins of her child, and, as she did not want the little one to go to hell, she would kill it and send it to its master.' Prior to the advent of Graves the woman was perfectly sane and thought everything of her child. The feeling in the vicinity of Weston against Graves is intense, as he is blamed with causing the mental wreck and awful tragedy by his outrageous assertions in the pulpit. The unhappy woman was sent to the asylum on the 24th."

This is another of the many similar cases occurring of butcheries of innocent children caused directly by the teachings of this monstrous un-holy book called the Bible. I venture the assertion that there is not another book published on this earth the reading of which would or could so unsettle the mind of a loving mother that she could deliberately put to death her only child in the manner that this mother has done. All other crimes ever committed in the name of the gods dwindle into insignificance compared with the butchering of babes by mothers. And who is responsible for these worse than hellish murders? The blood of these innocent victims is upon every "pounder" of Bibles that is giving force to the abominable teachings of the vicarious atonement.

Every protector of babes and virtue should denounce these promoters of vice and murder wherever they may be found. Our mothers, wives, and daughters should be impressed with the fact that the parson is a useless ornament; that his teaching is an incentiv to crime; that humanity owes none of its better qualities to him or his teachings. He is, and has been ever since man's intelligence began, the great stumbling-block over which human happiness, comfort, progress, and prosperity hav been stranded. Shall our superstition longer liv to mock our intelligence? Or will we let the light of the nineteenth century in and dispel the darkness of the past? Can we expect anything better of our children if we continually refuse them the light of science, giv them instead the musty, worn-out creeds of the past? The fallacies of the past will not answer for the practices of the future; they are only storm signals that every teacher of science must avoid to be successful. Let us strive to break the chains that bind the past to the future.

The most effectual method of ridding our minds of these superstitions is to stop listening to their teachers, stop building churches, refuse giving for their maintenance or that of the parson. Take away the great motor, money, and superstition would soon die out, and the people would soon become happier and more prosperous. Our desire for the good things of this life, of this real world, would increase until life would be worth living for, and death only be welcomed as the inevitable. H. L. SHAUG.

NORFOLK, NEB., July 17, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to be applied on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read sensible articles, but from such cranks as are writing on prohibition, Spiritual seances, great God (if there is one) deliver us! I hav read everything that is worth knowing about prohibition, God, devil, hell, angels, ghosts, Virgin Mary, and other trash, coming from such writers as you hav to contend with. Let people write on subjects they know and understand, and how slight would the knowledge of these people appear to us!

JNO. GEIGER.

A LETTER TO LUCY COLMAN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 25, 285.

MY DEAR FRIEND AND CO-LABORER: I hav been impressed to write a reply to some of your remarks in the all-sided TRUTH SEEKER. I am aware of the great work you hav done in the past for liberty and equality for all, and I rejoice that on these general subjects you are still clear and strong. I esteem you very much as a grand and noble woman, and for this reason I write as I do, for a fault in those I love and trust hurts me far more than in those less esteemed. Hence my criticisms are usually of my friends; and I am always glad of friendly criticisms from others, believing them a great means of progress.

I hav noticed on various occasions you hav spoken in a most intolerant and disrespectful manner of Spiritualism and Spiritualists—as some others of my friends hav on occasions spoken in the same spirit of Materialism and Materialists. Both I consider unjust, and unworthy true Liberals. I am first a Materialist, having no evidence of anything in the universe except matter in its various stages of refinement. I am also a Spiritualist in the sense that I believe in the continuity of individual human life. This belief is based upon as substantial evidence as my belief in human existence in this earthly life of which you as well as I are cognizant. If I know of the one fact I do of the other, and by the same means—my senses. Now, the fact that you do not know this does not qualify you to declare no one else does know it.

In a court of justice it is the evidence of those that do know that establishes the fact, or decides the case, and unless the evidence can be impeached it stands as valid.

A while ago you were greatly exercised over the fact that someone counted a man in your city as dishonorable (although standing self-convicted), and in that same article you by implication accused hundreds of persons whose veracity would be vouched for by those most intimately acquainted with them (mediums) of the same thing. That is not consistent. One person's reputation should be as carefully handled as another's, irrespectiv of beliefs.

In the last TRUTH SEEKER you seemed to go quite out of your way to giv materializations a dab. You say: "The workers of to-day hav enough to contend with. Superstition is still activ; it may not believe in the immaculate conception, but it believes in materializations and all sorts of demonology, etc." Now, my good sister, the "workers of to-day," a large share of them, happen to be these same believers.

The majority of the workers in every reform movement, whether religious, political, or social, I think are afflicted with this same demonology, and, somehow or other, they seem very deeply interested in the great reform movements of the day, and I fail to see why a belief in a future life, with its conditions only a natural outgrowth of our life here, would, in any way, make one less anxious for the welfare of the race.

Is your old friend and co-laborer, Amy Post, who has stood in the battle's front for so many years, so deficient in "common sense" as you would intimate all were who hav had evidence of something that you hav not? And should she and the rest of us apologize for finding out, by patient investigation, something that you hav not?

There is quite a difference in believing in a "thus saith the Lord," a divine revelation made centuries ago, as an authoritativ book, and believing some new revelation of nature, made at the present time and subjected to the test of our senses.

I never could understand why people should feel bitter and vindictiv toward those who hav, or think they hav, learned something they hav not attained; but such is the case, as all past history shows every new idea or discovery having to fight its way to acceptance.

Let us work in harmony in all matters in which we agree, and treat individual opinions respectfully. I am no more to blame for differing from you in belief than are you for differing from me. Kindly yours, DR. JULIET H. SEVERANCE.

NEW ALBANY, IND., July 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: As it has been some time since I wrote to you, and as I thought it might interest some of your readers to know what our society was doing, I thought I would write a few words in regard to its aims, etc. We call it "The Liberal, Mutual, and Scientific Society." We expect to locate near Sulphur Springs, Texas; we are looking at a tract near there now. Our idea is for all members to contribute to a general fund, buy land, deed it to the society, carry on farming, manufacturing, cattle-raising, and all the different industries; all the land, factories, stores, etc., to belong to the society joint ownership. Then all work eight hours per day and receive equal wages. Buy all supplies from the society's stores, at a small per cent above first cost. Of course we expect to manufacture a great many goods, and these can be had (by the society) at manufacturers' prices. You see it will be a grand co-operativ society, where all hav equal shares, rights, and privileges.

We exclude preachers, saloon-keepers, and lawyers; we want no drones. We will hav the best schools, libraries, etc. Lecture-rooms, reading-rooms, all free. So that after the eight hours' work is done, a person can educate and amuse himself and enjoy life. I am sure some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER would like to enter a society of this kind. If so, or they wish more information regarding it, write to

E. E. PARK.

LOUP CITY, NEB., July 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I believe my subscription expires on the 24th, so find inclosed $2.50. I got the "Modern Balaam" in good shape and will frame, and hang up in my place of business. "Gaud" has been raising Cain out this way this summer. About the meanest trick was to allow the poor homesteaders to use that which they needed for the support of their family in building him a house, and just about the time it was all done and dedicated, the great mogul sent a storm and blew it all to pieces. Now they must, of course, build him another.

I asked some of them if they were not beginning to lose confidence in their "Gaud," and they turned up their nose and walked off. The latest message here from heaven came through the Rev. Meizner, a M. E. pilot that fills the pulpit here occasionally. He says that only two out of every thirty people ever succeed in playing a harp before the throne; the others all go to replenish the fire to keep the devil's shins warm during a cold snap. GEORGE H. GIBSON.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., July 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting since the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 4th, containing T. B. Wakeman's appeal in behalf of E. H. Heywood, hoping an abler pen than mine would take the case in hand, and do something to stir up Liberals toward indemnifying him. I strike hands with Wakeman and would here nominate our dear old friend Elizur Wright as the one to receive contributions in his behalf, and I herewith inclose post-office order of $5.00, as a nucleus to that end. Hoping this will meet your approbation, and that you will start the "ball a-rolling," I remain yours for justice to the living!

Later.—I send this to you for E. H. Heywood, hoping you will hold it till others contribute. If you can do anything in and through THE TRUTH SEEKER to that end, I pray you will. If not, please forward to E. H. Heywood, and oblige,

Your friend, ABBIE KNAPP.

PACIFIC, MO., July 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I acknowledge, with pleasure and satisfaction, the receipt of ANNUAL and "Bible Morals." The ANNUAL is magnificent, worth more than cost. The "Bible Morals" are a ready weapon which no priest can counter.

Yours, A. H. KRUGER.

DAYTON, O., July 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to aid in keeping Freethought afloat during the hot season. While I write it is 100 in the shade, making us feel the truth of the heat without seeking, just enough to giv us a faint idea of an orthodox hell. And just so long as the great mass of the people are more easily governed by their fears that by their reason the priests will find use for this hell.

I take a number of periodicals; among them are several Spiritual papers, but for substantial and intelligent variety, giv me THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav had large experience in modern Spiritualism, and hav been more fortunate than Elmina, for I am satisfied I hav seen many manifestations entirely free from fraud. But from whence comes this power to thus operate upon mediums is the question. However, let it be what it may, its tendency is to Liberalize, and aid in loosening the shackles of religious bigotry and superstition.

It is too hot. I shall not enlarge on this subject, only to ask what some would call a foolish question: Does brain generate thought, or serve only as a medium to convey thought?

J. A. WALTERS.

GALT, ONT., July 15, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.25—$6 to be applied on subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for current year and the year following; 25 cents for five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for July 11th. I cannot express my admiration too highly for the grand pictorial illustration of history in your last issue. This feature of your work must hav a powerful effect in opening the eyes of the people to the past and present cruelties of Christianity. I appreciate your efforts in making THE TRUTH SEEKER the great exponent of Liberal principles that it is. Although a Materialist of the Winter stamp, I enjoy the articles on Spiritualism pro and con, and believe that in so publishing them you demonstrate that you are a Liberal in the right sense of the term. I hav read, with much interest, Elmina's tour of inspection of the so-called spirits, and think it has been keen, knowing, and kindly. With best wishes for the success of your journal and the cause, I am,

Yours fraternally, GEO. LAIRD.

ORANGE HIGHTS, FLA., July 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find 25 cents, for which you will please send me the ANNUAL for 1885 (E.M. 285). I, with all people who hav a mind of their own, and are not afraid to boldly express what they think, believe and say just what you do. My nearest neighbor is the front man to freely express himself a Liberal in this vicinity. There are others who, if they had THE TRUTH SEEKER, would come boldly and loud spoken on the side you so ably advocate. Success to the Albany Convention and all who attend it. R. P. WILLEFORD.

ALTON, ILL., July 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you a slip taken from the Post-Dispatch, an evening paper of St. Louis. I do not expect you to read the whole dirty piece, nor hav I time to do so, but I hav marked a few of the most vulgar sentences. That a man in this enlightened day could get up and make such a mean harang as this is the most astounding thing out. But vulgarity, as a rule, only demoralizes the man who indulges in it; but this typical Christian does not stop here, but puts in downright abuse of a very large and respectable body of people in our own city. I believe three-fourths of our most activ, energetic business men swear, to use a common phrase. These men are as honest and as charitable as any of our church people. I do not wish to disparage this latter class, for they are, as a rule, good, honorable people, but no more so than the former class, not one whit, and what we find here is a fair sample this country over. The fact is, experience has taught us that for a man to belong to a church does not make him more honest or more charitable. Some of the noblest-hearted men we ever knew are what are commonly called profane swearers. The practice is just like any other; it's a simple manner of expression, like "infernal," "confound," "I will be blamed," etc.; has no more significance; and now, for a blatant blackguard to get up in what he terms a pulpit, and call such people black-mouthed rascals, is a disgrace, not only to himself, but to the people he talks to and the church he represents. It's the old Peter Cartwright style, and has the same ring as that of your great, sensational Talmage. The difference is, Mr. Talmage could not dare use such dirty language before his more refined audience. The man is the same and the disposition the same. Elther would gladly see their, not enemies, but unbelievers in their creeds, burnt at the stake. We despise such men. We know men who use what they call profane language that, as compared to such men, are angels as to devils. The one is an honest, whole-souled, big-hearted man; the other is bigoted, selfish, mean, tyrannical. But we leave you to judge of this harang, published as a sermon. Very truly yours, D. R. SPARKS.

LEHIGH, IA., July 20, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Our little town was overrun three weeks ago by a mob of Methodist preachers. They held a camp-meeting in the grove which lasted ten days and nights in bellowing and braying,

"And more and awful
To even mention would be unlawful."

They abused every denomination and sect outside of the Methodist church, and claimed there was nothing but hell for the sinner, and glory for the righteous in the future. They did not seem to recognize the new revision of hell (sheol), but rather ignored it, thinking the old sulphurous word, hell, would hav more influence in bringing the sinners to the altar. But after a ten day and night effort in singing, and slandering and abusing Infidels, calling Voltaire an Atheist, saying that J. Black outdid Ingersoll, and Thomas Paine recanted on his death-bed, and a host of other orthodox lies, the result of their labors was a few old women were converted—or rightly, got excited—with a few of the most ignorant, simple-minded men in the community. The more intelligent portion of the people were disgusted with the proceedings throughout. Even ministers belonging to other denominations pronounce them fools. Their appearance here has done good, as it has created no little investigation, and has caused a great majority to think, which has caused a good many to avow themselvs Freethinkers. It will not do at the present age to teach such nonsense to an intelligent people. The truth is spreading fast and wide, and driving the orthodox trash before it. Orthodoxy is corrupt in itself, and the more it is preached the deader it is becoming. Let her remain without power a few years longer, with the same rate of free inquiry and investigation, and orthodoxy will become a dead mummy of the past; it will hav to be embalmed and dried in order to be remembered. Inclosed please find $3 to pay for my subscription. My best wishes to you all in carrying your good intentions to a successful end. ROBERT FLEMING.

ST. STEPHEN, N. B, July 19, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed only yesterday that my subscription is overdue. Inclosed please find $3 for renewal coming year.

I hav no advice to offer you as to how THE TRUTH SEEKER should be run. This I think will make you draw a sigh of relief after so many suggestions in the "Letters from Friends." Please enter me on your list as a subscriber whom THE TRUTH SEEKER suits exactly, and who thinks you edit the paper as well as he could do it himself. It even suits me exactly in its day of publication, as it arrives here on Saturday, and givs me part of my Sawbath reading, to the horror of my church-going friends.

I may tell you sub rosa I had a visit last week from a Presbyterian minister here (a new edition), and our conversation took a wide theological range, "to be continued," he agreeing to prove the accuracy of Bible history, its geological record, and testimony not contrary to modern science, appeals to the "faith" of the "Infidel" (that's I) not to count, said "Infidel" having no appeals to reason to count every time. Both thinking they are chockful of it, I think the "lift" Atlas is represented as taking was light compared to the load my "parsonical" friend has undertaken to shoulder.

There are but a few of us here who are not invertebrates, but the pews, and more than one of the pulpits, are honeycombed with Infidelity. But terror of Mrs. Grundy makes them Judas Iscariots to their own souls, and keeps them in the "protoplasmic" state. But we will yet evolute them into something higher. This is all for your private ear, and only meant as words of cheer, that "your hands may be upheld" by the knowledge that in places, in nooks, of which you may hav never heard, one or two are holding aloft the banner of Freethought, and advocating the right of every man to do his own thinking in or out of a church, and so discussing these questions as, while defending what they believe the truth, not to offend good taste or good manners. Orthodoxy looks for (and betimes finds) vulgarity connected with Liberalism, and when she finds it, like Captain Cuttle she "makes a note of it," and clamors, "See the fruits of Infidelity," etc. Here we try to steer clear of it, though at times our opponents' arguments seem to invite a biting reply.

Wishing you every success, very truly yours,

JOHN MCMULLEN.

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 11, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3. It seems that fighting superstition is hard work and little money. The hope or expectation of benefiting future generations may be pleasing to contemplate, but it won't pay bills.

Superstition is the drawing card yet, especially in the South. Sam Jones, a revivalist, had no trouble here in raising from three to four thousand dollars for a large tent, where thousands crowded to hear the old, absurd Methodist doctrins, not in scholarly and polished language, but in coarse slang that seemed insulting in this so-called Athens of America, the city of high schools. Sam preached the old-fashioned hell straight, and managed to frighten many, and they were not all niggers by considerable. It was a sickening and humiliating spectacle. MALCOLM GRAHAM.

OSHKOSH, WIS., July 26, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Received the package you sent me containing "Crimes of Preachers," tracts, etc., for which I am under many obligations. I hav distributed all of the tracts among people who will read them, and, as the preachers used to say, I hope they will prove to be bread upon the waters to be gathered after a few days.

I hav been very busy since yesterday, trying to make some arrangement by which I can get a hall for Mr. John E. Remsburg to speak in about the last of next month. I received a letter from him yesterday, postmarked Atchison, Kan., stating terms, etc. I am acquainted with but few of the Liberals here, as I hav lived here only since last fall, but I am using every endeavor to make their acquaintance. There are a great many Liberals here for the size of the city, but many are afraid to come out boldly just yet, as it would probably injure their business; and I cannot blame them much, for if any Liberal man is doing business here, as soon as the churches find it out he is ostracized in every possible way.

But it is only a matter of time, for I can see a marked change here since Colonel Ingersoll delivered his last lecture here.

And now, while I am writing, I wish to draw your attention to one particular outrage. You are probably aware that all of our preachers and priests ride on all railroads in this country for half fare, while the old, crippled soldiers pay full fare. Now, when I board a train and see a preacher or priest on board, I cannot help thinking that I am paying a part of his fare, and the thought makes me as mad as h—l. I forget that new word they hav for it, so I am compelled to speak plain, and that is just what I mean. Now, as our Liberal papers are first in every reform, I should like to see the railroads get a severe blow on the nose in regard to their favoritism. Make the preachers pay full fare, or else let the old soldiers who hav done something for the country and railroads ride as cheap as those frauds. Yours muchly, GEO. M. HARE.

HAMBURG, N. Y., July 9, 285.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2—$1 for Campaign and $1 for Tent Fund. I also inclose stamps for two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 29th, if you hav them to spare.

I second the motion made by Mrs. Gault, that Mrs. C. B. Reynolds be nominated for secretary of the State Association. With thanks for past favors, I remain

Yours truly, E. M. SICKMON.

CYNTHIANA, KY., July 19, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed eighty-five cents, and send six copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 11th inst., and six copies of the picture contained therein, and the rest as directed. I want these documents to circulate among my friends. The picture is the most startling and convincing illustration that I hav seen. It ought to circulate by the million. I am working entirely alone here, and, of course, hav to go slow. I am encouraged when I hear of the success of Freethought in other places. H. A. BEAMER.

LINDSAY, ONT., CAN., July 21, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.00 to apply on my subscription. The publication and all it views to accomplish hav my best wishes. Freethought is making grand progress the world throughout, and Canada is coming to the rescue grandly. We need lectures in this country greatly. Confident of ultimate success, THOS. A. MIDDLETON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Johnny Blinker.

Johnny Blinker thought this was a gay old world, and, although he was only five years of age, he thought he would like to travel around it. He had a new pair of cunning little boots, and he thought they would stand the wear and tear of a trip around the world, and still be pretty good boots when he returned. He did not tell anybody his intentions, for fear they might prevent his undertaking the journey.

He put on his little black velvet cap one forenoon, and his fur-bordered overcoat, and off he started. Leo, his big Newfoundland dog, tried to tell him it was too far to travel, and pulled the fur off the coat in trying to coax him back.

"You just let me alone, Leo," he said. "I'm going to see the world, I am; and you stay at home and take care of papa and mamma—do you hear, Leo?"

But Leo did not mind Johnny; and before he was out of sight, started slowly after him.

Away Johnny went, singing—

"Hey diddle diddle, the cat and the fiddle,
The cow jumped over the moon;
The little dog laughed to see such sport,
And the dish ran away with the spoon."

"I wonder if the cow did jump over the moon," said Johnny. "It's a mighty long jump, I think, for a cow, and I guess it jounced her some when she lighted!"

"Why, Johnny Blinker, where are you going?" inquired Ellen Vaughan, stopping him by the roadside.

"'Round the world," he replied.

"You are a little, silly boy—that's what you are. Did you run away from home?"

"I'm not a silly boy at all, and I didn't run away. I walked away."

"O, Johnny, go home; you might get run over," said Ellen.

"Run over! I guess I know enough to keep out from under the horses' feet." And he marched on up the hill, past the school-house, and by the old-fashioned wind-mill which he stopped to admire, for its sails were spread, and it was whirling round and round like a big bird. Then he went out of his way to see the pond. It was a pretty cold day in the fall; but yet he thought it not too cold to sail a boat. He found a piece of thick bark, and stuck a stick in it for a mast, and started it on the water. It floated about nicely, and Johnny thought if it were only a nice big boat, he would get in and sail across the pond himself.

On the shore was a broad, flat board; seeing which, Johnny pulled with all his might till he got it in the water.

"It is a splendid boat, and now I'll take a little ride on it," said he. So he slid along on the board, and with a big stick pushed it along. The wind helped him; and before he knew it he was floating out into the pond.

"I want to get back on the land! Papa! papa!" and he began to cry and twist about on the board. He was near the shore, but the water was over his little head, as in his distress he rolled into it.

Leo, who had stopped to hav a friendly chat with another dog, and, perhaps, to tell him in dog language that Johnny Blinker had started on a voyage around the world, now came upon the scene, running fast.

He saw Johnny in the water, and perceived at once that he had come none too soon. He could swim, but Johnny couldn't. In he went into the water, head first, and just as Johnny was sinking for the last time he snatched him in his strong mouth, and bore his little wet body to the shore. He was too heavy for Leo to carry home in his mouth, so he ran to the nearest house, and barked so frantically that the people came to the door to see what was the matter.

The wet dog barking, leaping, and running toward the pond, told them just the same as words would tell that something serious was the matter. They followed the dog, and found Johnny quite unconscious, and at first they thought he was dead. They took him up, and carried him to the house, and soon he opened his eyes. They were all so glad when he could speak and tell them how it happened, for they recognized him as little Johnny Blinker.

Leo ran back to the pond—and what do you suppose it was for? Why, he saw Johnny's velvet cap floating on the water, and went back to get it.

When Johnny was taken home, soaking wet and very weak from fright and danger, his papa and mamma were so glad that they cried and laughed at the same time, and kissed Johnny again and again—and they kissed Leo, too, all wet as he was.

"Where were you going, Johnny, so far from home?" asked his papa.

"Going 'round the world, papa!"

They all laughed as they explained to Johnny that he was too young to make such a long voyage.

He will not start again until he is a grown man.

Leo follows him everywhere, and will not let him out of his sight long enough to go sailing on the pond again.

He is a wise and noble dog, and Johnny calls him his "nice old savior."

Egyptian Superstition.

Some time has elapsed since my first installment on Egyptian superstition appeared, and I suppose the young reader wonders why this is so. The fact is, dear children, my time, like Miss Wixon's space, is limited, and I havn't much chance for writing; consequently it is only by the hardest work that I hav been enabled to complete the series, but since completion, they will appear from week to week without interruption. Now we will return to our subject.

In my first paper I quoted from Dr. Mackenzie; this quotation has no direct connection with our subject, for Hindostan is quite a different country from that of Egypt, and the Hindoos* a race differing materially from the Egyptians. My object was merely to make a short digression, apropos of showing the young folks what strange food oriental people use.

Scorpions, large pinching-ants, and snakes, according to the Egyptians, are transformed villains, and feel a great pleasure in committing all kinds of mischief. Yet, at the same time, it is alleged, these vile creatures can be induced to stand still, if one cries "homar," and and thus allow themselvs to be killed. Another thing—it is said, but how truly I don't know, that the camel discovers the rising of the sun, before it becomes visible to human eyes, and that, in the month of June, it always lies down with its head toward the east. Why this is, no satisfactory reason has ever been advanced further than that certain instincts are credited to this animal for things of which human senses do not take cognizance.

Flat-fish of all species and varieties, such as flounders, plaice, sole, turbot, etc., as every one knows who has seen them, are white on one side and dark-colored on the other. Naturalists account for this peculiarity by saying that these fish liv at the bottom of the sea, dark side uppermost, to prevent their being easily discovered by the ocean monsters which devour them. But the Egyptians hav a theory, which, if rightly named, we would call idle speculations, that Moses was once cooking a flat-fish, and when it had been broiled until brown on one side, the oil or fire gave out, and Moses, becoming angry, threw the fish, half-cooked as it was, back into the sea, and where it became as lively as ever, and from that day to this the descendants of that species of fish hav remained brown or black on one side, and white or colorless on the other.

The Wonders of the Ocean.

ITS GARDENS.

"Gardens in the ocean!" I think I hear some bright-eyed boy or girl exclaim.

Yes; the beauties of submarine gardens must be seen to be duly appreciated. Before I tell you more of these lovely spots I must tell you how to make a "water telescope," so you may see and study them. Get father, uncle, or big brother to knock the bottom out of a headless barrel, and insert a plate of strong, clear glass; attach the barrel, glass end down, to the side of your boat in such a manner that it will sink twelve to sixteen inches below the surface of the water. Thus the ripples will not disturb the rays of light by which you can see the beautiful things at the bottom of the ocean as you lean over the barrel and look through the plate glass.

Here I must tell you where the water is very, very deep—say twelve or fourteen hundred feet—the sunbeams falling vertically, that is, straight down, are all absorbed before they reach this depth. Consequently, beyond this darkness reigns, and there is almost an absolute sterility of vegetable and animal life.

You will hardly sail over such deep waters in your investigations, yet it is nice to know the above fact.

Now, looking through our big telescope into the clear water, we can see with astonishment and pleasure plain, meadow, and forest. The sea soil is overspread with a verdant covering, more varied in its tints and shades than the green of the land, far softer and more graceful in its undulations than the grass of our meadows and prairies.

From the velvety carpet rise branches of red and white coral, having attached to them, like flowers and fruits, the most delicate and beautifully colored shells. In and out, through their partings, dart fish of strange forms and gorgeous hues. Some amuse themselvs in playful gambols as if fully conscious of the magnificence by which they are surrounded, while others quietly browse the tender algæ floating near.

These ocean groves teem with life in a thousand varied types; with animals that run, creep, and swim; while others are almost immovably attached to rocks. Our terrestrial forests do not maintain so many living beings as there are of those which sport and swarm in the bosom of the ocean.

The formations of the coral insect are not always in an upright position. They often extend in a horizontal direction, winding and curving in beautiful convolutions over the soil of the sea, covering it with all the richness and variety of oriental tapestry.

You must remember that coral is not formed in all locations, therefore you will not always find it, but in almost any place you can see lovely things on the floor or bottom of the sea.

No doubt our dear Miss Wixon has seen very many interesting objects of study during her visit to Onset Bay. How delightful it would be if we could all visit with her a day, would it not? As this is impossible, we must find our delights in other ways, always remembering this simple rule, "If we would be happy, we must strive to make others so."

What Can the Boy Do?

If a boy reads the papers in these days, he will see much about work, and learning to work. He will hear much said of the difficulty of getting good workmen. He will hear of new schools for boys, where carpentry, brick-laying, painting, carriage-making, and many other trades are taught. Of course, he means to do something himself, but somehow he does not care for those splendid new schools. It is nothing to him that good workmen are scarce, and always find good wages. He is going into a store or an office, or means to be a doctor or lawyer. He does not propose to soil his hands and wear rough clothes like a workman.

If there is any such boy, who may read this, let him consider a moment. My cheerful young man, are you sure that you know what you are talking about? What do clerks earn? How much does a young doctor receive? Oh, but you don't mean to be a poor clerk. You intend to be a great lawyer with ten thousand a year, or a doctor with a carriage. Charmed to hear it. It is a noble resolve, but are you quite sure you will get there? Really, now, how can a young man tell, how can he be sure he will succeed? In this way. A man succeeds who falls in love with his work. He thinks about it day and night, he studies it; he reads all he can find on the subject. He tries and tries till he can do it well. Then it is he succeeds. You do not care much about medicin; you hav no burning desire to study this magnificent machine, the human body. You don't care very much for dreadful work in hospitals, and yet you mean to be a doctor. You would secretly much prefer to hav a kit of carver's tool, but, of course, you could never be a carver by trade.

Let us stop here. This is the summing up of a vast deal of homely wisdom. Do you love any work? Is there anything that, if you were independent, you would do before anything else? If there is, do that. There is your success; that way lies all the money, the rewards, the respect of others, and all the real, honest, happiness you will ever find. Boys make a mistake in thinking that only the lawyers and doctors and merchants succeed. It is a terrible blunder to leave a trade in which you may make a first-class workman, and hav a chance to win a home, comfort, and independence, to go into a profession you do not love. There is only one end to that road—a life of ill-paid drudgery, and failure after all.

Look at yourself; you are to yourself the most important person in the world. Find out what sort of man you hav in the little. What is your body good for? What sort of a mind hav you received? Look at your tools—your hands, your senses, your brain. What will they do best—make shoes, or preach a sermon? Choose now according to your tools, according to your love of work. Shoemaking may lead to a great fortune, while preaching may bring you to the "Home for Decayed Parsons." On the other hand preaching may be, the thing. There is only one fellow can decide this for you, and he livs in your house.

Let no boy imagin that the trades do not lead to fortune. Let no boy think, because he sees some workmen who are always poor, that all are poor, or stay at the bench all their lives. There is really to-day no surer road to success and fame, and all good things, than by way of the bench and anvil. Let the weak and the feeble-minded sell ribbons and keep day-books. That road is not for the brave, the strong, the lovers of good work. What can you do? Do what you can best.—Golden Rule.

IT was Themistocles, the Athenian statesman, who declared that his infant son ruled the world. And how did he make his baby boy such a power, do you suppose? This is the way he proved it: "My infant son rules his mother; his mother rules me; I rule the Athenians; the Athenians rule the Greeks; the Greeks rule Europe, and Europe rules the world." Whether the famous Athenian's proof is satisfactory or not, we all know that the baby is king or queen of the household, as the case may be, and the children of all ages are very important folks who hav some rights that good newspapers must regard.—Nashville Banner.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—PUZZLE.

Whole, a fault;
Beheaded, halt.

2.—CHARADE.

My first was neat some time ago;
My second will an island state;
My third one-half myself will show;
My last to prove will indicate.
A useful study is disclosed
By my entire. Find the word.
From you my second may be heard;
But if you hav my first transposed,
You will my last to find my third.

3.—PUZZLE.

With my whole to be content,
We're urged both loud and long;
If from my whole the tail be rent,
'Twill call attention strong.
But now return my tail to me,
My head cut off transpose;
Then look sharp, and you will see
The word relation shows.

L. E. HUGGINS.

4.—CHARADE.

My first is that which people find
To strengthen many a weary mind;
It helps the good of every cause,
Seeks neither place nor loud applause.

As o'er the broad Atlantic's breast
Columbus sped his journey West,
My second he proved himself to be,
When he had braved the angry sea.

My whole in many homes is found,
As we this country journey round;
It fights the wrong, defends the right,
Is filled with jewels rare and bright.

BIBLE MYTHS,

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

The Missing Link

—IN—

MODERN SPIRITUALISM

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL, of the Fox family.

This book purports to be a truthful account of the phenomena occurring at Hydesville in the house of Mr. Fox, and since to various members of the Underhill family, especially the author, who has had a good offset to "Bottom Facts," being essentially controversial, and will be used for offense and defense by believers in Spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Underhill contends that the exhibitions of an occult power, as narrated in her book, demonstrate beyond doubt the reality of the survival of man's spirit; that death is but birth into another stage of progressed and progressiv life; and proves what has hitherto been but a dogma of an unproved and unprovable faith, the immortality of the soul. Poetry.

Ingersoll.

The poet with the silver tongue,
The poet of the manly arm,
The poet of the free-born thought,
The weaver of the mystic charm—
Thy name shall stand on Fame's bright scroll:
The prince of poets—Ingersoll.

They call thee orator, and well,
For "never man like this man spake,"
And from thy laughing fount of thought
Our children's thirst shall deeply slake;

But know they not—among the things
That shall in course of time befall—
Fair Fame will write with golden pen:
The prince of poets—Ingersoll.

The poet with the silver tongue,
The gentleman with loving heart,
The witty sage, the kindly friend,
The orator of wondrous art;
Through coming ages Fame shall call
Thee: Prince of poets—Ingersoll.

J. WM. LLOYD.

Love and Duty.

"What shall I do lest life in silence pass?"
"And if it do
And never prompt the bray of noisy brass,
What need'st thou rue?

"Remember, aye, the ocean deeps are mute;
The shallows roar;
Worth is the ocean, fame is but the bruit
Along the shore."

"What shall I do to be forever known?"
"Thy duty ever."
"This did full many who yet slept unknown."
"Oh! never, never!

"Think'st thou, perchance, that they remain unknown
Whom thou know'st not?
By angel trumps in heaven their praise is blown;
Divine their lot."

"What shall I do to gain eternal life?"
"Discharge aright
The simple duties with which each day is rife,
Yea, with thy might.

"Ere perfect scene of action thou dev'ise
Will life be fled,
While he who ever acts as conscience cries
Shall liv though dead.

—From Schiller, by A. H. Clough.

Stray Scraps.

Said Mr. J. C. Carter at the opening of New York's great pleasure resort, Niagara Park, July 15th, "There is in man a supernatural element, in virtue of which he aspires to lay hold of the infinities by which he is surrounded." How deeply the fanaticism of the supernatural is ingrafted into mankind! When will they learn that there can be no supernatural any more than there can be space beyond space?

The king of Dahomey (West Africa), on May 10th, made a raid on the villages under French protection near Porto Novo. His troops indulged in wholesale massacres, and burnt all the dwellings. One thousand youths and women were captured and carried back into Dahomey to be sacrificed at the cannibalistic feasts. We need a new God to put a stop to this foreordained plan from the foundation of the world, inaugurated and carried on by the present incumbent in office.

"What church is this?" inquired a stranger of one of the brethren, after standing some time in the aisle unnoticed. "Christ's church," was the reply. "Is he in?" was quietly asked. The hint was taken and the stranger shown a seat. How much more sensible had he gone out into the open air, where, it is said, Christ used to preach, and taken a ramble over the hills, or sauntered by the seashore—a favorit resort of Christ, where he angled for fish, or men, on the first day of the week without any fear of an arrest, though he violated the sanctities of the seventh day according to holy writ!

The German Baptist church at Meriden, Conn., is disturbed by the strange claim of a new pastor, the Rev. Mr. Berkley, that he has power to call the Holy Ghost down upon men. Some believe it, and some don't. Well, why quarrel over it? Why not test the claim by having an artist present to take the photograph of the Holy Ghost after the reverend has got the fellow called and well settled down upon the congregation, and then exhibit and sell the pictures for Christ's sake, thus proving the theory, giving us a view of his godship, and turning the whole into money-raising for church benefit?

At the meeting of the American Baptist Missionary Union in Tremont Temple, Boston, July 11th, Geo. W. Chipman, Esq., who presided, said he thought it was every man's duty to return to the Lord one-tenth of what he gave him. Now, that would be a pretty difficult operation sometimes, for how is a man o always know just how much the Lord givs him, how much the other fellow pays him, and how much he earns himself? If Chipman meant one-tenth of the man's income, why, that was quite another affair, as the money, or receipts, of burglars, liquor-sellers, Sunday-school superintendent defaulters, Christian bankers, etc., might rake in quite a pile that is supposed to be the reward of his satanic majesty who rules the Plutonian regions and occasionally catches one of the stray sheep who wanders from the fold. But it would be just as good money for missionary purposes for all that, for my early remembrances are of a convention where the ministers decided that "the altar sanctifies the gift," when the price of blood was brought into the Lord's treasury.
